HIS EXCELLENCY THE VICEROY'S SPEECH.

11-15 A.M.

The President:—"Let me first welcome Hon'ble Members to another Session. We are met together, for reasons which are familiar to you all, in diminished numbers, but we have important work to do, and I am confident that Hon'ble Members will devote their best attention to it.

"Since our last meeting we have to mourn the loss of a colleague who had earned the respect of us all—the late Mr. Ironside. His standard of devotion to duty, both public and private, was high and he never hesitated to stand by his convictions even at the risk of incurring personal unpopularity. It is a melancholy consolation to know that his merits had been recognised and that it had been the intention of His Majesty the King-Emperor to bestow on him the honour of Knighthood, but for his untimely death which occurred on the eve of the conferment of that honour.

"Another personality we shall miss is that of Sir Sankaran Nair. Sir Sankaran Nair felt it incumbent on himself to resign his office. His reasons for resigning were honourable to himself and I thoroughly appreciated them, but as the relations between colleagues in a Government are necessarily of a private nature, I do not propose to discuss them. We shall all, I am sure, welcome as his successor a Member of this Council of long-standing Mian Muhammad Shafi and wish him all success in his new duties.

"While I am on the subject of welcomes I should like to take the opportunity of welcoming back to this country His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner. The admirable work which His Highness did during the historic gathering at Versailles has been warmly acknowledged both by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State, and we all owe to Mr. Montagu, His Highness and Lord Sinha a debt of gratitude for their arduous labours on behalf of India.

"The full result of their labours will not be seen for some time, for the work of the Peace Conference is not completed. Its final decision on the Turkish peace terms, more particularly, is still awaited, and by our Muslim fellow-subjects is awaited with such keen concern that I feel I should say one or two words with regard to the matter. I have throughout done all in my power to ensure full representation of their feelings. Not only have the Government of India placed the views of Muslim India with strong emphasis before His Majesty's Government, our delegates voiced those views before the Peace Conference, and that nothing might be left undone to lend weight to their evidence, it was reinforced by three Muslims of distinction who had been specially delegated to attend the Peace Conference with them. Muslim India may, therefore, rest assured that its feelings have been given the fullest representation possible.

"Since the close of the last Session there have been events of a grave character disturbing the peace and tranquillity of this country, and I cannot pass them over without mention. Last Session certain Hon'ble Members during the passage of the Rowlatt Bill gave me warnings of an almost minatory character that, if that Bill passed into law, there would be agitation of a serious nature. I think Hon'ble Members will realise that no Government could deviate from a policy which it regarded as essential on account of any threat of agitation. However, there were those who thought that it was necessary to make good this threat, and as a consequence the deplorable events occurred which are to be the subject of an inquiry. It is not my intention to discuss these events, but I would point out this, that it is easy to minimise their gravity after the disorders have been put down. No one who had the responsibility of dealing with them is likely to forget the issue which they had to face. Murders and arson were committed, telegraph wires were cut, railway lines were torn up, and for some days my only sure communication with the Government of the Punjab was by means of the wireless. Occular proof of the gravity of the situation with which we were then faced, and of the damage done is still manifest in many of the districts which suffered; and to any one who would attempt to minimise the trouble I would say 'Go into these districts and see for yourself the vestiges of senseless destruction which are still there.'

"The policy of my Government was clearly set out in our Resolution of April 14th. I promised support to the Head of each Local Government for such measures as he thought it might be necessary to take, and that support was given unwaveringly throughout. No one deplores more than I the need there was for stern action, but the result of our prompt measures was that the disorders were quelled and peace restored. It is my desire now, and it is that of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, to exercise clemency towards the unfortunate misguided men who were led away by 'some educated and clever man or men,' to use Mr. Gandhi's words, to commit outrages. For some time past Sir Edward Maclagan has been busily engaged in reviewing the sentences passed, and in every case possible he has tempered justice with mercy.

"And for those cases which have come before the Government of India I have no hesitation in claiming that they received the most careful consideration, and that orders were passed with the greatest possible despatch.

"For some time past my Government has been in correspondence with the Secretary of State upon the question of an inquiry into these disorders. We have both been anxious to settle this question as quickly as possible, but an announcement has been delayed largely by the difficulty of procuring the services of a suitable Chairman. It was only on Saturday last that I heard that Lord Hunter had agreed to come to India in that capacity. The Committee is now complete and will consist of—

Chairman:

Lord Hunter, formerly Solicitor-General for Scotland.

Members:

(1) The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Rankin.

(2) The Hon'ble Mr. Rice.

(3) Major-General Sir George Barrow.

(4) Sir Chimanlal Setalvad.

(5) Sahibzada Sultan Ahmad.

"Their instructions will be to inquire into and to report to the Governor General in Council regarding the causes of, and the measures taken to cope with, the recent disorders in Delhi, the Punjab and the Bombay Presidency. The proceedings of the Committee will ordinarily be public, but the Chairman will have authority to direct them to be held in camera when he considers that the public interests so require. It is hoped that the Committee will begin its sessions next month. The members have a difficult task before them; and I trust that people of all classes of opinion will do nothing to add to their difficulties by the needless importation of irrelevant or intentionally inflammable material.

"After disorders involving so great an upheaval of normal conditions such an inquiry as I have just announced is one inevitable consequence. The second and no less necessary sequel is the passing of an Act indemnifying those officers of Government who were called upon to undertake the onerous and ungrateful task of restoring order, and the validating of such acts as the stress of circumstances required. Whatever the findings of the Commission may be such a measure would be necessary; and in justice to our officers we are bound to indemnify them at the earliest convenient moment.

"I now turn from internal troubles to our difficulties on the frontier.

"Before law and order had been finally restored in India a fresh complication arose on our North-West border. On the evening of May 3rd news reached us that our frontier had been violated in the neighbourhood of Landi Kotal. In view of the friendly correspondence which had been passing between the Amir and myself, I found it difficult to believe that such aggression was with the knowledge and had the support of the Afghan Government, and I despatched an immediate letter to the Amir asking him to repudiate the action of his officials. Unfortunately within 24 hours overwhelming evidence came into my hands of the deliberate aggression of the Afghan Government, and I gave orders for the immediate expulsion of the Afghan forces from our territories. On May 9th and 11th actions were fought expelling our foe from the vicinity of Landi Kotal. On May 13th Dakka was occupied by the Cavalry, and on May 16th and 17th actions were fought in the hills overlooking it which resulted in the defeat and dispersal of the Afghan forces. At the same time our aeroplanes were not idle, and Jalalabad was visited and bombed resulting in the abandonment of that city by the Afghan troops and its looting by the ever-watchful tribes.

"In the meantime the Afghan Government had become aware of the grave miscalculation of which they had been guilty in thus challenging the British Empire. On two occasions after these defeats they attempted to approach me with a view to a cessation of hostilities, but, having regard to the doubtful character of the credentials of their envoys, I insisted on a personal request from the Amir himself, and this was received on June 1st. As a result of the Amir's appeal hostilities against Afghanistan were discontinued and Armistice terms were laid down. There ensued correspondence with the Amir relating to the details of these which terminated on the 8th July, when I invited him to send in his delegates to the Peace Conference.

"In the meantime the protracted delay rendered the military position difficult. Hostilities had ceased against the Afghans, but the tribes who had been aroused knew little or nothing of the courtesies of war. The war zone of 105,000 odd square miles which constitutes the provinces and tribal areas of Baluchistan and the North-West Frontier was an immense area. It was impossible to be strong at every point, and convoys passing through difficult country necessarily ran grave risks. Moreover, it was necessary to maintain in certain localities troops massed and ready to advance into Afghanistan at a moment's notice if peace negotiations broke down. An active offensive striking at the vital points of an enemy's defence is always the best defensive. Owing to the Armistice our troops were debarred from that. There have been then certain unfortunate incidents of a minor character, but I think the wonder is, in view of the extraordinarily difficult military position which I have outlined, not that they occurred, but that there were not more of them.

"I now come to the treaty of peace and the policy embodied in it. I want to make this clear—our policy was divided into two Chapters, the first comprising a treaty of peace, the second, which has yet to be written, envisaging a treaty of friendship.

"In view of the aggression which had taken place we felt that it would be a hollow mockery to conclude at once a treaty of friendship. Anxious though we are to see our Afghan neighbour prosperous and friendly, we felt that time must pass before we can wipe away the memory of what has occurred. I believe myself confidently that the time will come when Afghanistan will realise that we have no designs upon her, and that we only wish to see her prosper and live on friendly terms with us. But the initiative towards a rapprochement must come from her. Not only have we no designs on her, but India is in no way dependent upon her. If Afghanistan wishes for our friendship nothing will give us greater pleasure than to respond, but if she prefers to hold aloof, we shall not force ourselves upon her. That being the position then we made the treaty of peace with the terms of which Hon'ble Members are familiar, and if the Afghan Government after an interval of six months wish to expand that treaty of peace into a treaty of friendship, we shall be delighted to consider their overtures, provided always that they have in the meantime given us by their conduct satisfactory evidence of the sincerity of their purpose. I cannot leave this subject without paying a tribute to the ability, tact and skill with which Sir Hamilton Grant, assisted by Mr. Maffey and General Moberly, conducted the peace negotiations at Rawalpindi, and I would also specially mention the great assistance given them by their Indian colleagues.

"And now I must say a few words about the allegations of breakdown in our medical arrangements in the late campaign. I shall confine myself in the main to a statement of facts, but it may interest you also to hear what I gathered during my tour at the front.

"The first fact which should be borne in mind is that of the strength of our forces on the frontier, for the only significance that figures can have is their relationship to other figures. And if you take the total admission figures without reference to the strength of the force of which they are the casualties, you necessarily misinterpret their meaning.

"Taking the operations as a whole the maximum ration strength of our forces on the frontier was 247,000 men. For the period 5th May to 9th August the total admissions to hospital were 10,882 British and 45,774 Indian troops and followers, giving a daily admission rate per thousand of strength of 4·98 British and 2·97 Indians. At the same time the deaths per 1,000 admissions to hospital (excluding wounded) were British 0·82 and Indians 27·74. Now I could compare this with similar figures in other campaigns at the same period of the year, but I will content myself with two years' figures in Mesopotamia, when the medical arrangements were admittedly admirable. In 1917, the admissions per 1,000 were British 5·04 and Indians 2·11, and the mortality per 1,000 admissions was British 19·30, Indians 15·96. Similarly, in 1918, the admissions per 1,000 were British 3·48 and Indians 2·27, and the mortality per 1,000 was British 7·41 and Indians 20·51. One word is needed with regard to the relatively high mortality among Indians. This was due to the high incidence of cholera especially among Indian followers, whose standard of water discipline was naturally lower than that of regular troops, and who could not be restrained from quenching their thirst at pools and streams which though apparently pure were in reality full of cholera germs.

"Another comparative estimate of the sick rate of the force may be obtained from the daily number of hospital evacuations from the front to the base. The normal loss by evacuation on account of sickness from a force engaged in active operations in a temperate climate in Europe is accepted by all military authorities as averaging 3 per 1,000 of strength per day. This figure in the case of the troops operating on the frontier under the most adverse climatic conditions, and including gunshot wounds, was 2·8 for British and 1·3 for Indian troops and followers. I could give you other figures and other comparisons, but these would be out of place at this moment when I am endeavouring to give a general conspectus of the position. Believe me I make no complaints of the not unnatural anxiety which has been aroused as to our medical arrangements at the front, and I can sympathise with the man who lying sick under conditions of shade temperature varying from 110 to 120 and of the inevitable hardship of frontier campaigning writes with a pen dipped in the gall of his experiences, but is it not right and fair to the men who are responsible for the medical arrangements to judge them by the result of their work as a whole and not by isolated cases, sad but I venture to think inevitable, in any campaign however admirably conducted?

"Now let me say one word as to my tour at the front. I endeavoured to see everything and I asked questions of everyone I met—from Generals down to the soldier in the ranks. I brought away from what I saw and heard the impression that everything was being done that was possible to alleviate the trials and discomforts of the campaign, but I will quote one sentence from one whose opinion will, I think, carry weight, and who is not in any way connected with the military or medical aspect of the campaign. I refer to Sir George Roos-Keppel, whose approaching departure for England will rob the frontier of one who has for so many years been its most dominating personality. He said that in his experience of frontier warfare, and I am sure everyone will acknowledge that experience, he had never seen so much done for the health and comfort of the troops.

"In concluding this subject I should like to express my sympathy with and admiration for the troops who have been serving in this campaign. The British troops were for the most part due for demobilisation; some being for all practical purposes taken off the ship that was to take them home. They have taken their disappointment admirably. We wish to send them back to England at the earliest possible opportunity, and everything is being done to hasten their departure. I was glad to have the opportunity which my visit afforded of showing them the interest which I have in them, and of the gratitude which we all in India feel for their services.

"To the Indian troops I would also express my admiration of the soldierly bearing which was so marked in the ranks of the fine regiments which I visited. They too have had their disappointments. Some had been separated for months and even years from their families and were about to rejoin them, only to be hurried off to a fresh campaign. Others had been forced to forego the furlough they had earned and take their place in the ranks. But one and all they cheerfully accepted their orders, and it was a pleasure and a pride for me to pass down their splendid ranks.

"Before I leave the subject of the Afghan war, I should like to express our obligations to the Ruling Princes and Chiefs who without exception immediately on the outbreak of hostilities placed the resources of their States at the disposal of Government, and offered the assistance of their Imperial Service Troops, many of whom had only just returned to India from the countries overseas, in which they had fought so gallantly on behalf of the Empire. Contingents of Cavalry, Infantry, Artillery, Sappers and Miners and Transport from many of the States were employed either with the field army at the front or on garrison duty, while the Rulers of Patiala, Dholpur, Ratlam and Baria and two sons of the Nawab of Loharu were at their own request appointed to the staff in the field. It would take me too long to recount the numerous offers of camels, motors and money for the provision of comforts for troops engaged in the campaign which we received and gladly accepted. For all these and generous assistance in every way I ask the Princes and Ruling Chiefs to accept our grateful thanks.

"I wish also to express my most cordial thanks to His Excellency the Prime Minister of Nepal, who, in spite of the difficulties attendant on the movement of troops through the Terai in the hot weather, sent to our assistance another magnificent contingent, which I had the pleasure of visiting at Nowshera during my recent tour.

"Reference to the troops brings me by a natural sequence to mention of the Indian Soldiers' Board, the creation of which I described at the last meeting of Council, and which has, under the wise direction of my colleague Sir George Lowndes, been actively engaged during the summer in devising measures to reward distinguished service during the war, to safeguard the interests of Indian soldiers and their dependants, and suitably to commemorate the exploits of the Indian Army. Throughout the war the officers and men of the Indian Army have looked forward with expectancy, at the conclusion of hostilities, to the promised distribution of rewards for distinguished service. This distribution is now about to take place. Thanks to the generosity of Local Governments, and especially of the Punjab, large areas of land will, in the near future, be divided amongst our soldiers ; while those who are not agriculturists or for whom no land can be made available will receive monthly allowances of money with effect from the current month.

"The relief of necessitous cases among the dependants of soldiers has been carried out with a considerable measure of liberality, large sums having been placed at the disposal of Local Governments to help those whose circumstances, in the opinion of the local authorities, require assistance. We also intend to make a further distribution from the accumulated funds of the Imperial Indian Relief Fund among Indian soldiers who have been permanently incapacitated, and dependants left in straitened circumstances.

"Turning to the Indian Defence Force, training on a modified scale was resumed last April. Proposals regarding the future organisation and terms of service of the European portions of the Force based on the recommendations of a conference held last March have now been worked out. They will shortly be published as a draft Bill in the Gazette of India in order that all interests concerned may be afforded ample opportunity of discussing its provisions before legislation is undertaken in February next. The re-organisation of the Indian Branch of the Force is also under consideration. Meanwhile, the University Corps is making steady progress.

"The pay of officers, both of the Indian Army and the British Army in this country, is also under revision, and the recommendations of Government are now before the Secretary of State. The pay of the army officer at home has now been raised, and I hope that before long we shall be able to announce a similar improvement in the pay of his confrere in India.

"I move on from things military to more peaceful matters.

"To touch first the question of Reforms—this has now passed out of our hands, and the issues involved rest for decision by the High Court of Parliament. But while this is so I cannot but express my regret that some of those, who are interested in this great question, have done such scant justice to the Government of India. Our efforts have been described as endeavours to whittle away the proposals of the Report. They were in truth designed to work out the principles laid down in the Report, and where criticism had been levelled against particular proposals, to substitute for those alternatives which might be less open to objection. It is indeed somewhat amusing to me to find that the Joint Report which at the outset came under so hot a fire of criticism from some of my Indian friends is now to them a sacrosanct document, and that any tampering with its verbally inspired proposals savours of sacrilege. With them I have a not unnatural admiration for that document, but my admiration does not extend to idolatry, and I am quite prepared if something better is suggested to give it my best consideration. But with these words I will leave the subject with the expression of the hope that there will emerge from Parliament a scheme which will carry out the principles and the promises of the Announcement of August 1917. My colleagues and I have slaved at this problem for now nearly three years, and we hope that before another Session comes round Parliament will have delivered its final judgment upon our efforts. From the very beginning I have laid stress on the fact that this is an issue which can be decided by His Majesty's Government alone. We have given them the considered views of the Government of India; the opinions of Local Governments are fully before them; and political bodies of every kind have sent in their criticisms and suggestions. No one can say that he has not been heard. It may be that Parliament in its wisdom will not accept in its entirety any one scheme which may have been put forward, but for my part I shall accept its decision and carry it out loyally, and I hope and trust that all those who have engaged and been interested in this great controversy will similarly endeavour to sink their differences and concentrate their efforts on making the Reforms a success.

"I pass on to a subject which to the people of India as a whole is of even more interest than reforms—the monsoon.

"Since this Council last met, India has passed through a period of grave anxiety, and indeed I do not care to think of what our position would be to-day if the present monsoon had been less satisfactory. As the Council is aware, the monsoon of 1918 was disappointing, and though timely showers improved the rabi crops in some provinces, the year 1918-19 was marked by a failure of crops unprecedented as regards the extent of country affected. Famine, high prices and economic distress have, of course, been the inevitable result, and either famine or scarcity has been declared in parts of Bengal, Bihar and Orissa, United Provinces, Rajputana, Central India, Central Provinces, Bombay, Hyderabad and Madras. Prices of foodgrains too have reached a level never before touched. Much distress has been caused by these high prices, but it is a striking proof of the increased wealth and greater staying power of India that the numbers on relief have been comparatively small. High-water mark was touched in the week ending June 21st, 1919, when 589,535 persons were on relief. In the famine of 1899—1901, I may mention, the maximum numbers on relief in any one week were 6,332,121. Our anxieties have been relieved to some extent by the favourable character of this year's monsoon. The rains, though late in setting in in parts of the country, have recently been abundant, and though it is too early to speak with absolute confidence, the prospects of the kharif crop may fairly be said to be encouraging. The numbers on relief are also decreasing, but prices do not yet show any signs of material reduction, and I am afraid that the prolonged strain must be telling on people with small fixed incomes. A Resolution, however, is to be moved on the subject of high prices, and the Hon'ble Revenue Member will no doubt take the opportunity of explaining the measures we have taken to deal with the situation. I will not take up the time of the Council, therefore, by anticipating what he has to say.

"I think it was a former Finance Member who referred to the Indian budget as a gamble in rain. In addition to his anxiety on the score of the monsoon, the present Finance Member has had to grapple with serious difficulties in the matter of currency and exchange.

"One matter in connection with the latter has been exercising the minds of the Commercial Community, and I have deep sympathy with their anxiety with regard to it. I refer to the continual alteration in the exchange value of the rupee. We equally with them want stability, and it was with the object of obtaining a permanent solution of this problem that the Secretary of State appointed an influential body of experts to advise him. The rupee value had been fixed in May at 1*s.* 8*d.*, and it was our hope that it would be possible to maintain the exchange value at that figure at least until the Committee had made its recommendations. Unfortunately events have proved too strong for us, and the further rise in the price of silver has forced us again to advance the rupee to 1*s.* 10*d.* We thoroughly realise the great handicap to India's foreign trade caused by a feeling of unsettlement regarding the course of exchange, but we hope that the Commercial Community will equally realise that it is impossible for us to coin rupees, the bullion value of which is greater than their face value. I can only leave the matter here and express the hope that the Committee will be able to find a solution of this problem which will be permanent and ensure us a stability in the exchange value of the rupee. It must be remembered that in this matter India is at the mercy of conditions beyond her control. Apart from the rise in the value of silver, the rupee position is affected by the fall in the value of the pound sterling as measured in gold, and these are matters among others which will have to be carefully weighed by the Expert Committee to which the examination of this difficult problem has been referred. I have asked the Hon'ble the Finance Member, who has lately visited Bombay, to visit Calcutta and discuss the situation with the Chamber of Commerce there.

"I think there has been some misunderstanding in regard to the Indian Companies Restriction Act. The present position is that the Act will automatically lapse six months after the date which may be notified as the termination of the war. Licenses are now being given practically as a matter of course, but the fact that applications accompanied by various papers are required causes some inconvenience and delay. We are anxious to abolish, at the earliest date possible, all restrictions introduced during the war which are now not absolutely necessary, and we have therefore decided to anticipate the natural death of this particular restriction by repealing the Act this Session.

"The Labour Problem is now, as you are aware, of almost world-wide importance, and although we have been spared the labour troubles which have disturbed other countries, India has not been left altogether untouched. A number of clauses in the Treaty of Peace concluded at Versailles, as you probably know, relate to labour questions. India, who has the honour of being one of the original members of the League of Nations, is, as such, also an original member of the Permanent Organisation for the Promotion of the International Regulation of labour conditions. This organisation will consist of an International Labour Conference with an International Labour Office as part of the machinery of the League of Nations. It is intended that the first meeting of the Conference should take place at Washington in October, and the various countries will be represented by four delegates each, two representing the Government of the country concerned, one representing employers and one representing employed. We have been asked to select representatives to send to Washington on behalf of India, and I hope shortly to be able to announce their names.

"It is of course of great importance to recognise, as was fully recognised by my Right Hon'ble friend Lord Sinha and by His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner, that the conditions of industrial labour in this country differ wholly from those prevailing in the West. I believe it is largely due to their representations that the draft Convention drawn up at the Peace Conference specifically recognised that the labour conditions which might be settled for Western countries would have to be modified in the case of countries such as India. I will read to you that portion of the articles of the draft Convention which makes this reservation. It runs as follows :—

> 'In framing any recommendation of draft Convention of general application, the Conference shall have due regard to those countries in which climatic conditions, the imperfect development of industrial organisation, or other special circumstances make the industrial conditions substantially different, and shall suggest the modifications, if any, which it considers may be required to meet the case of such countries.'

" I need hardly say that the great diversity of physical conditions affecting employment in India, the lack of education among workers and consequent low standard of comfort and absence of organisation, the usually poor physique of Indian labour, and its inability to concentrate effort over a shorter working period, the preponderating importance of agriculture and the lack of specialisation and skill among industrial workers render it impossible to translate propositions which are accepted in Western countries as natural into terms applicable to India, or to devise any formula which will convert the Indian factors into Western equivalents. We must recognise that any attempt to bring Indian labour conditions into line with those of Western countries by violent legislative changes will be disastrous both to employers and to employed. But, while we recognise this, we believe that there is a quickening consciousness throughout the country generally that the existing state of affairs is unsatisfactory and unworthy of India's political aspirations. We believe that there is now a prospect of progress more rapid, more radical and more substantial than could have been imagined some few years ago. We had, before we knew the terms of the Peace Conference, taken up the consideration of this question as arising out of the remarks made in the Industrial Commission's Report, and have asked Local Governments for their opinions as to what amendments of the law, if any, are necessary either in the direction of the reduction of the hours of labour or in other respects. We are also elaborating means for making the existing agencies for the care of public health, the provision of industrial housing and primary education more effective.

" I pass on to a question closely connected with Indian labour which is greatly exercising public opinion and which has given my Government the most serious anxiety. I refer to the troubles which have arisen in South Africa in connection with the trading rights of Indians in the Transvaal. I need not repeat the history of the recent legislation passed by the Union Parliament. An account of this has been given in a letter from Sir George Barnes to Mr. Gandhi in July last, which has been published in the Press, and you will all be familiar with the main features of the case. I only wish to say that the Government of India have not failed to press the Indian point of view upon His Majesty's Government, and we can claim that we have the full support of the Secretary of State. We have urged that the recent legislation in South Africa is unjustified and is not consonant with the undertaking given by the South African representative at the Imperial War Conference that Lord Sinha's memorandum relating to the rights of Indians in the Transvaal would receive the sympathetic consideration of the Union Government.

" Let me, however, make a plea for calmness and moderation in dealing with this question. We must admit the strength of feeling on the subject in South Africa, and it behoves us to see that our words and actions are not such as may embitter the existing sentiment and make a settlement more difficult.

" I feel too that there is ground for hoping that calmness and moderation will not be wanting in South Africa in dealing with this question, for we know that the late General Botha and General Smuts returned there after discussing fully questions akin to the present one with the distinguished representatives of India whom we sent to the Imperial Conference.

" The Union Government, as you know, are appointing a Commission to examine the whole question, and we have asked that our interests should be represented. We are making arrangements to send a deputation to see that our point of view is thoroughly presented and thoroughly understood. On this deputation, we propose to send Sir Benjamin Robertson, who so successfully conducted a similar mission in 1914. I am sure that you will agree that we could not select a better representative.

"There is another matter relating to the position of Indians overseas, to which I should like to refer, namely, the position of the indentured labourers of Fiji. The main facts are well known to all of you. After the unsatisfactory conditions under which these labourers lived had been brought to the knowledge of the Government of India, all further flow of labour under indenture was stopped, and the Government began to press most strongly for the immediate improvement of the conditions, particularly with regard to housing and hospital accommodation. The Colonial Office in London was convinced, and decided that the improvements demanded by the Government of India must be carried out or the indentures cancelled. This was announced by Sir George Barnes in the debate in this Council last September. How far these improvements have been carried out up to date, we have no very clear information. We know, however, that they have been effected at least in part, and that employers have voluntarily in many cases provided separate quarters for married couples. We have nevertheless thought it right to continue to press for the cancellation of the outstanding indentures.

"We have just recently been informed by the Secretary of State that the Fiji legislature has made a step in the direction we desire by passing a unanimous resolution that all indentures outstanding on 1st August, 1920, should be cancelled from that date, compensation being paid to the employers from the public funds of Fiji. This, however, is not sufficient, and we are pressing again that the cancellation of all indentures should take place by the end of the present year.

"I think that I ought also to inform you that the Fiji Government has appointed a Select Committee which is now considering how effect can best be given to our wishes on the other points at issue.

"Great difficulty has, as you know, existed hitherto with regard to the repatriation of labourers who may wish to return to India from Fiji. We have no knowledge at present how many desire to return; it is very possible that a large number may wish to make Fiji their home as free men, for the climate is good and some Indians who began life as indentured labourers are now men of substance in Fiji. However, we have kept the question of repatriation strongly in mind, and the Secretary of State has at our instance been pressing the Shipping Controller and the Shipping Companies to provide vessels for those who may wish to return to India.

"I have another interesting announcement to make. An unofficial mission from Fiji headed, I understand, by the Bishop of Polynesia, is expected to visit India during the coming cold weather in order to investigate conditions in India, and, if possible, to persuade Indian public opinion to agree to the resumption of free emigration to Fiji under wholesome conditions. I need hardly assure you that the Government and the people of Fiji are really anxious to do what is right, and I think that we ought to listen carefully to what they have got to say. It may be that they will be able to prove to us that Indian labour would benefit from a well-directed scheme of free emigration to Fiji, which has, as I have said above, a healthy climate and is in many ways a country well suited to Indian settlers. If they can show us that our interests coincide, it ought not to be impossible to come to an agreement, but the burden of proof will lie on them, and all I ask you to-day is that, when the mission comes, it should be given a fair hearing.

"I have endeavoured to give Hon'ble Members a résumé of the chief questions which are engaging public attention.

"So much for the past and present, and now what about the future?

"With what I may hope to be the final settlement for the time being of the Reforms problem, it remains for me to indicate the particular problems to which I wish to devote attention.

"I hope in the first place to lay deep and sure the foundations of the new Industrial development. We have been expeditious in dealing with this most important matter. We were able within a short time of the publication of the Industrial Commission Report to circulate to Local Governments our views upon its recommendations, and I despatched Mr. (now Sir Ernest) Low on a tour round the Provinces to elicit their views and discuss any points of difference. By this method we obtained the views of Local Governments early this year, and we formulated our final and considered opinion in a despatch to the Secretary of State in April. Sir Thomas Holland left by the subsequent mail on deputation to discuss the whole question with the Secretary of State, and I have reason to hope that, in the course of the next few weeks, we may have a despatch on the subject from the India Office.

"This will enable us to proceed straightaway with the inauguration of our machinery for the stimulation and development of Indian industries. I think this brief statement of what has occurred should show the importance which we attach to this subject and our intention of pressing forward. It is scarcely necessary for me to dilate on its importance. We wish to see an India self-sufficing in many of the things which at the present moment she is obliged to import from outside; we wish to see her dealing with her own raw products; and we wish to see her youth through this development of her industries utilising their undoubtedly great qualities in fields of enterprise from which they have in the main so far held aloof. But if this policy is to be attained, and mind you, we can only lay the foundations of it in the months to come, we shall want the co-operation of you all. It will be idle for the Government to establish machinery unless there is a general desire and willingness on the part of Indians to help to work it. And that brings me to one more matter in which I hope to see a very real advance. We have had among us during the past two years the distinguished gentlemen who drafted the Calcutta University Commission Report. That Report, though it is confined to the Calcutta University problem, gives us a luminous conspectus of the position of higher education in India. We are making a start at once with its recommendations by the introduction of the Dacca University Bill. This is an old question. Lord Hardinge promised a University to Dacca and I have renewed his pledge. As Hon'ble Members are aware it is a subject in which the Mahomedans of Bengal are deeply interested. I am now giving an earnest of our intentions in the matter by the introduction of a Bill. Between this stage and its consideration at the next Delhi Session there will be ample time for an examination of its provisions by the general public, and we shall of course very carefully consider such criticisms as they may have to make on it. In the matter of legislation affecting the Calcutta University, we hope that by February those interested will have had time to formulate their views. But I would impress this point upon Hon'ble Members. In the appointment of the Commission I was careful to see that its members had the highest educational qualifications to deal with the problem they were asked to examine. And that problem has been investigated solely from the educational standpoint. Their recommendations surely should carry great weight, and we should be slow to depart from them save on good cause shown. The members of the Commission who came from England, to whom we are under the deepest obligation, had the great advantage of the assistance of the Hon'ble Sir Ashutosh Mukerjee, whose zeal in the cause of education is so well known and from whom we may hope to get invaluable assistance in pressing forward the necessary measures; they also had as their colleague Dr. Ziauddin who, though he differed from the majority in certain matters of detail, gave his support to the main principles of the Report. To both these gentlemen as well as to their official colleague, Mr. Hornell, I would offer my grateful appreciation of the work which they have done.

"But this Report, like that of the London University Commission, though based on the conditions of one University, is full of suggestiveness on University problems as a whole. I, therefore, hope that the Universities throughout India will take it into consideration and will on their own initiative examine how far its recommendations may throw light on some of their own problems and suggest amendments of their own machinery. I trust, therefore, that this monumental report will serve as a starting-point for the re-examination of problems in the sphere of higher education throughout India. It will be our privilege to help the Universities in any way we can from the centre, and I hope they will not be slow to invite that help.

"So then, as in the case of the Industrial Commission Report I look to a great awakening in the region of Industrial development, from the Calcutta University Commission Report, I look for great things in the examination and development of our higher education. These two matters are indeed closely interwoven. If Industries are to progress, our higher education must be on sound lines and taken out of its narrow grooves. If higher education is to be broadened, it is to the industrial development that we must look for the openings which are to induce the student to leave his old haunts and adventure himself in fresh fields and pastures new.

"We have come through five terrible years, years full of trouble, years such as the author of our Christian Litany might well have had in mind when he wrote 'From plague, pestilence and famine; from battle and murder and sudden death Good Lord deliver us'. We have come through them however successfully, and the new era of peace has opened for us auspiciously. With the renewal of peace nature is giving us the promise of plenty. The ravaged world will look to us, who have escaped unscathed, for the material with which to rebuild itself.

"Let us then grasp our opportunities with both hands. We can of course spend our time in futile wrangling over the past. We can, if we are unwise, throw away these opportunities by fanning racial bitterness. I hope, however, we shall do none of these things. But let us rather, leaving those things which are behind, reach forward to those things which are before in the sure and certain confidence that success will crown our efforts, if they are devoted with a single eye to our country's good."

STATEMENTS LAID ON THE TABLE.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I lay on the table statements* showing the lists of magazines and journals proscribed from registered libraries by Government. This statement was promised in reply to a question asked by the Hon'ble Mr. Patel on the †5th September, 1918."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked:— 12-7 P.M.

1. "(a) Are Government contemplating legislation to provide for the housing of the working classes employed in industrial establishments, on the lines of the Housing Act lately passed by Parliament so modified in detail as to suit Indian conditions of living and social habits?

Introduction of practical legislation for the housing of the working classes.

(b) If no such legislation is under consideration, will Government be pleased to state when they contemplate taking up this matter?"

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi replied :—

"The question of the housing of the working classes in India including that of necessary legislation in the matter is engaging the serious consideration of the Government of India, and Local Governments will shortly be addressed on the subject."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

Primary and secondary roads in British India.

2. "(a) Are Government aware that in England the mileage of primary and secondary roads is reckoned at 13,000 miles, the cost of maintaining which, according to a statement reported to have been made recently by Sir Eric Geddes in the House of Commons, was £20 million per annum; also, that the secondary roads are five times the length of primary roads?

(b) What is approximately the mileage of primary and secondary roads in British India?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"With reference to part (a) of the Hon'ble Member's question Government are aware that in the course of the debate on the Ministry of Ways and Communications Bill, Sir Eric Geddes stated that £20,000,000 per annum are spent on roads, but he did not specify the length of the roads referred to. Mr. Joynson-Hicks, however, stated on the 26th February 1919 that 152,000 miles of road would come under the control of the Ministry of Ways and Communications. Government have no information as to the relative lengths of primary and secondary roads.

With regard to (b), roads in British India have been classified according to the character of their construction, and are grouped under two main heads as follows :—

	Miles.
Metalled	65,457
Unmetalled	139,805

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

Constitution of a Central Cotton Committee.

3. "Has any action been taken towards the constitution of—

(a) a Central Cotton Committe, or

(b) a Cotton Committee in Bombay, as recommended by the Indian Cotton Committee?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"It will be observed from paragraph 4 of Government of India, Revenue and Agriculture, Resolution on the Cotton Committee's Report, which was published for general information in the supplement to the Gazette of India, dated the 9th August 1919, that it has been decided to give precedence to the proposals in Chapter XIX of the Report for the formation of a Central Cotton Committee, and these proposals are at present under consideration."

Increase in the staff of the Provincial Agricultural Departments for work on Cotton.

4. "What action has been taken by Local Governments to give effect to the recommendations of the Indian Cotton Committee regarding an increase in the staff of the Provincial Agricultural Departments, specially for work on cotton?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

" In the Resolution which I have just cited Local Governments and Administrations have been asked to take up at once the recommendations in the Report regarding the increase in the staff of the Provincial Agricultural Departments for work on cotton in order that the Secretary of State for India may be asked as soon as possible to sanction such further appointments as may be considered necessary. A proposal for the appointment of an additional Economic Botanist has been received from the Government of the United Provinces."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha :—" My Lord, in view of the very lucid and satisfactory statement made by your Excellency in your speech, I withdraw for the present question No. 5.*"

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda asked :—

5. " (a) Is it a fact that a memorial protesting against compulsory acquisition of houses in Simla signed by a large number of the principal house-owners was recently submitted to His Excellency the Viceroy and was transferred to the Punjab Government for disposal ? Acquisition of houses in Simla.

(b) Will Government be pleased to state the prices paid for houses now occupied by Members of the Executive Council, the acreage of each of the said houses, and the rent paid for each during the last ten years ?

(c) What was the amount spent on each of these houses for up-keep during the same period ?

(d) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a letter by 'Veritas' in the Englishman, dated 25th July, 1919, and do Government intend to inquire into the allegations made therein ?

(e) Are Government aware that the compulsory acquisition of houses in Simla has created considerable indignation in the public mind, and has been regarded with alarm by house-owners generally throughout the country ? "

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

" (a) The memorial of the house proprietors of Simla was not transferred to the Punjab Government for disposal, but was returned to the memorialists for re-submission through the Local Government. The memorial was forwarded to the Government of India in July last and orders on it will shortly be issued.

(b) and (c) The statement† placed on the table gives the information asked for in paragraphs (b) and (c) of the Hon'ble Member's question in so far as four of the six houses occupied by Members of the Executive Council are concerned. The houses occupied by the other two Members of the Council are not the property of Government.

(d) Government have seen the letter referred to. They do not consider any inquiry necessary.

(e) Some protests have appeared in the press with regard to the acquisition of houses in Simla, but Government are not aware that there is any general feeling of indignation or alarm on the part of householders throughout the country. "

* 5. Will Government be pleased to state whether any appeal has been received from the Indian National Congress of South Africa or other like organisation regarding the alleged inconveniences and hardships that have for some months past been entailed on Indians there, and whether any fresh representation has been made to the Government of South Africa in respect thereof either directly or through the Secretary of State ?

† Not included in these Proceedings.

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda asked :—

Establishment of an aerial inland mail service in India.

6. "Is it in contemplation to establish an aerial inland mail service in India? Will Government be pleased to make a statement on the matter and place on the table any scheme that may be settled?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"The Government of India have under consideration a scheme for the establishment of an aerial inland mail service in India, but they are unable at present to make any further statement on the subject or to place the scheme on the table."

Case of Babu Kishori Lal Chatterjee at Asansol.

7. "(a) Was Babu Kisori Lal Chatterjee, a Vakil of the Calcutta High Court, prosecuted at the instance of the East Indian Railway at Asansol on a charge of travelling in a compartment reserved for ladies?

(b) Did the Court acquit him and accept his plea that it was a false case, and that he had been forced to vacate an ordinary compartment in a train by some Eurasian Railway servants?

(c) Is it a fact that he complained to the Agent against the said Railway servants, and repeatedly inquired what action had been taken of their conduct, but got no reply beyond an offer to pay his actual out-of-pocket expenses in connection with his prosecution?

(d) Did he then file a suit in the Calcutta High Court claiming damages against the East Indian Railway?

(e) Is it a fact that the Company at first filed a written statement disputing the claim and supporting the said Railway servants, but afterwards at the trial paid the sum of Rs. 250 to the plaintiff as compensation, and in a petition filed in Court 'expressed their sincere regret to the plaintiff for the insult, trouble and inconvenience caused to him by the conduct of the servants and agents of the defendant Company'?

(f) Will Government state what punishments have been inflicted on the said servants and agents of the Railway?"

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied :—

"The Hon'ble Member's question refers to incidents which took place some 18 months ago.

The statements made in (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e) are substantially correct.

As to (f), the Agent reports that the staff concerned were suitably punished by reprimand or transfer."

Report of the Calcutta University Commission.

8. "(a) Has the attention of Government been called to the proceedings of the Senate of the Calcutta University, dated the 21st June last when a resolution was passed complaining that the Hon'ble the Vice-Chancellor and the members of the Senate had not been favoured with copies of the Report of the Calcutta University Commission, while other persons had received such copies?

(b) Do Government propose to make a statement on the matter?"

"The reply to (a) is in the affirmative.

(b) The proceedings of the Senate of the University of Calcutta to which allusion is made by the Hon'ble Member took place some six weeks before the publication of the Report. On account of the size of the Report, the printing of it occupied a long time, and despite all efforts, the Report could not be brought out before August. It was clearly impossible to provide the Senate with copies before publication, firstly, because copies were not available, secondly, because, under standing orders of the Secretary of State, no document of this nature may be made public until the interval has elapsed which is required for its receipt by the Home Government. In the present case the Government of India had, in view of the desirability of publishing the Report in this country at the earliest possible date, made special arrangements with the Secretary of State whereby the Report should be published in India on the date of its shipment. The Secretary of State's sanction to this proposal was received on the 20th June 1919. Shipment was arranged to take place on the 9th August and the Report was published on that day. Further, as it was recognised that the Senate of the University of Calcutta had a peculiar interest in the Report, arrangements were made by the Secretary to the Commission to provide members of the Senate with copies without any delay when publication took place. These arrangements were made before the meeting of the Senate to which the Hon'ble Member alludes.

As regards the statement that other persons had received copies before publication, a certain number of proof copies were sent out in order to facilitate the framing of a distribution list and the introduction of such legislation as might be possible or desirable in September, both of which were urgent matters, and also to a very limited number of persons regarding whom requests had been made that they should see the Report at the earliest possible date. These copies were proof copies, whose correctness could not be guaranteed. For reasons already stated, any wider distribution of them was impossible. "

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—" May I ask a supplementary question, my Lord ? Is it a fact that the 'Madras Mail' published extracts from this report before publication ? "

The President :—" Would you mind repeating that again Mr. Chanda, a little slower ? I am afraid I could not catch what you said."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—" Sorry, my Lord. Is it a fact that the 'Madras Mail' published extracts from this report long before publication ?"

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi :—" It is a fact."

Tone and utterances of Anglo-Indian newspapers.

9. " Is it a fact that there have been constant complaints in the Indian Press and in public meetings as well as by interpellations in Legislative Councils that Government take no notice of the tone and utterances of some of the Anglo-Indian newspapers ? "

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

" Government have seen occasional complaints of the nature referred to by the Honourable Member in the Indian Press, but are not aware that such complaints have been repeated at public meetings or in Provincial Legislative Councils. Government have on more than one occasion intervened when they considered that articles offensive to Indian opinion had been published by Anglo-Indian newspapers."

Resignation of Sir Sankaran Nair.

10. "Will Government be pleased to publish the letter in which the Hon'ble Sir Sankaran Nair tendered resignation of his appointment as a Member of the Executive Council of the Governor General?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied:—

"Government have no present intention of publishing any information as to the circumstances in which Sir Sankaran Nair vacated his office of Member of the Governor General's Council."

Representatives at the Peace celebrations in London.

11. "(a) Is it a fact that representatives from the Indian Defence Force regiments have been selected to be present at the Peace celebrations in London?

(b) Is it a fact that the selection has been confined to the European and Anglo-Indian branch of the Indian Defence Force, while the purely Indian Branch of the Indian Defence Force in Bengal, the Bengal Light Horse and the Calcutta University Corps have been left out altogether?

(c) Will Government be pleased to state the grounds for this racial distinction?

(d) Is it a fact that the Bengal Light Horse is the only mounted unit in the Indian Branch of the Indian Defence Force?"

"(a) Yes.

(b) The answer to the first part is in the negative.

As regards the second part, as only two representatives were allowed for the strength of a battalion and for other units in proportion, and as the representatives should have seen active service, the particular units of the Indian Branch of the Indian Defence Force referred to by the Hon'ble Member were not represented.

(c) No racial distinction was made in selecting representatives. This is evident from the fact that the contingent consisted of about 1,500 Indian officers and men of the Indian Army and Imperial Service Troops, as against some 320 British officers and men.

(d) Yes. The Bengal Light Horse is, as the Hon'ble Member states, the only mounted unit in the Indian Branch of the Indian Defence Force. Its strength, however, is only 76."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda asked:—

Speech delivered by Sir Reginald Craddock in connection with the Rowlatt Act.

12. "(a) Has the attention of Government been called to the following passages in a speech delivered by Sir Reginald Craddock at a meeting of the Burma Legislative Council—

'(1) The action of Indian political leaders in opposing the Rowlatt Act Bill and in encouraging the storm of opposition has been the most grievous blunder in the history of Indian political life. The action of these leaders constitutes the greatest encouragement to the anarchical movement that it has ever received.

(2) The liberty for which they (the Indian Press) are crying out is the liberty of the secret conspirator to pursue his nefarious career, the liberty to spoil the lives of hundreds of promising young men, the liberty to subject the liberty of honest and peaceful people to the ruthless decrees of criminal mischief-makers. This is the kind of liberty for which Mr Gandhi fasts and prays.'

(b) Do Government propose to consider the propriety of calling upon Presidents of Provincial Legislative Councils to exercise greater restraint in their utterances?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

" The Government of India have seen the report of the speech and do not propose to take any action in the matter."

Sir Rabindra Nath Tagore

13. " (a) Is it a fact that Sir Rabindra Nath Tagore has returned the insignia of Knighthood which was conferred on him begging to be relieved of the title ?

(b) Will Government be pleased to place on the table the letter in which he gives his reasons for his action and any reply which Government may have sent him ?

(c) What action do Government propose to take on his letter ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

" (a) Sir Rabindra Nath Tagore wrote a letter to His Excellency the Viceroy asking to be relieved of the title of Knighthood. He did not return any insignia because there are no insignia to return.

(b) As Sir Rabindra Nath Tagore's letter was published in the press, Government do not consider it necessary to lay a copy on the table. In reply to his letter he was informed that His Excellency the Viceroy was unable himself to relieve him of his title, and that, in the circumstances of the case, His Excellency did not propose to make any recommendation on the subject to His Majesty the King-Emperor. The Secretary of State has also intimated that he does not propose to make any recommendation, and Sir Rabindra Nath Tagore has been so informed."

Security and forfeiture under the Press Act in the case of Anglo-Indian newspapers.

14. " In how many cases since the Indian Press Act, 1910, was passed has there been any (a) security taken, and (b) forfeiture of security, in respect of any Anglo-Indian newspaper, that is any newspaper owned or conducted by persons other than Indians ?"

" Security has been taken in respect of newspapers owned or conducted by persons other than Indians on eight occasions. The security has been forfeited in two cases."

Suspension of sentence of persons convicted b Courts Martial.

15. " (a) Is it a fact that the Privy Council has granted leave to appeal to 21 persons convicted by Courts Martial at Lahore in connection with disturbances at Amritsar on the 10th April ?

(b) Do Government intend to consider the question of suspending the sentences passed in analogous cases tried by the Courts Martial pending the decision of the Privy Council ?"

" (a) The answer is in the affirmative.

(b) The death sentences passed on five of the convicts whose appeals have been admitted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have of course been suspended. None of the summary courts appointed by the General Officer Commanding were empowered to pass sentences of more than two years' imprisonment, and therefore in their case the question of suspending death sentences does not arise. Sentences of imprisonment are not being suspended pending the result of an appeal. But convicts sentenced by the commissions to transportation are for the present being retained in jails in India. "

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda asked :—

Appointment of Martial Law Commissions in the Punjab, and number of trials.

16. " (a) What is the number of Martial Law Commissions lately appointed in the Punjab ?

(b) What is the total number of cases and of individuals tried by such Commissions ?

(c) Was any female accused tried by them ?

(d) How many of such individuals, male and female, were convicted and acquitted respectively ?

(e) Of those convicted, how many have been sentenced to death, how many to transportation for life, and how many to imprisonment from one year upwards ?

(f) How many such sentences have been commuted ?"

(b) 114 cases and 852 individuals.

(c) Yes—one.

(d) 580 males and 1 female were convicted and 271 males were acquitted.

(e) 108 persons were sentenced to death, 265 to transportation for life and 183 to imprisonment from one year upwards. The figure of 183 includes two persons sentenced to transportation, one for 14 years and one for 10.

(f) In 488 cases sentences have been commuted or reductions made. Of the 108 death sentences, 28 were commuted to transportation for life, 23 to imprisonment for ten years, 13 to seven years and 21 to less than seven years. In the case of sentences of transportation for life, 40 were reduced to sentences of more than five years, 48 to five years and 164 to less than five years. Five persons were released. Other sentences of transportation or imprisonment were reduced as follows :—12 to sentences of three to five years, 90 to sentences of two years, 35 to sentences of less than two years. There are a few cases pending in which no final orders have been passed by the Government of the Punjab pending medical reports."

Timing of the Chittagong Mail Train between Goalundo and Calcutta.

17. " (a) Is it a fact that the timing of the Chittagong mail train between Goalundo and Calcutta before the war was less than five hours and that now it is nearly six hours ?

(b) Will steps be taken to accelerate the train ? "

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied :—

"(a) The time occupied by the Chittagong Mail between Calcutta and Goalundo in July 1914, i.e., previous to the war, was 5 hours 21 minutes in one direction, and 5 hours 42 minutes in the other. In July 1919, it was 5 hours 50 minutes and 5 hours 35 minutes, respectively.

(b) In the new Time-table from 1st September, the time has been curtaild to 5 hours 26 minutes in the up and 5 hours 16 minutes in the down irection."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya asked :—

Judgments passed by Martial Law Commissions.

18. "Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of every judgment passed by the Martial Law Commissions in the Punjab during the last ive months, and of every order passed by the Magistrates, specially empowered o deal summarily with cases alleged to have been connected with the recent isturbances in the Punjab ?"

"Government are not prepared to lay copies of the judgments asked for on the table, as they do not consider that any useful purpose would be served by doing so. Copies of the judgments can presumably be obtained in the ordinary way on application to the proper authority and on payment of the usual fees."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"May I ask a supplementary question ? Is the Government aware that there has been great delay in granting copies of judgments to persons who intended to appeal to the Privy Council ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"The Government of India has no information on this point."

Orders, proclamations, etc., by the Administrator of Martial Law in the Punjab.

19. "Will Government be pleased to lay on the table copies of all orders, proclamations, posters, notifications and notices issued during the recent disturbances (i) by the Administrators of Martial Law in the Punjab in their respective areas, (ii) by Civil Authorities in the same areas during the operation of Martial Law, and (iii) by Civil Authorities after the withdrawal of Martial Law notifying that certain acts by the civil population will be treated as offences and dealt with by military officers ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"Copies of the papers will be supplied to the Committee of Inquiry. The Government of India do not propose to lay copies on the table."

The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal asked :—

Public Works reorganisation Committee.

20. "(a) Have the Government of India consulted the Local Governments as regards the recommendations made by the Public Works Reorganisation Committee ?

(b) If the answer to (a) be in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to state whether the opinions of the Local Governments have been received and what action, if any, has so far been taken on them ?"

"(a) The reply is in the affirmative.

(b) The opinions of certain Local Governments have not yet been received, and consequently no action has yet been taken."

THE POISONS BILL.

12-21 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, I move that the Bill to consolidate and amend the law regulating the importation, possession and sale of poisons throughout British India be taken into consideration. When I introduced this Bill into Council at the last Session two Hon'ble Members pressed me to defer further consideration of it until it had been published in the local official gazettes and the public had been afforded an opportunity of criticising it. I accepted that recommendation although it received very little support from Hon'ble Members. Since then the Bill has been published in the local official gazettes; the Government of India have received no criticisms, and no amendments have been suggested."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I move that the Bill be passed."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE PROVINCIAL INSOLVENCY (AMENDMENT) BILL.

12-22 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—"My Lord, I beg to move that the Hon'ble Mr. Mountford and the Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal be added to the Select Committee appointed to report on the Bill further to amend the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1907, vice Mr. Kincaid and Pandit Bishan Dutt Shukul, who are no longer Members of this Council."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE SEA CUSTOMS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

12-23 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi :—"My Lord, I have the honour to move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Sea Customs Act of 1878. As explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, the object of the proposed enactment is to supplement provincial legislation for the prevention of adulteration of food by empowering maritime authorities to take action calculated to prevent the importation into this country of adulterated food and drugs by sea.

"My Lord, it is well recognised that the consumption of adulterated food and drugs may not only be the cause of general physical deterioration, but may also be productive of disease. The Government of India, being conscious of their duty as the guardians of public health, consulted Local Governments as far back as 1886 on the desirability of undertaking legislation to prevent the sale of adulterated articles of food. The majority of Local Governments, however, being of opinion that no action in that direction was needed, the matter was dropped at that time. But, subsequent information having made it clear that the evil in question was growing in magnitude in various parts of this country, the Government of India again addressed the Local Governments in 1911 on this subject, with the result that earnest efforts have already been made in the various provinces to check this growing evil, and provincial legislation has been carried through to prevent the sale of adulterated food and drugs. Your Excellency's Government now desire to supplement the action taken in the provinces by giving Customs authorities in our ports certain powers calculated to prevent the importation of adulterated drugs and articles of food by sea.

"My Lord, section 195 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, authorises the Customs-collector, on the entry or clearance of any goods, or at any time while such goods are being passed through the custom-house, to take samples of such goods, for examination or for ascertaining the value thereof on which duties are payable, or for any other necessary purpose. The Bill which I am now about to introduce proposes to add a clause to this section empowering the Customs-collector, in the case of goods which consist of drugs or articles intended for consumption as food, and in respect of which the taking of samples may have been authorised by general or special order of Local Government for the purposes in view, to take, in like circumstances, samples thereof for submission to and examination by such officer of Government or other local authority as may be specified in such order. In order to avoid unnecessary hardship, it is further provided that the Customs-collector shall pay to the owner the real value of all such samples.

"Hon'ble Members will notice that the provisions of the proposed enactment involve no detention of goods by the Customs officer, nor do they authorise him to take samples without actual payment. The samples thus taken by the Customs officers will be forwarded to the officer designated in the order of the Local Government, and will thus come into the hands of Health officers for analysis and examination. The local authorities will, in this manner, be enabled, in case the articles of which the samples have thus been secured are adulterated, to take action under the various Provincial Acts already in operation to prevent the sale of adulterated food and drugs. The Bill, it will thus be seen, while constituting a further step in the right direction, is perfectly innocuous. Your Excellency's Government consider it advisable to proceed very cautiously in this matter; and Hon'ble Members will, I feel sure, sympathise with this attitude of the Government of India.

"In conclusion, I may mention that maritime Local Governments have been consulted by us, and the proposed measure has their unanimous approval."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi :—"I now beg to introduce the Bill, and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE PROVIDENT FUNDS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi :—"My Lord, I rise to move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Indian Provident Funds Act, 1897. The object which the proposed enactment has in view is so benevolent and the advantages resulting therefrom to a class of persons deserving of special 12-30 P.M. consideration are so obvious that, in asking for leave to introduce the Bill, I need not detain the Council for long.

"My Lord, the question of making some provision for the old age of teachers in non-pensionable service has been engaging the attention of Government for several years past. Early in 1914, the Government of India convened a small informal Committee to discuss the matter; and, as a result of its deliberations, a draft scheme for the establishment of a Provident Fund was drawn up and circulated to Local Governments and Administrations for opinion. The idea met with general acceptance and, after obtaining the approval of the Secretary of State, this Government has authorised Local Governments and Administrations to establish Provident Funds for teachers in non-pensionable service at their own discretion on prescribed lines.

"But, my Lord, section 4 of the Provident Funds Act, 1897, extends protection to subscribers to the Government Provident Fund as defined in section 2 (2) of that Act, alone, by exempting their deposits from attachment under a decree or order of a Court of justice in respect of any debt or liability incurred by them. The desirability of extending similar protection to subscribers to the Provident Funds which may now be established for the benefit of teachers in non-pensionable services, whether public or private, is self-evident. For the realisation of the end in view, it is now proposed to amend the definition of the phrase 'Government Provident Fund' so as to include Provident Funds for teachers in educational institutions within its scope, and thus make the provisions of the Act applicable to this class. The proposed enactment is obviously non-controversial and will, I am sure, meet with general approval. It will be particularly a source of great benefit to those teachers who are employed in educational institutions maintained by private associations or individuals.

"My Lord, the terms of the proposed Provident Fund for teachers are being communicated to Local Governments, and will, it is hoped, be made public at an early date. They allow of sufficient latitude to suit the different conditions prevailing in different provinces and will, we are confident, be generally acceptable. Meanwhile, Hon'ble Members will recognise the need for protection to subscribers belonging to the teaching profession, which the proposed enactment is intended to satisfy. With these observations I commend the motion for the acceptance of this Council."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi:—"My Lord, I now beg to introduce the Bill, and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE INDIAN CENSUS BILL.

12-34 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi:—"My Lord, I beg to move for leave to introduce a Bill to provide for certain matters in connection with the taking of census of British India during the year 1921.

"This, my Lord, is the last of the three non-contentious Bills which it is my good fortune to move in this first meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council held after my assumption of office as Education Member. With your Excellency's permission, I should like to offer my grateful thanks to your Excellency for the very gracious and kind welcome which your Excellency was pleased to accord to me this morning. It has, for a long time, been the custom in India, in common with all civilised countries, to take a census of our population at intervals of ten years. The advantages of taking a census of the Indian population, from local as well as international points of view, are well recognised by the educated section of the Indian community, and were clearly and succinctly summarised by Sir Herbert Risley in his speech in this Council when introducing the Census Bill of 1910. Whatever may have been the misgivings and apprehensions in the minds of the ignorant and illiterate sections of our population when the first Census Bill was introduced in this country, they have now become familiar with the innocent nature of these operations. Under these circumstances, it is unnecessary for me to enter into a discussion either of the advantages of taking a census of our population or of justification for taking the necessary powers for holding the next decennial census which falls due in the Spring of 1921.

"My Lord, the Bill which I am about to introduce reproduces the provisions of the Act of 1910 with the necessary verbal alterations. Clause 1 gives the short title and extent of the proposed Act; clauses 2-5 provide for the appointment of census officers and other persons liable to give assistance at the requisition of the District Magistrate; clauses 6-9 describe the powers of census officers in connection with census operations and obligations of persons to give the information asked for, as well as to allow certain acts to be performed; clause 10 provides penalties for the non-performance of obligations created by the Act; and clause 11 deals with jurisdiction for entertaining prosecutions under the Act. Clauses 12-14 deal with certain privileges attached to census records, temporary suspension of local enactments and rules as to mode of taking census in municipalities and power in regard to expenses. Lastly, clause 15 empowers the Governor General in Council to make rules for carrying out the purposes of the proposed enactment.

"The Bill, as I have said, is non-contentious in its character, and I trust the motion now before the Council will meet with unanimous acceptance."

The Hon'ble Nawab Saiyed Nawab Ali Chaudhri:—"My Lord, the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi, who has this day taken his seat in your Excellency's Legislative Council for the first time and to whom I take this opportunity of according a cordial welcome, has introduced a Bill to provide for certain matters in connection with the taking of Census. This has apparently been done with the object of facilitating the next decennial census which will take place in the year 1921. If that be so, the Bill has not come up before your Excellency a day too soon. While supporting the principle underlying the Bill generally, I beg to suggest that in the coming census, steps should be taken to define the various communities that inhabit India. My object in making this suggestion is to avoid the chances of amalgamating one community with another, and to preserve their distinctive characteristics. We want to know who is who. A group of men without any particular bundle of religious ideas, sufficient to identify them with any recognised religion of the world, cannot reasonably be classified as belonging to a particular religious community. Nor can a man who professes one religion be classed as belonging to another. I may be permitted to cite an instance in point. Some aboriginal tribes and people who are never permitted to enter Hindu temples have been wrongly classed as Hindus. This, my Lord, should be put a stop to. Each religious community should clearly be defined in the rules to be framed under clause 15. Hon'ble Members will, I trust, realise that it is not my object to wound the religious susceptibilities of other communities. I only want to see it enacted that each community is defined strictly in accordance with religion. With these few observations, I beg to support the Bill." 12-37 P.M.

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"My Lord, as the youngest member of your Excellency's Council, I would very much have 12-40 P.M. preferred to hold my peace to-day and not take part in these deliberations, especially as the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi announced that the Census Bill he was introducing was a non-contentious measure. If I rise now to say a few words with your Excellency's leave, it is first to congratulate my esteemed friend Mr. Shafi on his appointment as an Ordinary Member of your Excellency's Council, and, secondly, to join issue on some of the points on which the Hon'ble Nawab, Nawab Ali Chaudhri, has just spoken. He has raised, in my opinion, questions of large and serious import, and questions which, I fear, will rouse great public feeling in the country. The census results are not intended to support any political propaganda. I have always regarded the census as one of the most beneficent measures that British rule has introduced into this country; it is a measure of great civilizing influence, as it tends to place before the Government and the public facts and figures of an unimpeachable character, obtained through the census operations, which are of great value in the work of administration. But these census results, my Lord, are not intended for the purpose of pandering to the political feelings and sentiments of any particular community.

"Now the question raised by the last speaker is not only highly controversial but unfeasible, as it is clearly not for the Census officer to define who is a Hindu and who is not a Hindu or a Mussalman or not a Mussalman. I remember reading many years ago the late Sir Denzil Ibbetson's monumental Report of the Punjab Census of 1881, where, describing the Muhammadans of the Eastern part of the Province, he says that these Muhammadans were converted from Hinduism observing the feasts of both religions but the fasts of neither, and he goes on to say that these Muhammadans may be classed either as Hindus or as Muhammadans. Supposing a bigoted Hindu took up this matter and said to the Census officer that these Muhammadans should be classed as Hindus, that would open up a very controversial question. At the present moment we are eagerly looking forward to the Reforms, those beneficent measures of advancement, looking to the solidarity of this great country, and I think the question my friend raises will be very detrimental to progress. I therefore hope the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi will take steps to see that no efforts are made to introduce this question of whether a particular tribe or community, by worshipping God in its own way, forfeits its right to call itself Hindu or Muhammadan just as it may care to designate itself. With these few observations I shall take my seat."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi :—"My Lord, I now beg to introduce the Bill, and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English, and in the local official Gazettes in English and in such other languages as the Local Governments think fit."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE CALCUTTA HIGH COURT (JURISDICTIONAL LIMITS) BILL.

12-43 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, I move for leave to introduce a Bill to declare and prescribe the limits of the ordinary original civil jurisdiction of the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal. The reasons for this Bill are fully explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, and I do not think I need detain the Council for any length of time over the motion. The boundary of the ordinary original civil jurisdiction of the Calcutta High Court was first laid down in a Proclamation of 1794. Under the Letters Patent His Excellency's Legislative Council has, however, power to alter these boundaries so demarcated. The metes and posts by which these limits were demarcated in 1794 are now not traceable, although in 1849, I believe, an attempt was made to ascertain their position. After the survey of Calcutta in 1912, the Government of Bengal addressed the High Court suggesting that the boundaries should be accurately demarcated, because this was obviously a matter of great importance to litigants. The High Court agreed, and there was a careful inquiry by the Director of Surveys and the Registrar of the High Court. They laid down a boundary which followed, as far as possible, the old limits described by the Proclamation of 1794. The demarcation was accepted by the High Court, and it is proposed now to enact that that boundary shall be fixed by legislation. The Schedule to the Bill is extraordinarily long, and I do not think I should do the Council a kindness if I attempted to read it; it extends to some four pages of very dull matter. I ask now only for leave to introduce the Bill. I hope, on a future occasion, if it meets with the approval of this Council, to move that it be further considered."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—" My Lord, I introduce the Bill, and move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE INDIAN NATURALIZATION (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—" My Lord, I move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Indian Naturalization Act, 1852. Hon'ble Members of this Council are probably aware that there is in India, in addition to the Imperial Act, a local Naturalization Act in force which empowers the authorities in this country to grant certificates of naturalization which have effect within British India. This is an Act which was passed in 1852 long before the present British Naturalization and Status of Aliens Act was passed. Under this local Act we have power to withdraw a certificate of naturalization, only if it is proved that the person who secured it was guilty of false statements in his application. Both in England and in this country difficulty has been experienced since the beginning of the war, in regard to a number of persons who have obtained certificates of naturalization, and have subsequently proved themselves disloyal or in other ways unworthy of the privileges of a British subject. The consequence was that the English Naturalization Act was amended in 1918 to provide for cancellation of certificates in certain cases when such a course was obviously necessary. We propose now to enact a similar measure in this country. The cases in which we propose to take power to withdraw a certificate of naturalization are set out in the Bill. They are cases in which a naturalized subject has engaged in unlawful trade with the enemy during any war, or within five years of the date of the issue of the certificate has been sentenced by a Criminal Court to transportation or penal servitude, or imprisonment for a term of not less than 12 months, or was not of good character when the certificate was issued, or where he has been resident out of the King's dominions for a period of over seven years, after the issue of a certificate save in certain reasonable circumstances set out in the clause, or, lastly, when he remains according to the law of another country a subject of a State at war with His Majesty. Before the certificate is withdrawn in any case an inquiry will be made by a competent authority which will have 12-45 P.M.

power to summon and enforce the attendance of witnesses. The effect of withdrawing a certificate, under the proposed law, is that the man will from that date on be deemed to be an alien, there follow certain provisions in clause 11 (b) which I need not refer to further at present, dealing with the status of the wife and minor children of a man whose certificate is withdrawn. All I ask at present is for leave to introduce this Bill into this Council, and on a subsequent date, if it meets with approval, I propose to ask the Council further to consider it."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" My Lord, I beg to introduce the Bill, and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE LAND ACQUISITION (AMENDMENT) BILL.

12-50 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant :—" My Lord, I move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Land Acquisition Act, 1894. The object of the Bill, as explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, is to secure to Co-operative Societies and to charitable and other societies registered under Act XXI of 1860 the same facilities as companies registered under the Indian Companies Act, 1882, for acquiring land under the Land Acquisition Act. There is no distinction in principle between these two classes of societies and corporations registered under the Indian Companies Act. The reason why the Land Acquisition Act does not apply to Co-operative Societies is mainly historical, as that Act was passed ten years before the first Co-operative Societies Act of 1904. As regards societies registered under Act XXI of 1860, there has been a good deal of difference of opinion among the legal authorities on the question whether they come under the Land Acquisition Act or not, and in some cases they have been allowed by Local Governments to acquire land under the Act. The opinion which now holds the field, namely, that of Lord Sinha when Advocate-General, Bengal, is to the effect that neither societies registered under Act XXI of 1860 nor Co-operative Societies registered under Act II of 1912 are companies within the meaning of section 3, clause (e) of the Land Acquisition Act.

" The operations of Co-operative Societies are extending and they are beginning to take up enterprises which are useful to the general public, such as seed farms, quite apart from the benefit of the individual members. Similarly, Act XXI of 1860 is frequently used for the registration of societies whose main object is a public one, for instance, education and the maintenance of public reading rooms and libraries. In both these cases it appears reasonable that the societies should be given the same facilities as companies for the acquisition of land. They will of course be subject to the same limitations as companies under the provisions of Part VII of the Act. Thus under section 40 they will have to satisfy the Local Government after due inquiry that the work for which they require land is likely to prove useful to the public, and under section 41 they will have to specify the terms on which the public shall be entitled to use the work. If they satisfy these and the other prescribed conditions, there seems to be no reason why the State should not assist them to acquire land.

" With these remarks, I beg to move for leave to introduce the Bill."

The Hon'ble Nawab Saiyed Nawab Ali Chaudhri:—"My Lord, I beg leave to offer only one remark in connection with the Bill for which a motion for leave to introduce has been made by the Hon'ble Mr. Mant to amend the Land Acquisition Act of 1894. While welcoming the Bill, may I suggest to your Excellency at this stage that it may be amended in such a manner as would exclude from its operation mosques, temples and other sacred places which are held in esteem and reverence by the people, both Hindus and Muhammadans. I hope, my Lord, I do not appeal to your Excellency in vain." 12-54 P.M.

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant:—"My Lord, I now beg to introduce the Bill, and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English." 12-55 P.M.

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE REPEALING AND AMENDING BILL.

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, I have the honour to move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend certain enactments and to repeal certain other enactments. This is one of the usual Repealing and Amending Acts which are introduced in this Council from time to time. There are a great number of small provisions in it all of which are explained in the margin, and if Hon'ble Members have any difficulty with regard to any particular provision I shall be very glad if they would see me about it. There will be plenty of opportunities for this before the Bill is taken up in Council. At this stage I merely move for leave to introduce the Bill." 12-56 P.M.

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, I now beg to introduce the Bill, and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE CHARITABLE AND RELIGIOUS TRUSTS BILL.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I move for leave to introduce a Bill to provide more effectual control over the administration of Charitable and Religious Trusts. In making the motion, I shall have to explain, as shortly as I can, the position of Government in regard to these endowments. Prior to 1863, the Executive Governments of Madras and Bengal, which was then a much larger province than it is now, exercised considerable direct control over many charitable and religious endowments. In 1833, the wisdom of this intermeddling with religious matters by the executive authorities was re-examined and discussed and, finally, in 1863, an Act was passed, Act XX of 1863, which divested Government officers of all control over the particular endowments which were subject to their management, and transferred all those endowments to Committees which were entirely non-official. From that time onwards attempts have been constantly made to secure the reconsideration by Government of the deliberate policy of non-intervention which it then adopted. There has been voluminous noting, correspondence with Local Governments and with the Secretary of State, and 12-57 P.M.

much speaking; various Bills have also been introduced by private Members with the same object in the Imperial and Provincial Councils, but the Government of India have remained steadfast and immoveable, always abiding by the policy which they had set before them of abstaining from any intermeddling with religious matters; the reasons for this policy are as well set out, I think, by Sir Charles Aitchison in a Minute of his in 1880 as anywhere else. He said in the first place that any change from this involved a reversal of a long-established and considered policy. Further, that such a change was contrary to the principle of Her Majesty's Proclamation, which runs as follows:—

> 'We do strictly charge and enjoin those who might be in authority under us that they do abstain from all interference with religious beliefs or worship of any of our subjects on pain of our highest displeasure.'

"He further argued that the interference of Government in these matters was distasteful to the public, and any renewal of or attempt to renew the previous policy would evoke religious opposition and give rise to political trouble. And there were reasons for this contention for, as far back as 1844, it was notorious that the practice of interference with Hindu and Muhammadan religious trusts was extremely distasteful to many. He also pointed out with great cogency that the previous policy under the regulations had thrown upon officers of Government a duty which they could not effectually perform. It was far too heavy a task for any officer of Government in addition to his ordinary duty. Moreover, experience gained during the period prior to 1863 proved that that was true.

"Finally, he said that the management of Hindu and Muhammadan trusts of this character was a serious burden on the religious conscience of many Government officers. I do not know how far that applies now, but I can quite understand the force of this argument in the case of particular individuals. In 1887, there was another attempt made to induce Government to reconsider their policy; but it was again unsuccessful, and it was suggested that the duty of Government was not to look after these trusts and see that the intentions of those who gave money on trust were carried out, but merely to provide laws for all trusts and Courts which could enforce the laws. Lord Macdonnel in the same note, I think, emphasised the danger of any interference with religious questions, and added that 'history teaches us that the clergy of all denominations and creeds are particularly tenacious of their worldly possessions, and attempts to control and secularize ecclesiastical property are resisted always as an attack on religion itself'; there is in my judgment considerable force in that objection. For, in 1908, when Sir Rash Behari Ghosh brought forward his Bill, which was really a simple, though useful measure,—I think some Members of this Council will remember it—it evoked a most extraordinary amount of opposition from certain classes of the public, many of whom resided in the province to which I belong. It was also suggested that those who urged Government to take action in the direction of taking over the management of these trusts really did so with the idea of forcing on Government a very unpopular duty which they themselves were not willing to undertake for fear of religious odium. During this period, indeed from 1878 onwards, a large number of Bills on this subject were put forward, but I do not think I need waste the time of the Council by referring to them; they are specified in the Statement of Objects and Reasons. If, however, any Hon'ble Member is anxious to have further information regarding them, I shall be very glad to furnish him with copies. I think we have also a pamphlet which explains the whole situation pretty clearly. Well, in 1913, there was a further examination of this question; it was raised by various authorities when I was in the Legislative Department, and I remember well that the Hon'ble Member under whom I served, Sir Ali Imam, pressed what I may call the views of the advanced Indian very strongly indeed. He urged that there was a great feeling among progressive Indians, educated Indians, on this subject, that it was notorious that large numbers of these endowments were mismanaged, funds were misapplied, and that if these moneys were really put to the uses for which they were intended, the greatest benefits to the community might ensue. Finally, after prolonged discussions we addressed the Secretary of State, and it was decided to have a conference of officials and non-officials to examine the question. I think possibly some Hon'ble Members who are here to-day attended that conference ; the general view of that conference was that it was desirable to make some change in the policy of Government. At the same time direct interference of the Government with these religious endowments did not, I think, commend itself to many, and it was pointed out by, I think, Dr. Sarbadhikari—I am not sure, however, if I am correct on this point—that the unpopularity of the old regulations was due to the fact that the executive officers of Government had powers of directly interfering with religious endowments which was intolerable to many Hindus and Muhammadans. The officials who attended that conference sounded a note of warning; they feared that any change in policy might provoke opposition and even inflame religious feeling of the depths of which many were unaware. It was also felt, I think, by some that orthodox opinion was not very fully represented at the conference, though it is orthodox opinion that feels most deeply and very sincerely on these matters. Finally, after prolonged consideration, the Government of India again addressed the Secretary of State, and the present Bill is the result. It will be seen that it does not confer any power on the executive authorities of Government at all. It is intended mainly to facilitate the obtaining of information and of audit of accounts of these trusts through the agency of the civil Courts. I do not want to take the Council through the Bill at any length at this stage. I will deal with it as shortly as I can. If Members will look at clause 2, they will see that it gives power to any person interested in charitable or religious trusts to apply to the local District Judge for an order either directing the trustee to furnish particulars about the trust, or directing that the accounts of the trust shall be audited. Then, clause 4 prescribes the procedure in dealing with such applications. It will be noticed that there is a proviso by which the Court is precluded from dealing with any question of title between the petitioner and any person claiming title adversely to the trust or any question as to the existence or extent of the trust. Well, it has been pointed out very cogently by my learned colleague the Law Member—he will pardon me for quoting him—that this may be a serious bar to the effectual use of this Bill. Any trustee may come forward at any time and say—'Oh, this is not a public charitable and religious trust at all' and if the Court grants the petition it will really be trying a question of title as between the trustee and the petitioner. In this way a dishonest trustee might defeat the whole object of the clause. On the other hand, there are obvious objections to giving the Court power to deal with questions of title in a summary inquiry, so that the subject is really one of great difficulty. The Hon'ble the Law Member suggested that it might be possible to provide that when it is denied that the property is held in trust for a religious or charitable purpose, the Court should be authorised to proceed upon a prima facie case of a trust being made out, subject to the trustee's right to have the proceedings stayed on undertaking to file a suit within a prescribed time. I do not know whether this proposal will commend itself to Members of this Council, but it is a suggestion to which I shall certainly draw the attention of Local Governments if the present motion is passed and this Bill is referred to them for opinion. We must find some way in which the remedy we propose is made reasonably effectual and at the same time is not dangerous. The next clause of the Bill is, as it were, a corresponding clause for the benefit of the trustee. As the Bill gives the persons interested in a trust power to apply to the Court for an order enabling them to secure information about the trust, so it gives the trustee power to go to the Court for advice on any particular point on which he is in doubt, and if he likes to take that advice then the Bill absolves him from liability for breach of trust. That, I think, is based on a provision of the English law. Clause 7 deals with the costs of such application. Clause 8 is a saving clause, specifying trusts to which it is not necessary to apply the Act.

"Clause 9 is more important. We know that in many cases suits are not brought against trustees of charitable and religious trusts, although there are very good grounds for doing so, because of the expense and delay involved. The public spirit of private individuals will carry them to a certain point, but they are not prepared to spend large sums of money or to incur grave liabilities for the costs of the defendant in the event of a suit against a trustee being dismissed. Therefore, we have proposed here that in a suit for removal of a trustee of an endowment of this character if there is a bona fide case, and it is thought necessary in the public interest, the Court should have power on the application of the plaintiff to make an order directing the defendant to deposit costs. This course will be followed if the Court thinks the case is prima facie a good one and that such an arrangement is to the public interest. Moneys so deposited may be made over to the plaintiff by the Court subject to his furnishing security if such a course is thought necessary. I do not wish to detain the Council any further at present in discussing details of the Bill, as they will have ample time to examine the provisions of the Bill later, but the sketch I have given will enable them to understand what the main provisions are. We do not desire any interference with the management of these trusts by Government or by any executive authority; that is not the intention of this Bill, but we seek to facilitate action by those interested in the administration of these endowments through the civil Courts. The Bill deals with a subject of great delicacy, and the Government have put it forward with considerable diffidence and hesitation. I have explained to the Council that for many years we have refrained from taking action; it is indeed only owing to pressure from educated public opinion in this country that the present change in policy is proposed. The Government of India have no cast-iron views on the question or on the merits of the Bill at all. If it is not favourably received by public opinion, we shall be prepared to withdraw it, and then on those who press us to do so will rest the responsibility for that action. I may say, however, that this Bill is the product of very careful consultation between officials and non-officials. We do not say that what we have put forward is necessarily the best solution of the difficulty, but it is the best way that we can see at present of securing the object in view. We are quite prepared to amend the Bill in any respect that may commend itself to the general public and which we think consistent with our general policy. I myself hope very much that the Bill will commend itself to the Council, because I have for many years been working on the subject, and I have a very strong personal feeling as to the benefits that will accrue from a better administration of these charitable trusts.

"The Bill being an Imperial Bill is limited in scope because different provinces have advanced to different degrees in this matter. Some provinces probably are ripe for further measures of control. We have had before us proposals for the registration of trusts, for the publication of accounts and the obligatory audit thereof; also for limiting the period of office of those in charge of these endowments and for the creation of new schemes of management, and so on. The Government of India, once this Bill is passed, are prepared to allow Provincial Governments and Legislative Councils to proceed as far as they think fit on these lines subject to certain definite limitations and if orthodox opinion is adequately consulted. I cannot say that they would approve of any direct interference by Government in this management, but, subject to that, I think that we are prepared according to the last instructions that have been received from the Secretary of State and the last discussions in this country, to approve provincial measures which confer much greater power of control over these endowments. We seek to limit legislation in this Council to the point which I have already explained.

"My Lord, I do not think that there is anything else for me to say in regard to this measure at present. It is not our intention to pass it in the present Session, but to publish it in the Gazette of India and in the local official Gazettes; this will allow of its being fully ventilated before Government take any further action."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I beg to introduce the Bill, and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto be published in the Gazette of India in English and in the local official Gazettes in English and in such other languages as the Local Governments think fit." 1-16 P.M.

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Council then adjourned to Wednesday, the 10th September, 1919, at 11 A.M.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE INDIAN LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL ASSEMBLED UNDER THE PROVISIONS OF THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT, 1915.

(5 & 6 Geo. V, Ch. 61.)

The Council met at the Council Chamber, Viceregal Lodge, Simla, on Wednesday, the 10th September, 1919.

PRESENT :

His Excellency BARON CHELMSFORD, P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., G.C.M.G., G.C.B.E., Viceroy and Governor General, presiding, and 52 Members, of whom 48 were Additional Members.

OATH OF OFFICE.

The following Additional Members made the prescribed oath or affirmation of allegiance to the Crown :—

The Hon'ble Mr. Walter Erskine Crum, O.B.E.

„ Chaudhri Muhammad Ismail Khan.

„ Lieutenant-General Sir Havelock Hudson, K.C.B., C.I.E.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

11 A.M.

Gold Standard Reserve.

1. " Will Government be pleased to state what recommendations, if any, they have made to the Secretary of State or the Currency Committee regarding the location and disposition of the Gold Standard Reserve; and whether any and how much of the securities held in the said reserve are proposed to be converted into gold or silver, and what rate or rates of interest they are fetching?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

"The Government of India cannot at the present stage disclose the recommendations made by them to the Currency Committee on this subject. A statement* showing the rates of interest yielded by the various securities held in the Gold Standard Reserve on the 31st March 1919 is placed on the table."

Purchase of silver.

2. "(a) Has all the silver purchased from the United States been shipped to India?

(b) Has any additional silver been purchased? If so, how much and at what rate?"

"(a) Yes.

(b) It is undesirable to make public the information in question, but I shall be pleased to give the facts privately to the Hon'ble Member."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

Gold mohurs and sovereigns coined at the Indian Mints.

3. "What is the number of gold mohurs and sovereigns coined at the Indian Mints since 1917?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

"There was no coinage of gold in India in 1917. From 1918, 2,109,660 gold mohurs and 1,295,644 sovereigns have been coined in India."

Appointment of Sir Edward Maclagan as Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab.

4. "On what date did Sir Edward Maclagan arrive in India in April, and what were the reasons, if any, that prevented his taking over charge of the administration of the Punjab at once?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"Sir Edward Maclagan landed at Bombay on 21st April, 1919. In view of recent events in the Punjab, the Government of India considered it desirable to place him on special duty to assist the Lieutenant-Governor at a time when the burden of administration was peculiarly heavy. This arrangement continued till 26th May 1919, when Sir Michael O'Dwyer's term of office expired in the ordinary course."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

The Asiatics Trading and Land Act (Transvaal).

5. " Will Government be pleased to state what recommendations, if any, they have made regarding the Asiatics Trading and Land Act (Transvaal) and the results thereof ? "

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

" The Hon'ble Member's question has really been answered by H's Excellency the Viceroy's opening speech. The Government of India have, since the Act became law, urged the Secretary of State that a strong representation be made to the Union Government with a view to a reconsideration of the matter. The Hon'ble Member may be assured that the Secretary of State is fully aware of the great importance of the question, and it appears from recent telegrams that he has just received a deputation on the subject in London. The Hon'ble Member is aware that a Commission is about to be appointed in South Africa, and the Government of India propose, as His Excellency said, to depute Sir Benjamin Robertson to South Africa to represent their views."

Quantities and values of rails, rolling stock sent out of British India.

6. " Will Government be pleased to state—

(a) the quantities and values of the rails, rolling stock, and other railway materials belonging to Indian Railways sent outside British India for the purposes of the war ?

(b) whether and to what extent and at what cost it has been replaced, when the remainder is proposed to be replaced, and who will bear the difference in cost ? "

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied :—

" (a) Railway materials belonging to Indian railways, which were sent out of India for the purposes of the war, include 774 miles of new and second-hand rails, 217 locomotives, and 5,423 vehicles. Of the rolling stock 196 locomotives and 4,908 vehicles were metre gauge. Other materials are so varied in character that they cannot be enumerated in detail. The value will not be known until final adjustments have been made.

(b) Prior to the cessation of hostilities the replacement of 157 metre gauge locomotives and 2,500 vehicles had been arranged. Orders which have been placed since the removal of manufacturing restrictions more than cover the balance. Railways expect to receive 1,100 miles of rails this year.

Government propose that the final adjustment of the cost of materials which have been supplied by Indian railways and which have to be replaced shall be such that railways shall not suffer loss.'.

Coinage of gold and silver.

7. " What is the total coinage of gold and silver (Rupees and small coins) since 1st February of this year, and the quantity of silver bullion already purchased or agreed to be purchased and now available for coinage ? "

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

" There has been no coinage of gold since 1st February 1919. Between that date and the 22nd August 1919 (the latest date for which figures are available), whole, half and quarter rupees of the aggregate value of Rs. 30·93 crores were coined. The silver bullion under coinage on the 22nd August, 1919, amounted in value to Rs. 19·16 crores. "

Construction of Raipur Parvatipur Section of the Vizianagram Parvatipur Railway.

8. " Do Government propose (a) to begin the work of constructing the Raipur Parvatipur section of the Vizianagram Parvatipur Railway, and (b) to provide funds for the construction of the said railway during the next year's budget ?"

" (a) It is the intention of Government, subject to the Secretary of State's concurrence, to recommence construction of the Raipur-Vizianagram Railway at the earliest possible date.

(b) Next year's budget has not yet been framed, consequently it is not possible to say whether funds can be made available in it for this work."

Administration of the Punjab.

9. "(a) Is it a fact that the Secretary of State promised an inquiry into the administration of the Punjab ?

(b) If so, will Government be pleased to state—

(i) when the Committee of Inquiry is to begin its sittings ;

(ii) what powers are to be given to the Committee ;

(iii) what its composition is likely to be ; and

(iv) the nature and scope of the inquiry ? "

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

" The Hon'ble Member's attention is invited to the announcement made by His Excellency the President in his opening speech of September 3rd."

Trials under the Martial Law Tribunals in the Punjab.

10. " (1) How many persons were tried in the Punjab by the special Martial Law tribunals, and how many of them were sentenced (a) to death, (b) to transportation for life, (c) to imprisonment exceeding three years, and (d) to forfeiture of property ?

(2) How many such persons have appealed or applied for mercy ; and have all such petitions been disposed of by the authorities before the death sentences were executed ?

(3) How many of those sentenced to death have been executed?

(4) In how many cases of persons convicted by the Martial Law tribunals have (a) the sentences been reduced, and (b) orders of forfeiture of property been cancelled?"

"(1) 852 persons were tried.

(a) 108 were sentenced to death.

(b) 265 to transporation for life.

(c) 104 to imprisonment exceeding three years.

(d) 356 to forfeiture of property.

The Hon'ble Member's attention is drawn to the provisions of section 121 of the Indian Penal Code, under which most of these persons were convicted. The minimum sentence which can be imposed under that section is transportation for life and forfeiture of property.

2. All persons sentenced to death submitted petitions to Government, and the petitions of all the 18 persons who have been executed were duly considered before execution. The Government of India are not aware how many petitions have been presented in non-capital cases, but all cases have been reviewed by the Local Government whether petitions were presented or not.

3. 18 persons have been executed.

4. (a) 488 sentences have been reduced.

(b) 332 sentences of forfeiture have been remitted: and in ten other cases the sentences have not been enforced."

Additional rolling stock etc., for India.

11. "Will Government be pleased to state (i) the demands of the several Railway systems in India for additional rolling stock (passenger and goods) to meet their traffic requirements, (ii) what proportion thereof can be manufactured or built in India, (iii) what improvements and additions in the Railway workshops are proposed to be made in the current year?"

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied :—

"(1) The demands of the several railway systems in India for additional rolling stock amount to 692 passenger vehicles and 12,836 goods vehicles.

(2) With regard to the second part of the question, the Hon'ble Member is probably aware that efforts have been made to encourage wagon building in India, but it is not anticipated that more than 2,500 wagons will be delivered during the current year.

(3) With regard to the last part of the question, approximately 81 lakhs of rupees have been allotted for the current year for improvements and additions to railway workshops."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

Steamer building in India.

12. "(a) What constructive proposals, if any, have Government resolved upon to encourage steamer building and steamer owning in India ?

(b) Is any additional shipping required to relieve the railways from the carrying of coal? If so, how much ?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"(a) The Hon'ble Member is referred to the answer given him by the Hon'ble Sir Thomas Holland in the meeting of the Council on the 1st of March last, when it was pointed out that, in the case of ocean-going steel ships, it would be inadvisable to give active encouragement until India was in a position to manufacture the principal materials required for their construction, especially steel plates which form a large fraction of the total.

Although some progress has been made in the direction of developing the manufacture of steel plates in India, the general position has not sufficiently developed to enable any more definite reply to be given. The Hon'ble Member may rest assured that, when conditions are suitable, every reasonable help will be afforded by Government for the building of steamers.

With regard to the second part of the question the answer is Yes. If steamer freight is made available at rates which bear favourable comparison with those of railways, it is estimated that coal for local ports to the extent of fully 100,000 tons per month might be diverted from the rail to the sea route."

Indian Railways.

13. "Will Government be pleased to state when a Committee regarding the future administration of Indian Railways will be appointed?"

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied :—

"The Government of India had hoped to set up a Committee to inquire into various matters concerned with Indian railways during the coming cold weather, but it has been found necessary to defer this inquiry until next year. This is mainly due to the fact that the railways are still greatly understaffed owing to the continued absence of many of the superior staff on military duty, and, further, it seems desirable that all the energies of the existing staff should at present be devoted to getting the railways back into normal conditions."

Publication of news during the disturbances in the Punjab.

14. "(a) Was any difference made between the Indian and European edited newspapers of the Punjab regarding the publication of news during the late disturbances and, if so, why ? (b) What control, if any, was exercised by the Government of India over the Punjab Government in this matter ?"

The Honble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"The Government of India are informed that the publication of all news relating to the disorders in the Punjab was subjected to precensorship without any such discrimination as is suggested. The Government of India passed no orders on the subject."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

15. " Do Government propose to take up any large irrigation projects in the Madras Presidency and the rest of India next year ?" Proposed irrigation projects in India.

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

" Several large new irrigation projects, including one in the Madras Presidency, are under consideration, and it is hoped that at least two of these will receive the sanction of the Secretary of State in time to permit of construction work on them being commenced next year."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

16. " On how many occasions were fire-arms used (i) by the Military and (ii) by the Police, in Amritsar in March, April and May, and how many were injured and how many were killed on each occasion ?" Use of fire-arms at Amritsar.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

" Fire-arms were used by the military and police in Amritsar on three occasions—twice on the 10th April and once on the 13th April. The total number killed so far as it can be ascertained is 301. Information as to the number injured is not available."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

17. " In view of the census of population which it is intended to take in 1921, do Government propose to consider the advisability of inserting the necessary column or columns in the census form for recording the number of one room tenements in the different provinces of British India ?" Census for 1921.

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi replied :—

" The question will be considered in consultation with the Census Commissioner and Local Governments."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

18. " Have the securities of 16·08 crore Rupees in India and of 82·49 crore Rupees in England which were held in the Paper Currency Reserve on 30th June 1919, undergone any depreciation since their purchase, and if so, what is the amount of the loss between their market price (on 30th June 1919) and their actual purchase price ?" The Paper Currency Reserve.

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

" The securities held in India on behalf of the Paper Currency Reserve on the 30th June 1919 consisted of 3½ and 3 per cent paper, the purchase price of which was Rs. 8 and 2 crores, respectively, and Indian treasury bills purchased for Rs. 6·08 crores. On that date, the market value of the rupee paper fell short of the purchase price by Rs. 3 crores. No question of depreciation arises in the case of the treasury bills.

The securities of the Reserve held in England on the 30th June 1919 comprised British treasury bills purchased for £ 54·1 millions and Consols of the face value of £ 1 million. In the case of the former there is no question of depreciation. Out of Consols of the face value of £ 3·1 millions originally held in the Reserve, £ 2·1 millions have been replaced by British treasury bills, the loss of £ 600,000 on their sale having been met out of the Paper Currency Reserve Depreciation Fund, the constitution of which was explained by Sir William Meyer in paragraph 12 of his speech introducing the Financial Statement for 1917-18. The balance of £ 1 million now remaining will also in due course be similarly dealt with, there being a sufficient balance in the Depreciation Fund to cover the loss on their sale."

Railway line between Burma and India.

19. "Will Government be pleased to state what progress has been made with the proposed railway between Burma and India? To whom has the concession for construction been given? Is it an Indian Company? Will the State build and manage the Railway themselves?"

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied :—

"The preliminary investigations into railway connections between Burma and India have not yet been completed. During 1914-15 extensive survey operations were carried out to ascertain the best alignment for a rail connection, along the coast route, between Chittagong and certain stations on the Burma Railways South of Mandalay. A rival route via the Hukong Valley between the northern section of the Assam Bengal Railway and the section of the Burma Railways north of Mandalay was to have been surveyed during the following year, but was postponed because of the war. It is now proposed to commence this survey during the coming cold weather, and on its completion Government will have sufficient information to enable them to decide which route shall be adopted. Thus no arrangements for the construction of a line have yet been made, nor has any concession been granted, but it is probable that the line selected will be built at the cost of Government and worked by one or other of the main lines which it will connect."

Legislation in connection with the malpractices in Ginning and Pressing Factories.

20. "(a) Does the Report of the Indian Cotton Committee disclose certain malpractices in ginning and pressing factories?

(b) Do Government propose to introduce legislation at an early date to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee in regard to these and connected matters?"

"(a) Yes.

(b) The matter is under consideration."

Constitution of the East Indian Cotton Association.

21. "(a) What steps do Government propose to take to constitute the East India Cotton Association, as recommended by the Indian Cotton Committee and according to the scheme prepared by Mr. N. N. Wadia? Did Government send Mr. Wadia to Liverpool in connection with such a scheme?

(b) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table any criticisms received from Local Governments on Mr. Wadia's scheme?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

" Mr. Wadia was asked to go to Liverpool in connection with the scheme recommended by the Indian Cotton Committee for the establishment of a Central Cotton Trade Association in Bombay. His scheme for such an Association, under the name of the " East India Cotton Association " has been referred to the Government of Bombay for their opinion, but their criticisms have not yet been received."

Indian women labourers in Fiji.

22. "(1) Will Government be pleased to state:—

(a) whether they have made, since the close of the last session of the Council, any fresh representation to the Government of Fiji, either directly or through the Secretary of State, for the amelioration of the condition of Indian women labourers in Fiji; and

(b) whether any progress has been reported by the authorities in that Colony in response to such representation, specially in respect of the expatriation of such of the women as have completed their contract service; also, the progress, if any, made towards the construction of separate dwelling houses for them in a sanitary locality and the engagement of matrons to look after their social and moral welfare?

(2) Are Government aware of the submission of a representation by the Indian Imperial Association of Fiji to the Government of Fiji? If so, are they in receipt of a copy thereof which can be placed on the table?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

" I would refer the Hon'ble Member to His Excellency the Viceroy's speech at the opening of this Session of the Council, which gives him much of the information which he desires.

By way of further answer, I may tell him that the Government of India have been in constant communication with the Secretary of State concerning the labourers in Fiji, and among other documents, have forwarded to him a copy of the Hon'ble Member's own letter to Sir Thomas Holland during my absence.

The Government of India received a telegram dated 10th August from the Indian Imperial Association of Fiji, a copy* of which is laid on the table; but they have received no copy of any representation made by the Association to the Fiji Government. The terms of the telegram presumably refer to the Resolution of the Fiji Legislature which fixed August 1st, 1920, as the date of the final cancellation of indentures. So far as we know, however, this date cannot be termed a postponement, as no earlier date was ever fixed. As His Excellency said in his speech, the Government of India are pressing for the cancellation of all outstanding indentures by the end of the current year."

The Income-tax Act.

23. " Are Government aware that the introduction of the forms under the present Income-tax Act requiring assessees to fill in their exact income subject to certain penalties has caused discontent? Do Government propose to consider the desirability of introducing some panchayat system as before or of consulting non-official opinion with regard to the amendment of such forms?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

"The Hon'ble Member is presumably referring to the return of income prescribed under section 17 (2) of the Income-tax Act, 1918. A model form for that return was suggested by the Government of India for adoption in the various Provinces, the decision as to the actual form adopted being left to the discretion of Local Governments. Various protests against this return were received, mainly from persons in the Bombay Presidency. In forwarding the memorials the Government of Bombay remarked that in their opinion these had their origin primarily in the desire to conceal the abnormal profits which had been made of late, particularly in the cloth trade, and to revert to the former method, which left it to the Collector to make assessments on such information as he might have been able to obtain. The Government of India concurred in that opinion, and the memorials were rejected. As regards the penalties prescribed for omission to fill in the form, Government have no reason to suppose that Collectors of Income-tax do not allow assessees all reasonable latitude by extending the period wherever necessary for filling up the form.

As regards the panchayat system referred to in the Hon'ble Member's question, it is not clear whether he intends to suggest that panchayats should be consulted as to the form of the return of income, or whether he refers to the general question of utilising non-official assistance in making income-tax assessments. If the former, the answer is in the negative; if the latter, the Hon'ble Member is referred to the Government of India's Resolution of the 2nd July 1919, a copy* of which is laid on the table."

Removal of restrictions placed upon Mr. Asaf Ali of Delhi.

24. "My Lord, since giving notice of this question, I find that the restrictions as regards Mr. Asaf Ali have been removed. I therefore put only clause (c) of the question.

(c) Do Government propose to consider the propriety of withdrawing such restrictions without further delay in respect of Mr. Asaf Ali and other persons against whom similar action was taken under the said Rules during the War ?"

* * * * * * * * * * *

"(c) It is within the competence of Local Governments to withdraw restrictions imposed under the Defence of India Rules. Several months ago the Government of India invited Local Governments to consider the desirability of removing all such restrictions in view of the altered situation caused by the cessation of hostilities. Local Governments have since been steadily pursuing this policy, and in the great majority of cases the restrictions have now been withdrawn."

The Ecclesiastical Establishment in India.

25. "(a) What has been the growth of the Ecclesiastical establishment in India and the expenditure thereon during the last fifty years ?

(b) What portion of the present expenditure is for the military and what for the civil population respectively ?"

* Not included in these Proceedings.

† "(a) Is it a fact that restrictions were placed under the Defence of India Rules upon Mr. Asaf Ali, Barrister-at-Law of Delhi ?

(b) Is it a fact that the said restrictions have not yet been removed ?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. Sharp replied :—

"My Lord, I answer this question on behalf of your Excellency.

(a) The years 1867 and 1917 are selected as convenient dates for showing the growth in 50 years of the ecclesiastical establishment and the expenditure thereon, since the last figures available are those for 1917. In 1867, the regular ecclesiastical establishment consisted of 3 Statutory Bishops and 160 chaplains belonging to the Church of England and 13 chaplains belonging to the Church of Scotland. The establishment in 1917 consisted of the same number of Statutory Bishops and 166 chaplains (including 4 non-Statutory Bishops) belonging to the Church of England and 18 chaplains belonging to the Church of Scotland. There was thus an addition of 11 chaplains during the 50 years ending 1917. There has been no increase of regular establishment since that year.

The establishment mentioned above represents the establishment in the strict sense of the term—that is to say it does not include clergymen of various denominations who are not on the regular establishment, but who are in receipt of allowances or capitation grants for the performance of certain duties, mainly in connection with troops.

The total expenditure on all kinds of establishment was Rs. 18,12,020 in 1867 against Rs. 24,22,752 in 1917.

These sums include the allowances and capitation grants given to the clergy just mentioned. They also include cemetery charges, since it is difficult in dealing with the figures of 1867 to discriminate cemetery charges from the charges involved in the up-keep of the establishment. They do not include expenditure upon the erection and up-keep of churches, their furniture, etc., since charges on these accounts form no part of the charges incidental to the establishment; nor does the latter figure include a sum of Rs. 76,000 which has been expended upon additional clergy attached to the Indian Expeditionary Forces, since such expenditure is of a temporary nature and the addition of it would vitiate the comparison.

(b) The ecclesiastical charges are entered partly in the civil and partly in the military estimates. The military estimates provide for Roman Catholic and Wesleyan chaplains and clergy of other denominations who are entertained for the service of the soldiers of those denominations. The cost of all the Anglican chaplains on the regular establishment, the cost of those Presbyterian clergy who are not attached to regiments, and the allowances made to Anglican clergymen who are not on the regular establishment, together with charges for their subordinate establishment and for contingencies are included in the civil estimates. Of the total expenditure it may be roughly assumed that about two-thirds represents military expenditure, and the balance is for civil purposes."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—"My Lord, may I put a supplementary question? Do the Government propose to show the military and civil expenditure separately in future returns?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. Sharp :—"The proposal of the Hon'ble Member would have to be considered."

Imposition of restrictions on Indians residing in South Africa.

26. The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—"My Lord, I find that this question has practically been answered in answering the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma's question No. 5. I therefore withdraw it.*"

The question was by leave withdrawn.

*"(a) Is it a fact that a Bill has been introduced in the South African Legislature which imposes restrictions on Indians residing in South Africa and deprives Indians of the Transvaal of vested rights, and debars them from holding fixed property even as shareholders of Companies or as mortgagees and makes it impossible for them to obtain a trading license for any new business in the future?

(b) Is it a fact that there was a compact in 1914 with the knowledge and participation of the Government of India which secured certain rights and privileges to Indians in South Africa?

(c) Is it a fact that the present Bill if it passes into law will be in derogation of the said compact?

(d) Are the Government of India aware that the Bill has caused resentment and consternation among the Indians residing in South Africa as well as in India?

(e) Do Government propose to take any action in the matter?"

Enrolment of prominent citizens of Delhi as special constables.

27. "(a) Did the Deputy Commissioner of Delhi enrol certain prominent citizens of Delhi as special constables lately?

(b) Will Government be pleased to publish their names?

(c) What was the strength of the Police force at Delhi at the time, and was it necessary under the circumstances to enrol special constables?

(d) Was it by way of punishment of the parties that they were enrolled as special constables?

(e) Did they, or any of them, discharge the duties imposed upon them by such enrolment? If not, was any action taken in the matter?

(f) How long was the order in force? How did the enrolment become inoperative?

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied:—

"(a) On the 17th April after the rioting in the Chandni Chowk (when the police had to fire in self-protection) the District Magistrate of Delhi on the application of the Senior Superintendent of Police appointed 14 residents of Delhi to act as special police officers under section 17 of the Police Act, V of 1861.

(b) Government do not propose to publish the names of the persons appointed as special police officers, but I shall be glad to give them to the Hon'ble Member privately if he so wishes.

(c) The total strength of the police force in the Delhi Province on that date was 1,365 officers and men. Of this number, there were available for special duties in connection with the disturbances about 200 officers and men. Under section 17 of the Police Act the responsibility for deciding whether the assistance of special police officers is necessary for the preservation of the peace is vested in certain police officers not below the rank of Inspector, and the Magistrate to whom application for assistance is made by such officers is bound to comply with the application unless he sees cause to the contrary.

(d) The persons were appointed as special police officers for reasons similar to those which will be found stated at length in paragraph 293 of the Bengal Police Regulations, namely, by reason of their special influence over the people.

(e) The special police officers, except those who were unwell or absent from Delhi, obeyed the orders issued to them.

(f) The order actually came into force on the morning of Friday, April 18th; it was cancelled in respect of one special police officer on April 19th and in respect of the remainder on Monday, April 21st, when the District Magistrate was satisfied that there was no likelihood of further rioting or hartal. The enrolment became inoperative by the District Magistrate's order. The District Magistrate when discharging them thanked the special police officers for the services rendered."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked:—

Decision to treat Bengal as a "surplus" province in respect of rice supplies.

28. "(a) Has a decision to treat Bengal as a 'surplus' province in respect of rice supplies been arrived at by the Foodstuffs Commissioner? If so, when was this decision come to and what were the materials before the authorities at the time, justifying such decision?

(b) Were the Government of Bengal consulted in the matter prior thereto?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

" The Government of India (and not the Foodstuffs Commissioner as suggested) decided to treat Bengal as a surplus province in respect of rice supplies as a result of a Conference held at Delhi in October 1918, at which a representative of the Government of Bengal was present. A copy of the proceedings of that Conference is being placed on the table in response to another question put by the Hon'ble Member. The decision was arrived at as a result of the estimate of surplus stocks of rice available in Bengal which was supplied by the Bengal representative at the Conference. The views of the Hon'ble Member himself were presumably in accord with this decision when he asked the following question in this Council on 18th September, 1918 :—

> '(a) Is it a fact that there are large stocks of rice in Bengal which the cultivators have not been able to sell or dispose of in any way owing to the absence of adequate markets and prices, and that, in consequence, great distress has occurred among large masses of people in that Province?
> (b) If so, do Government propose to take measures for finding adequate markets for this overstocked produce of Bengal?' "

Conferences held at Nagpur and Delhi re the agricultural situation.

29. " (a) Will Government be pleased to state the particulars of the conferences held at Nagpur and Delhi, respectively, during the latter half of 1918, to consider the agricultural situation and the regulation of supplies of food grains?

(b) Were the said conferences attended by representatives of the l Governments? If so, what opinions were expressed by them in regard to the stock and the food situation generally of their respective provinces, and upon what materials were these opinions based? "

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

" I would refer the Hon'ble Member to the proceedings of the two conferences which I lay on the table.*"

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked :—

Census of stocks of food-grains.

30. " Is it a fact that a census of the stocks of food-grains was taken in each province about the end of 1918? If so, will Government be pleased to state the specific results thereof in respect of each province, together with the results of any other subsequent census of a similar nature that may have been carried out?"

The Honble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

" An attempt was made to take a census of stocks of food-grains in each province about the end of 1918. As to the results of this attempt, I would refer the Hon'ble Member to the reply given to a similar question put by Rai Bahadur B. D. Shukul at the meeting of the Council on the 6th February last. For the reasons then explained no subsequent census has been taken."

Famine.

31. "Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing province by province (a) the area in square miles in which famine has been declared to prevail, and the total population thereof, (b) the respective dates of such declarations, (c) the number of people—men, women and children—in receipt of relief, gratuities, etc., in each defined area, (d) the total grants, in the shape of loans and gratuities, respectively, sanctioned by the Provincial Governments in respect of each area up to date, and how much of the same has already been distributed?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied:—

"I lay on the table* a statement giving the information asked for, so far as it is in possession of the Government of India. The statement shows the number of persons on relief at the time when their number was at its maximum. With reference to part (d) of the question, the figures represent the grants sanctioned by the Government of India. No information is readily available regarding the distribution of these grants within the provinces."

Money allotted for relief purposes.

32. "What is the total amount allocated for the current financial year in each province for the relief of distress, from Provincial and Imperial funds, respectively, and how much of the same has been expended up to date in each case?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied:—

"I lay on the table† a statement of the allotments.

The Government of India do not possess information of the expenditure up to date."

Stocks of food-grains.

33. "(a) Will Government be pleased to make a statement showing the net stock of food-grains actually available for consumption, each year since 1909-1910 (i) in the whole of British India (excluding Burma) and (ii) in each of the different provinces, and how the same works out per head of the population?

(b) How much of the same in each case represents local production, and how much net import?

(c) How has the overseas export of rice, wheat and other food-grains from India and Burma, respectively, varied during this period?

(d) How do the average total annual production and export of rice, wheat and other food-grains of India and Burma, respectively, during the five years preceding the war, compare with the production and export thereof during each of the subsequent years?"

* Vide Appendix A.

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"I regret that I am unable to supply the information asked for in parts (a) and (b) of the Hon'ble Member's question. It is impossible to frame any reasonable estimate of the net stocks of food-grains available in any one year, either in India as a whole, or in any particular Province, firstly, because we have no reliable information as to the carry-over of stocks from one year to another; secondly, because estimates of out-turn are not available in respect of certain crops; and, thirdly, because in some Provinces the statistics of area under cultivation are incomplete or untrustworthy or both, and the standard out-turns are unreliable. We are steadily improving our statistics, but the very fact that improvement has taken place during the past ten years would vitiate the comparison which the Hon'ble Member desires to draw.

A statement* giving the information asked for in part (c) of the question is placed on the table.

As regards part (d) the Hon'ble Member will realise from what I have already said that no reliable figures can be given to show the annual variation in output. Such details as are available will be found in the 'Estimates of Area and Yield of the Principal Crops in India' published by the Department of Statistics, of which copies are available for reference in the Imperial Library. In general terms, however, it may be said that the first four agricultural seasons of the war were on the whole above the average, while the Hon'ble Member will see from the statement placed on the table that exports of food-grains during the war were markedly less than during the preceding five years."

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur :—

Appointment of a Committee of Inquiry to inquire into the administration of Martial Law in the Punjab.

34. "My Lord, with your permission, I beg to withdraw this question† (No. 34)."

The question was by leave withdrawn.

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur, asked :—

Deportation without trial under the Bengal, Madras and Bombay Regulations.

35. "Will Government be pleased to state the number of instances up-to-date in which Bengal Regulation III of 1818, Madras Regulation II of 1819 and the Bombay Regulation XXV of 1827 empowering deportation without trial, have been used, since the transfer in 1858 of India to the Crown?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"I regret that the information asked for by the Hon'ble Member is not available."

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur asked :—

Recommendations of the Calcutta University Commission.

36. "(a) When will the recommendations of the Calcutta University Commission be taken into consideration by Government?

(b) Do Government propose to invite public bodies and individuals to submit their opinion on the recommendations?

(c) Is it the intention of Government to give effect to those recommendations as early as possible?"

* Vide Appendix C.

† "Will Government be pleased to state—

(a) whether they propose to appoint a Committee of Inquiry composed of official and non-official representatives to investigate the administration of Martial Law in the Punjab; and

(b) if so, whether the non-official members of the Committee will be chosen from among the members of the Imperial and the Punjab Legislative Councils?"

"(a) The recommendations of the Calcutta University Commission are already under consideration by the Government of India.

(b) The views of the University of Calcutta have already been invited. Other public bodies and individuals will have an opportunity of expressing their views when such legislative measures as may be found necessary for carrying out the recommendations of the Commission are introduced and published.

(c) The Government of India desire, so far as possible, to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission at an early date. How far those recommendations can be accepted in their entirety is a question which is now under consideration."

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur asked :—

Indian Industries Commission.

37. "Will Government be pleased to state in what way effect is being given to the recommendations of the Indian Industries Commission?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"This question has been dealt with fully in the speech of His Excellency the Viceroy on the 3rd September, to which I would refer the Hon'ble Member."

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur asked :—

Report of the Calcutta University Commission.

38. "(a) Is it a fact that before the Report of the Calcutta University Commission was made available to the public and even before a copy of it was given to the Vice-Chancellor of the University, a Madras newspaper published extracts from it?

(b) Do Government propose to inquire into the circumstances under which the Report was given to the Madras paper and by whom? Was it a 'confidential' document at the time?"

"(a) Yes.

(b) Government do not propose to inquire into the matter at present. The Report was at the time unpublished and hence was a confidential document."

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur asked :—

Improvement of pay and prospects of non-I.M.S. men in the Sanitary Department.

39. "(a) Is it a fact that the pay of all I. M. S. Officers in the Military Service has been increased and that I. M. S Officers in Civil employ specially in the Sanitary and Bacteriological Departments will shortly be entitled to improved terms of pay, but that nothing has been done to improve the pay and prospects of men in the Sanitary Department who do not belong to the I. M. S.?

(b) Do Government propose to take up the question of improving the pay and prospects of men in the Sanitary Department who do not belong to the I. M. S.?"

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi replied :—

" (a) It is a fact that the pay of officers of the I.M.S. in military and civil employ has been raised. The new rates of pay for those in civil employ are shown in the statement accompanying Government of India Home Department Notification, Medical, No. 350, dated the 1st August 1919. It is also a fact that the existing rates of pay for officers in the Sanitary Department who do not belong to the I.M.S. have undergone no recent revision.

(b) The question of the rates of pay for officers in the Sanitary Department who do not belong to the I.M.S. has for some time been under consideration by the Government of India. Local Governments have already been addressed on the subject."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya asked :—

Arrests and detentions in connection with the recent disturbances in the Punjab.

40. " Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing—

(a) the number of persons actually arrested and detained in custody in connection with the recent disturbances in the Punjab, classified according to town or village, and showing the names, parentage, caste, profession and place of residence of the persons arrested or detained;

(b) the number of persons out of the above list who were actually put on trial—

- (i) before the Commissions constituted under the Martial Law Ordinance of 1919 promulgated by the Governor General;
- (ii) before the Summary Courts established under the orders of the General Officers Commanding the Lahore and Rawalpindi Divisions;
- (iii) before the Area Officers constituted by or in virtue of the powers conferred by the General Officers Commanding the Lahore and Rawalpindi Divisions for offences against the Proclamation issued on the 19th April 1919. (Notification No. 10766 of Home Department, Military, dated 21st April 1919);
- (iv) before the ordinary Municipal Courts in districts where Martial Law was not declared; and
- (v) before the Special Tribunal constituted under the Defence of India Act;

(c) the number of persons convicted out of those mentioned above in part (b) and the offence or offences of which they were convicted and the sentences passed in each case;

(d) the number of persons discharged or acquitted out of those mentioned above in part (b);

(e) the number of persons arrested but released without trial ? "

" (a) The information is not available.

(b) The following are the figures reported. It is possible that some small modifications may be found necessary.

(iii) 69 (included in (ii)).

For details as to sentences and convictions attention is invited to the statements* placed on the table.

(e) No information is available."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord with regard to the answer of the Hon'ble Member respecting part (a) of this question, namely, that the information is not available, am I to understand that the number of persons actually arrested and detained in custody in connection with the recent disturbances in the Punjab is not known to the Government ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"That is correct. The number of persons arrested is not known to the Government of India."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"May I request that the Government will be pleased to ask for that information and lay it on the table at the next meeting of the Council ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"I ask for notice of that question."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"Then my Lord, with regard to part (e) the Hon'ble Member says that no information is available as regards the number of persons arrested but released without trial. Will the Government be pleased to ask for this information also and lay it on the table at the next meeting of the Council ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, these are really questions more for the local Council than for us; but we have met the Hon'ble Member as far as we have information. If the Hon'ble Member so desires, I will attempt to have the information collected."

41. "Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement giving the following particulars regarding all cases tried by the Summary Courts established by the General Officers Commanding the Lahore and Rawalpindi Divisions and also by the Area Officers appointed under Notification No. 10766 of the Home Department, Military, dated 21st April, 1919:—

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, I beg here also to ask a supplementary question, and I may with your Lordship's permission say here that the local Council is not sitting; and that is why it has become necessary for me to ask so many questions here. With regard to the answer to parts (b), (c) and (d), that from the material at present available Government are not in a position to give accurate information on this point, namely, as to the number of cases in which summaries or memoranda of evidence and reasons for findings were recorded, etc., will the Government be pleased to ask for such information and lay it on the table at the next meeting of the Council?"

(b) the number of cases in which copies have been supplied; and

*Not included in these Proceedings.

(c) the number of cases in which such copies have been refused and the reasons for such refusal ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"The Legal Remembrancer to the Punjab Government received some three or four applications for copies of proceedings of the Summary Courts, but as the records of these cases were not in his office, he returned them to the applicants. The information about the other authorities mentioned is not available."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"I beg to ask, my Lord, if the Legal Remembrancer informed the applicants where they could obtain copies of the judgments ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"I have no information on the point. The Legal Remembrancer is an officer of the Provincial Government."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya asked :—

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"May I ask if the Government is aware that the popular estimate of the numbers killed at Amritsar is over a thousand?"

RESOLUTION re CONGRATULATIONS TO HIS MAJESTY'S NAVAL, MILITARY AND AIR FORCES, Etc., ON CONCLUSION OF A VICTORIOUS PEACE.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"My Lord, it is with much pleasure that I rise to move the Resolution that stands in my name. It runs as follows :— 11-41 A.M.

'This Council requests the Governor General in Council—

(a) to convey to the King-Emperor the humble message of the people of India assuring him of their enthusiastic and loyal devotion and allegiance to His Majesty's person and throne, and tendering their warm congratulations on the conclusion of a victorious peace;

(b) to convey to His Majesty's Naval, Military and Air forces, British and Indian including the Royal Indian Marine the grateful appreciation and heartfelt thanks of India's citizens for their pre-eminently valuable services and heroic deeds of daring, endurance, skill and cheerful sacrifice which have enabled the British Empire and its Allies to crush Prussian militarism and autocracy and inaugurate an era of orderly progressive self-government on a truly democratic basis under the guidance and protection of a League of Nations;

(c) to convey to His Majesty's civil services, especially to the officers and men employed in the Munitions, Railway and Post and Telegraph Departments, the sincere thanks of the country for their untiring energy and zeal and supreme devotion to duty during a prolonged and trying period of more than four years of active warfare.'

"My Lord, it is an axiomatic truth acknowledged on all hands that the Indian people love and revere their Sovereign in a manner not understandable by the generality of the people of other races. It is born in their blood, it is taught by their religion, it is traditional with them; and may I add that reason has confirmed that this political instinct is not incompatible with a true democratic spirit. Recent events have fortified the conviction that a constitutional monarchy on a truly democratic basis is the only ideal form of government for the congeries of races and nations that constitute the British Empire. My Lord, while thrones have been tottering, while thrones have been shattered to pieces, the British monarchy has been more firmly entrenched in the hearts of the people. Why is it so? It is because people realise that their beloved Emperor, George V, has behaved like a true constitutional Sovereign in accordance with the dharma which has been preached by ancient sages as the dharma of Kings. There is no one throughout the British Empire whose heart has not gone out in sympathy to their Majesties when they were toiling and slaving for the amelioration of the condition of their subjects during these four anxious years. And what has been the result? The result is, as I have said, that the throne is more firmly established than ever in the hearts of the subjects. We in India realise its importance all the more because we believe that it is the silver link, the golden tie, that binds together the various races composing this Empire. It is the royal prerogative to which we look for safety, for protection and for guidance. George V has secured for himself a warm corner in the hearts of his people by the love for his subjects he has manifested throughout his reign, and especially during the last four years. With us Indians his name has been a household word ever since he visited India as Prince of Wales and struck the true chord when he said that the keynote of the administration in India should be sympathy with the people, and the gratitude of the people have been enhanced by his kingly conduct during his stay here, when he came in 1911. It is to such a King and to such a throne that we send our humble message of loyalty. What is the occasion on which we send this message of congratulation? It is on the conclusion of peace at the end of a cruel war, which has devastated Europe and large areas in Africa and Asia; from the results of which we are suffering to-day famine, pestilence, the dislocation of business, and all the normal activities of man. No one would have welcomed an inglorious peace, but all would have welcomed a peace on honourable terms. It is our peculiar privilege, however, to congratulate the Sovereign on the ending of the war in such a crushing victory and such a glorious peace. It is not in a spirit of braggardism or idle bravado that I refer to the nature of the victory of the Allies. We are so jubilant because we believe that this has enabled and will enable the Allies to fulfil the promises they have made during the course of the war, and to undertake the tasks they set themselves during its progress. It was not a war undertaken with a view to conquest, otherwise it would not have appealed to the imagination of mankind; it was a war that was absolutely unforeseen and unprepared for; it was a war undertaken at grave risk to the solidity of the Empire, with a view to upholding the sanctities of treaties and the sacredness of the plighted word. It was carried on during four years with lofty ideals placed before the people. It was a war the object of which was to enable nations and peoples, whether great or small, to develop along their own lines, to evolve their own forms of Government, Government elected and chosen by themselves; to progress according to the genius of their particular race to what they belonged; to uphold the majesty and supremacy of the moral law and the triumph of right over might. It was stated to be distinctly for the purpose of enabling humanity to evolve further progress on new lines and to make the world safe for a peaceful democracy. That is why we value the objects and ideals of the war, and that is why we welcome this glorious peace.

" It may be, my Lord, that occasional disappointments may overtake us, have overtaken us. The Prussian militarism born of autocracy, born of racial arrogance and pride is a disease that is not peculiar to Prussia. It is for the eradication of that evil that this war has been fought; the last flickering fires are ablaze, but they are only indicative of the dying struggles of the old spirit for the eradication of which this war has been fought, and the Indian people hope and trust that this spirit is dying if not dead, amongst all the progressive peoples of the world. The crushing defeat of the Central Powers by the Allies has enabled them to reconstitute the map of the world, thereby redeeming their promise to enable distinct peoples to evolve their progress according to their own peculiar genius, to lay the foundations for the harmonious working of a League of Nations, to preserve and guard the peace of the world while reducing armaments. Much may not rest upon the present formation of the League of Nations, and it may be childish and foolish to expect much from the formation of such a League in its early stages, but the foundations have been laid surely, securely and soundly, and we in India can never be too grateful to His Majesty's Government and to the Indian Government for securing to the people of India a recognition of their status as a member of the League, a recognition for the United States of India, forming the Indian Empire, of their distinct status as a component, integral part, of the British Empire. In this connection it would be only right to thank Lord Sinha and His Highness the Maharaja of Bikaner for their eminent services in helping to secure for us these privileges. We value this recognition all the more highly, because it is indicative of a hopeful promise for the future; because it is a partial fulfilment of the promise which was made to us nearly two years ago that we should be placed on the high road to self-government as an integral, distinct unit of the British Empire. The people of India are grateful for the latest message on behalf of the people of England of the Prime Minister. Mr. Lloyd George, with his rare imaginative insight into and deep understanding of human nature, has stated in the House of Commons when moving a vote of thanks: 'India by her remarkable contribution to our triumph, notably in the East, has won a new claim to our consideration, a claim so irresistible that it ought to overpower all prejudice and timidity which may stand in the way of her progress.' Is it, then, any wonder, my Lord, that in the midst of famine, scarcity and pestilence, in the midst of privation and suffering and disappointments, tossed about in a troubled and distressed world, the people of India with alacrity and eager spontaneity rush forward to lay their humble message at the foot of the throne. To me it is nothing surprising, and I beg that your Excellency's Government may be pleased to convey to His Majesty this message. I now come to the very agreeable task of asking the Council to record a vote of thanks to the various fighting services. We express here our heartfelt gratitude and we lay our tribute of praise and admiration for the gallant heroes, living and dead, who fought for us on sea and land, under the sea and in the bowels of the earth, and in mid air to reconstitute on earth a new heaven and a new life. History can furnish mankind no finer or nobler example than that of a peaceful people unprepared for war, undertaking imminent risk for the upholding of a noble ideal. There can be no more truly magnificent spectacle than millions of young men, middle aged men and boys, rushing to the colours, certain of the imminent risk of death, to uphold the cause of the Empire. From day to day as we looked at the pictures and the photos of the valiant heroes, many of them boys in their teens, beardless, moustacheless, who rushed to the battlefields and laid their lives so nobly fighting their country's cause, there was none whose heart did not ache and send forth a message of sympathy for the bereaved homes throughout the Empire and especially in the United Kingdom.

"That was a magnificent spectacle, and nothing struck the Indians so much, at any rate struck me so prominently as the fact that in the vast majority of these cases the sacrifice was spontaneous. I do not attach so much importance to what has been done since the Conscriptions Acts have been introduced, though much may be justly said in praise of the steadfastness and heroic endurance of the peoples; but this spectacle of millions rushing to the standard voluntarily when they were absolutely untrained and unused to think of war is a spectacle which inspires one with awe, respect and admiration. That contemptible little army has cost the Kaiser his throne and his subjects, nurtured on false ideals, who flattered their soldiers in the perpetration of diabolical deeds of savage warfare, much suffering, privation, disgrace, defeat and humiliation. My Lord, the story is a tale often told, and it is unnecessary to expatiate at greater length on that subject here. The deeds of the Navy we can never forget because they have saved the Empire, the commerce of the Empire, and the commerce of India and have protected our ports. Cruel must have been the strain on the nerves of the men of this brave Navy who had to guard the seas in all weathers, inclement or otherwise, through four weary years, and the tribute of our hearts must also go forth to the mercantile marine and Royal Indian Marine who have guarded our shores and carried on our commerce, and who escaping from perils rushed back again into them to save their country from defeat. And may I be allowed, my Lord, to pay here a tribute to those Indian sailors who have brought credit to their country by undergoing cheerfully all sacrifices along with their brethren, the British seamen, during this long struggle. It gives us hope, it inspires us with trust for the future of our country. The magnificent air forces which were developed with such remarkable rapidity owing to the innate bravery and daring of the British race, have won imperishable fame in winning this war, and the story of their exploits is a fairy tale of romance.

" Now, my Lord, let me say a few words paying our tribute to the gallant warriors from the Dominions, from the Indian States and from other countries forming part of the British Empire, for I use the words His Majesty's forces in a wide and comprehensive sense, for all the countries holding allegiance to the King-Emperor have their forces at His Majesty's command and are His Majesty's forces. And to the various officers and men from the Native States our gratitude is especially due: British statesmen have acknowledged times without number the gallant services to the Empire rendered by the forces from India. We in India can never forget the foresight and wisdom of the Government of India under Lord Hardinge in despatching troops from India to assist the Empire in her time of peril and danger. To those troops we owe much. To them chiefly we owe whatever may be the recognition of India's services to the Empire throughout this conflict. That gallant little army has nearly disappeared, but it has fought for us in the distant fields of France, Gallipoli, East Africa, Egypt, and China and Mesopotamia and our hearts go out to the silent homes, chiefly in the Punjab and in Maharasthra and Rajputana which appeal to us, and ought to appeal to us, with an irresistible force, for those heroes therefore have illustrated to the world that the warlike spirit is not dead in India. They have demonstrated to the world that, whatever may be the temptations, the Indian is true to his plighted word, will never swerve from true allegiance to the throne and will not forsake the Government in time of peril and danger.

"I may just read a few lines from what Mr. Chamberlain said by way of acknowledging the deeds of these gallant heroes for it would be ungrateful to them to leave these deeds unacknowledged :—

'India's troops have fought, I think, in almost every theatre of war; in France, in Egypt, at Aden, on the Suez Canal, in Gallipoli, in East Africa, in West Africa. In the winter of 1914 in France they were nearly one-third of the forces there. They were the first of the over-sea troops. The Indian Army provided the first defence in British East Africa and repelled the first Turkish attack on the Suez Canal.' It was to their efforts mainly, the Minister added, that we owe the conquest of Mesopotamia. It is difficult when one reviews the deeds of the Indian Forces in this war to select for illustration any particular instance, but the House will not forget, and the country will not forget such episodes as in France, the recapture of Neuve Chapelle in October 1914 by the 47th Sikhs, and the 20th, and 21st Companies of Sappers and Miners. The 47th Sikhs lost 178 out of 289 men; the Sappers and Miners lost 119 out of 300.' And then he refers to the doings of the Gharwal brigade on the 10th of March in Neuve Chapelle, and the conduct of the 14th Sikhs at Cape Hellas, Gallipoli, where the Indian Army lost nearly all their British and Indian officers and 430 men out of 550 engaged, and here may we acknowledge the services of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief Sir Charles Munro—'Where every Sikh had fallen facing his enemy and where most had one or more of the enemy under them.' These were the doings of men who had been trained while the Indians fought valiantly and never showed their back to the enemy. Their stoic, philosophic indifference, their contempt and disdain for death must have left an imperishable impression on the hearts and minds of all, and when such brave men are the heritage and priceless possessions of India, and when there is a new impulse which was nearly absent in the past, the new impulse born of our love of freedom, of a love for our mother land, the deeds of the Indian soldiery cannot and will not be excelled.

"My Lord, may I say a word in this connection with regard to the Indian Medical Service. The organisation and equipment of this Department have come under rigorous scrutiny in more than one place, and this is hardly the time to go into that question, but no one has ventured to deny and every one has acknowledged with gratitude the eminent services rendered to the Army by the officers and men of the Indian Medical Service, as well as all branches of the Medical Service in every theatre of war where they have cheerfully and voluntarily gone to aid the sick and wounded in their sufferings. British and Indian blood has flowed freely in distant fields, in foreign lands. There was no jealousy, no envy, no sense of inequality. All were content to fight for a common cause, for a common flag. I think it will be the sincere hope of this Council that historians, British and Indian, will arise in India to depict the story of these heroes of Hindusthan in vivid, graphic colours, so as not only to do justice to their memory, but so that they may be an inspiring example for the future, and we hope that Indians will vie with one another and will co-operate with the Government in rendering the desolate homes which they have left behind them a little more cheerful than they would be otherwise. Let us all pray for the souls of the departed heroes and express our sympathy with their bereaved families and help in succouring the wounded and the disabled.

"My Lord, I now come to the last part of my Resolution where I ask the Council to express our gratitude to the civil services who have toiled hard during these four years of warfare to achieve for India her destiny. It would be invidious to draw a distinction between one service and another. The history will be told, I daresay, in the near future, when the services of all ranks will be acknowledged suitably by a grateful India, but would it be invidious to signal out the Munitions, Railway and Posts and Telegraphs Departments which, admittedly, have had to work at very high pressure with the depletion of their officers and their staffs and with new work thrown on them. I think it is but our duty to express our thanks to them. May I say a word in regard to the Finance Department than which, I think, no Department could have spent a more sleepless time during these four years. It is true we occasionally gave them some little trouble, but it was not without appreciating their hard work. We might have been mistaken in our appreciation of the merits of their work, but this is due to them that they have managed to bring India as safe as was compatible with her rightful position in the Empire and was possible under the circumstances.

"This performance of their duty which is in accordance with their dharma in sending their humble message of fealty and congratulations to His Majesty, in remembering their departed heroes, the departed heroes of the Empire, with gratitude, love and affection, and praying for their souls, in thus expressing the homage of their hearts and in paying a tribute of praise and admiration to those who have fought for them and for the Empire and expressing their thanks to the numerous workers, selfless men and devoted women, official and non-official, who have toiled hard for the Empire during four weary years, inspire the people of India with a new hope, a new courage, a new gladdening of their hearts, and a buoyant optimism born of hope, trust and courage. Rivers of blood, British and Indian, flowed together in sacred union in distant climes and in foreign lands to achieve a noble cause, a common purpose, the upholding of the prestige of the flag. The bones and ashes of our departed heroes, the flower of British and Indian manhood, fertilise foreign lands. There was no jealousy, no envy, no inequality in their common repose. Shall they appeal to us in vain for union, concord and harmony ? United we stand and divided we fall. The Indian people devoutly hope and trust that they will be permitted under a common flag to achieve their destiny according to the genius of their race, unhindered, unhampered and loyally assisted by their British comrades nurtured in freedom. Thus, unhindered and unhampered in the pursuit of peaceful occupations, with equal opportunities, a healthy emulation and a fair field, and with mutual good-will, trust, confidence and co-operation, it is our earnest hope that our common heritage, the Empire, will achieve a higher and loftier destiny and purpose, the emancipation of the human race."

12-16 P.M. The Hon'ble Major Sir Umar Hayat Khan :—" The Council will be glad to hear that I have given in my speech to be taken as read, so as not to waste its time, because if the story, which has only been heard, has taken such a long time, I who have seen all that occurred, could go on till to-morrow morning."

The President :—" The Hon'ble Member's request is granted."

The Hon'ble Major Sir Umar Hayat Khan :—" My Lord, as after the conclusion of victorious peace this is the first time that this Council has met, such a loyal Resolution moved by our Hon'ble Friend is the most appropriate, and while endorsing all that he has said I give him my cordial support.

" Having served throughout the war from the very beginning to the end in one or the other capacity, I saw how inferior we were to the enemy in the beginning. Their preparations clearly showed that they had been planning this from generations. All our branches had to make gigantic efforts not only to make up the deficiency, but to come up to a far higher pitch so as to defeat the enemy.

" Those who have seen the strides made by the Government can realise its grandeur and feel proud to be under its protection. Though every one did his duty to the best of his ability, but none had done harder work than His Majesty's person, the Queen Empress and His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

" We are proud that Indian soldiers were given the opportunity to fight side by side with the British, and I, as a witness, can bear testimony that they acquitted themselves worthily of it.

" India in turn ought to be proud of the Punjab which furnished most of her army, especially the units which went to fight across the seas in which the Punjabi Muhammadans took the leading part. The first Indian recipient of the Victoria Cross was a member of this community, and I need hardly go into the details of the work done by the Rawalpindi Division mostly comprising of the Punjabi Muhammadans whom your Excellency recently honoured with a visit and called it the ' Sword Arm.'

" With these few remarks I support the Resolution."

[10TH SEPTEMBER, 1919.] [Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi; Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur; Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur; Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal.]

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi :—" My Lord, I deem it my duty to associate myself with this Resolution on behalf of my fellow countrymen of Bengal. With the conclusion of an honourable peace, our mind first of all turns to the throne and person of His Majesty who has been the symbol of the unity of the Empire during the fearful struggle from which the world has just emerged. In this hour of rejoicing, we are also naturally reminded of those heroic souls to whom humanity now owes rest and calm. But much as we are beholden to those that have won for the Empire the crown of victory, we are bound in an endless debt of gratitude to the immortals who did not live to see the fruition of their noble endeavours. We have, again, to pay a special homage to the memory of those brave sons of India who have cheerfully laid down their lives in strange lands and among strange people, in order that we who have been left behind may live in a freer atmosphere and in a new era of progress which is about to dawn on this land." 12-17 P.M.

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur :—" My Lord, on behalf of my community I enthusiastically and cheerfully join with my Hon'ble friend in his message of deep devotion, loyalty and attachment of the people of India to the person and throne of His Imperial Majesty the King-Emperor. 12-19 P.M.

" The war and the little part that our countrymen had the proud privilege of taking in bringing it to a victorious close for the Allied arms have more solidly consolidated the bond that binds India to Great Britain, and have also more solidly welded the bond of brotherhood between the different nations that owe allegiance to the great Sovereign under whose protection we live. And, in conclusion, we beg to tender our warm congratulations to His Imperial Majesty on the conclusion of a victorious peace which has added greater lustre to British arms."

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur :—" My Lord, I beg heartily to support the Resolution on behalf of the Moslem community of Madras." 12-20 P.M.

The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal :—" My Lord, the Resolution as moved by the Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma has full sympathy from me, and on behalf of the landholding classes of the Central Provinces I offer my hearty congratulations to His Majesty the King-Emperor on the conclusion of a victorious peace, assuring His Majesty at the same time on behalf of the people of our Province of their whole-hearted, enthusiastic and loyal devotion and allegiance to His Majesty's person and throne. 12-21 P.M.

" My Lord, we were all engaged for more than four years in the momentous struggle which began in August 1914, and we Indians never realised before what war meant in relation to public and individual lives. There hardly remained a subject which was not affected by the war. Our Sovereign was, as a matter of fact, forced to enter into it by obligations of honour and duty to preserve the neutrality guaranteed by treaty and the liberties of a friendly State and His Majesty had a spontaneous response from all classes and creeds all over the Empire. We all admire the military skill and determination which marked the leadership of our armies in the front, and we cannot forget the gallantry and endurance of the troops throughout the operations which have taken place under the most trying circumstances, and I think we are not going beyond the mark when we say that we ought to pay a tribute to the labours by which His Majesty's Naval, Military and Air forces have accomplished this and enabled the British Empire and its Allies to achieve the success over which we are rejoicing to-day.

"My Lord, we will be failing in our duty if we did not pay our tribute to the services rendered by the officers and men employed in the Munitions, Railway, Post and Telegraph Departments and the manner in which His Majesty's Civil Services had surmounted the difficulties with which they were faced during these past years of war. I should like to take this opportunity of associating myself with the Hon'ble Mover of the Resolution to the full with that tribute.'

12-23 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. N. F. Paton:—"Mr. President, I would ask your permission to request the mover to accept a slight amendment to his Resolution. In part (b) of the Resolution I would suggest the inclusion of the words 'and the members of the 'Mercantile Marine, British and Indian.' I do not think the suggestion requires any words of mine to commend it to the Council. I think it is recognised on all sides that the results which we have attained would never have been achieved without the magnificent devotion to duty of the members of the Mercantile Marine."

12-24 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I certainly accept the suggestion if the Council will permit me to do so."

12-25 P.M. The Hon'ble Nawab Saiyed Nawab Ali Chaudhri:—"On behalf of the Muhammadans of Bengal I beg to support the Resolution."

The Hon'ble Raja Sir Rampal Singh:—"My Lord, I beg leave to extend my most cordial support to the Resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma. It is truth—nothing but pure and simple truth—to say that the Resolution voices the innermost feelings of the people of India. The unflinching loyal devotion and sincere affection that we Indians bear towards His Majesty's person and throne were never more strikingly evinced in practical manner than at the time when the gigantic war was at its height, and when the fate of the world was trembling in the balance. Terrible was the tension and the nerves of the great nations were put to the severest test on the issue involved in it. But India never faltered an inch from the strong hope which amounted almost to a religious conviction that the cause of righteousness and liberty will triumph over Prussian militarism and autocracy. India's firm faith in this respect was pinned in an unwavering manner on the teaching of Lord Krishna to his worthy disciple Arjun on the battlefield of Kurukshetra when the Indian Mahabharat was fought. It was यतोधर्मस्ततोजय : i.e., righteousness and victory go together. But though we had this faith in the final victory of the Allies and though our very vital self-interest lay in the triumph of the British arms because on it hinged in unmistakable manner the question of life and death of the Indian progress and advancement yet, my Lord, our deep devotion and allegiance to His Majesty's person and throne were no small asset and potent stimulant in making India respond wholeheartedly to the clarion call of duty—Princes and Peasants, Zamindars and traders, educated and uneducated, all vied with one another in doing their best according to their means and abilities to most sincerely uphold the cause of the Empire. India can legitimately take pride in having had an honourable share in bringing about the dramatic fall of Germany and her Allies. Now we with one accord tender our humble but hearty congratulations to His Majesty the King-Emperor.

"It is also our bounden duty to convey through your Excellency in Council India's grateful acknowledgment of the immense sacrifices which the war entailed upon the Military and Civil Services of the Empire, and which they most willingly and delightfully suffered. We offer our sincere thanks to them for the dauntless courage and tenacious perseverance which they brought to bear in a spirit unequalled in the annals of history in vanquishing the formidable foe. It is impossible to exaggerate the services rendered by them, and India has special reasons to be deeply grateful to them because it was due to those services that she escaped 'unscathed' as your Excellency was pleased to observe the other day from the desolation which the unscrupulous enemy might have caused to her particularly when her people were not prepared to defend themselves from such a foe."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda:—"My Lord, 12-28 P.M. speaking for the people of Assam I desire to associate myself entirely with this Resolution. The Resolution, my Lord, does not, I think, require any speech; it speaks for itself and I support it."

The Hon'ble Chaudhuri Muhammad Ismail Khan:—"On 12-29 P.M. behalf of the Muhammadan community of Bihar and Orissa I beg to support this Resolution."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, 12-30 P.M. I join with my friends in offering our dutiful and loyal congratulations to His Majesty the King-Emperor on the happy termination of the war. My Lord, it is a matter of sincere satisfaction and of supreme thankfulness that His Majesty's forces and those of his Allies have triumphed. In this connection I may say that the sentiments which have been expressed by the Mover of the Resolution regarding the Royal House in England are generally shared by Indians. These sentiments are very much the same as have been expressed so beautifully in that booklet by Lord Esher called 'After the war', and I hope that the people of England will always have the great advantage and the honour of having a King at the helm of affairs in the United Kingdom. My Lord, to the people of India kingship appeals in a peculiar manner, and I hope that the advantages which are associated with it will be shared always both by the United Kingdom and by such States as exist in this country, and have the advantage of being ruled by Kings. I also join my friend in offering our thanks to the soldiers and sailors and others who have worked in His Majesty's forces for the great sacrifices which they have made in the cause of the Empire. My Lord, above all we have to offer our humble thanks to God for the victory which has been vouchsafed to His Majesty the King-Emperor. While we are offering congratulations to our King-Emperor, while we remember with gratitude the services which have been rendered by soldiers and sailors and statesmen, let us also remember that it was the grace of God that really helped England to win the war. Let not the lessons of humility and righteousness which were preached during the dark days of the war be forgotten. The war has left many lessons for us. It was professedly waged for righteousness and liberty. Let us not give up our adhesion to righteousness and liberty, now that the efforts of the armies of the King-Emperor and of his Allies have triumphed. Let us remember that pride brought about the fall of Germany, and let us discard all racial pride and all racial jealousy and usher in a new era of really brotherly unity and fellow-feeling among Britons and Indians.

"My Lord, the war has unfortunately already produced in some quarters very undesirable results. It has led some people to think that blood and iron can achieve everything. On such an occasion when we are offering our congratulations to the King, and when we are offering our thanks to God that the war has ended as it has, it would be well to remember what Lord Beaconsfield said after the Treaty of Berlin: 'It is not on fleets and armies', said he, 'that I alone or mainly depend in that enterprise on which this country is about to enter. It is on what I most highly value—the consciousness that in the Eastern nations there is confidence in this country, and that, while they know we can enforce our policy, at the same time they know that our Empire is an Empire of liberty, truth and justice.' This confidence has been somewhat rudely shaken by recent events, and it is the duty of everyone of us, loyal subjects of, His Majesty, Indian or European, so to labour that this confidence shall be restored and deepened, and that a new era of greater fellow-feeling between Indians and Europeans may be ushered into existence. My Lord, if I may do so with apologies to Wordsworth, I would say :

'One lesson Briton let us two divide,
From what this greatest war reveals,
Ne'er to let racial selfishness or pride
Attack a fellowman for he too feels.'

"The Germans have fallen because in their racial pride and selfishness they wanted to dominate the world. Let us so work that this victory may really prove to be a victory of righteousness, and that it should leave us Indians as free to live and grow as are our fellow-subjects in the United Kingdom, to whom also we offer our heartiest congratulations on the triumph which has been vouchsafed to us."

12-33 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha :—"I heartily support the Resolution moved by my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Sarma, in such appreciative terms. To my mind what recalls itself at this moment are the words of Pericles delivered in his great oration on those brave Athenians who had fallen during the first Peloponnesian war. He said : 'Make these men your example. It is by the stoutness of heart that Freedom comes.' With the English people it is the case that once Freedom's battle is begun, it goes on from sire to son till it is won. It is this stoutness of heart which Indians have to cultivate in Freedom's cause. This war I consider to have been the most colossal epic in the history of the evolution of the world. I daresay a future Gibbon will narrate it in his own stately and eloquent language ; and that in times to come a new Homer will sing in verse his Iliad in sublimer and more stirring strains than his own.

"My Indian friends often forget what the sea power of England has done for the world and particularly for India. The prosperity which India has achieved in the past four years and maintained is owing to that power. The crores of rupees which she has received for her trade balance would never have been secured but for the sea power of England which unweariedly guarded and dominated the Atlantic Ocean, the Pacific, the Mediterranean Sea and the Indian Ocean. Sea power is certainly the greatest source of England's strength, and we have seen what it has been in this war. In this connection I heartily endorse every word my friend, the Governor of Bombay, said the other day in a speech on the subject at the University Convocation. It is the same sea power of England which had saved India. I hope my Indian friends will never forget that it is this which has given them prosperity, as well as security of life and property.

"With these few words I beg to support the Resolution."

12-35 P.M. The Hon'ble Raja of Kanika :—"My Lord, I desire to associate myself with the sentiments expressed by the mover of the Resolution. On behalf of the landholders of Bihar and Orissa I heartily support this Resolution."

12-36 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"My Lord, on behalf of the people of Bihar and Orissa whom I represent in this Council, I desire to associate myself with the Resolution and the observations made by the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma."

12-37 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir Zulfikar Ali Khan :—"My Lord, I desire to associate myself with the sentiments so well expressed by the Hon'ble the Mover. I hope and trust that they will meet with the approval of this Council."

The Hon'ble Mr. K. V. Rangaswamy Ayyangar:—"My Lord, in supporting the Resolution I have to note that this Council would be failing in its duty if in this Resolution our thanks are not conveyed to the labour corps, to the medical services, to the nurses and also to the ladies who have been able to send so many comforts to the troops, of which work as the President, Her Excellency Lady Chelmsford, was able to do not a little." 12-38 P.M.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief:—"My Lord, I conceive that no member of this Council has ever been called upon to respond to, and express his thanks for, such a comprehensive Resolution as has been so eloquently moved by my friend Mr. Sarma; and standing here, I am conscious of my inability to give adequate expression to my appreciation of the generous terms in which this Resolution has been worded. I cannot help wondering as to which of the many attributes which have been ascribed to myself personally will continue to be so ascribed after you have heard the very few words which I am going to address to you. Mr. Sarma expresses attributes of 'daring, endurance, skill and cheerful sacrifice' in reference to the soldiers and other services. In standing here I do not feel that I have ever rendered cheerful sacrifices. I am confident there has been no skill and I also feel that there has been no endurance. Therefore, unless we can get a further expression from the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma, I can only blushingly accept the expression 'daring.' 12-39 P.M.

"It will be realised, I am certain, by my Hon'ble friend, that to respond for the naval, military and air forces, and last but not least the Munitions Board, as represented by Sir Thomas Holland, is a task of the greatest difficulty; hence, in the interests of brevity, I can only express our very warm thanks for the generous terms in which you have referred to the services which these forces have rendered. My Lord, speaking on behalf of the military branches, I can assure this Council that we shall regard the commendations which we have received as the highest reward that can be accorded to public servants. It ought to be, and I think it is the case, that the greatest pleasure that any public servant can receive is to know that such services as he has rendered, and such acts as he has done, have met with the approbation and commendation of those whom he has served. Such services as those to which you have kindly referred will, when the terms of this Resolution are made known, tend to spur us on in our respective services, to even greater efforts than we have made before, so that, if it should be found necessary, which God forbid, at any future time to call upon us to respond to the directions of the King-Emperor in the defence of the Empire, we shall be found, in every Branch, whether it is the Army, the Navy, the Air Forces or the Munitions Board, more prompt, more efficient and more ready to do our duty than we were before, in whatever sphere our country may call upon us to serve."

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson:—"My Lord, I am glad to welcome on behalf of Government the Resolution which has been moved by the Hon'ble Member in so far as it affects Railways. They are a silent service whose virtues are not published abroad, but whose shortcomings are widely advertised, and a spontaneous appreciation by this Council of their services will be valued by all classes of employés. 12-40 P.M.

"Looking back on the last few years with railways short-handed, material for repairs at a minimum, renewals and replacements interrupted, shipping gone and its traffic diverted to railways, with concentration on the Frontier and a constant heavy traffic for the maintenance of overseas forces, all carried out with smoothness, the fact emerges that it is due to the loyalty and devotion o our Railway staff that we have pulled through the difficult period. Their co tribution to India's share in the war has been no mean one, and I can answe for them that they will warmly appreciate the recognition of their servic which the Resolution gives expression to.

"The higher administrations of railways have co-operated with us mos willingly in all measures which were designed for the general good. State worked and Company-worked lines have been equally ready to meet us in ou various measures of control, and it thus gives me a special pleasure to welcom and associate myself with this Resolution."

12-42 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. G. R. Clarke:—"My Lord, on behalf of th staff of the Posts and Telegraphs, I rise to thank the Hon'ble Membe for the terms of his Resolution. I am sure that every member of the staff wil feel highly gratified that the work that has been done by them during the wa is appreciated by this Council. Wherever the Indian Army has gone, the fiel post offices have accompanied it, to France, East Africa, Egypt, Palestine, Syria Mesopotamia and Persia, and even now we have field post offices on the Blac Sea and the Caspian Sea. The work done by the post offices in the field ha received the highest commendation of the military authorities. Our telegrap staff has been sent to East Africa and to Mesopotamia, where during the war w sent no less than 8,000 men. The work done there was tremendous. In Mesopotamia about 11,000 miles of telegraph wire and 4,000 miles of telephone wir were erected, and traffic amounting at one time to 183,000 messages a mont was handled. I am glad to say, My Lord, that the work done by the Department has been recognised. Over 350 of our men have been mentioned in Despatches, over 82 personal distinctions have been conferred upon officers and me for military service or for work connected with the war.

"There is just one word, my Lord, about the depleted staff that has bee left behind. Our best men, our keenest men, and many of our most energeti men had to be taken to the field, and the work had to be carried on with thos that remained. To show how that work has developed during the war, I shall give you a few figures and examples. During the war the telegraph traffic increased from 16 million to 21 million messages in a year, and the number of postal articles increased from 1,000 to 12,000 millions. I know there have been complaints of delays, and there have been delays, but I doubt if in any country in the world which was at all connected with the military operations the war has caused so little postal and telegraph dislocation and so little inconvenience to the public as in India.

"My Lord, it is a great pleasure to me that the Department which I control should get some commendation for the work it has done, and I can assure the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma that every member of the Posts and Telegraphs will feel the greatest pride and satisfaction for having been singled out for special mention in this Resolution."

12-46 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I wish to say a few words, my Lord. I am thankful to the Hon'ble Members for according me the support they have given me, and I entirely associate myself with the Hon'ble Mr. Rangaswamy Ayyangar in his tribute of praise to the ladies, British and Indian, who laboured so hard throughout the war, and also to Her Excellency Lady Chelmsford who as President did so much to help and succour the troops at the front. May I say a word, my Lord. The chief burden has fallen on your Excellency's shoulders and the members of your Government. Three years have been spent in sleepless nights by your Lordship and hardworking days in the midst of this war, and under your Excellency's guidance we have emerged successfully out of it."

The motion was put and agreed to.

RESOLUTION re APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSION TO INQUIRE INTO RECENT DISTURBANCES IN THE PUNJAB.

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" My Lord, before the announcement was made by your Excellency on the 3rd instant that a Committee of Inquiry was going to be appointed, I had given notice of the Resolution which stands in my name on the agenda of to-day. In view of that announcement, it has become necessary . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—" My Lord, I rise to a point of order. The rules require that any Member moving a Resolution should move the Resolution first and not make his speech first."

The President :—" That is so."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" I will follow the technical rule, my Lord, but I thought there was reason in the circumstances of the case to justify a deviation. I will read the Resolution. My Lord, the Resolution of which I have given notice and which stands on the paper runs as follows . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"The Hon'ble Member must move his Resolution first."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" I understand the meaning of the word 'move' and the duty that rests upon me in moving the Resolution. I am not bound to use the word 'move' in moving the Resolution, and if Hon'ble Members will have a little patience, I shall show them that I am moving the Resolution. May I proceed now, my Lord ?"

The President :—" Yes."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" Thank you, my Lord."

" My Lord, the Resolution of which I have given notice and which stands on the agenda runs as follows :—

'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that he should request His Majesty's Government to appoint without further delay a Commission consisting of gentlemen unconnected with the Indian administration to inquire into (a) the causes of the recent disturbances in the Punjab, and (b) the propriety of the measures adopted in dealing with them, and to vest the said Commission with legal authority to annul or modify sentences passed by the Martial Law Commissions or by Magistrates specially empowered to deal summarily with cases alleged to have been connected with the said disturbances.'

" My Lord, before placing my reasons for this Resolution before the Council, I should like to refer to the circumstances, to the events, which have happened since notice was given of this Resolution. Those events are very well known to the Council, and they are that on the 3rd of this month your Excellency was pleased to announce that the Government had decided to appoint a Committee of Inquiry to investigate the recent occurrences in the Punjab. It becomes necessary for me therefore, before formally moving the Resolution. . . .

The President :—" The Hon'ble Member must understand that he is moving the Resolution. Though he has not used the word 'move', I can only take it that he has moved it."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" Certainly, I used the words 'before formally moving it.' This may come at the end of the speech instead of coming at the beginning."

The President :—" All right; the Hon'ble Member must understand that he has moved the Resolution."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Yes, my Lord. Your Excellency was pleased to announce on Saturday—my Lord, i I may say one thing with great respect, it is that the rules of Council ar meant to enable us to proceed in a reasonable manner, and where reasor demands that a change should be made, I think I am entitled to place th matter before your Excellency as President of this Council, to consider and rule upon. Now, my Lord, the Resolution of which I gave notice has becom dead, dead as Queen Anne, by reason of the fact that on the 3rd instant, you Excellency was pleased to announce that the Government had decided t appoint a Committee of Inquiry to investigate the Punjab affairs. I beg therefore, in view of that fact, to ask for your Excellency's leave to amend the Resolution in the form of which I have given notice to the Legislativ Department. It runs, my Lord, as follows:—'That this Council recommend to the Governor General in Council, that he should recommend to His Majesty' Secretary of State . . . . .

12-51 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, may I rise t a point of order. The Hon'ble Member is now proposing an amendment to a Resolution which he has never moved, at least sometimes he says he has moved it, at other times he says he has not. I am entitled to three days' notice o any amendment proposed and I take objection to the amendment."

12-55 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Under th rules of this Council as I understand them, when the President of the Council expresses an opinion about a matter of fact, that is loyally accepted by every Member of this Council. Your Excellency having said that I had moved the Resolution, which I quite readily accepted, I submit the Hon'ble Member is out of order in saying I had not moved the Resolution. . . . . . .

The President:—"The point of substance which the Hon'ble Member must take and which the Hon'ble the Home Member has pointed out is that if a copy of an amendment has not been sent to the Secretary at least three clear days before the date fixed for the discussion of the Resolution, any member may object to the moving of the amendment. That is the point he has taken; the other was, I think, a slap at the Hon'ble Member which perhaps the Hon'ble Member had deserved, perhaps he had not. That is the point which the Hon'ble the Home Member has put before me, and on that point I must rule that the Hon'ble the Home Member has a perfect right to object to the moving of such an amendment. As the Hon'ble Member is aware, this Resolution of his has been before the Council for a large number of days. My speech was made on September the 3rd, just a week ago. If the Hon'ble Member had given notice the day following that he regarded his Resolution as dead, dead as Queen Anne, and that he wished to put in an amended Resolution, then it would have been open to me—and I should have looked upon it favourably—it would have been open to me to allow him to amend or substitute another Resolution. But what did the Hon'ble Member do? At 7-30 last night I received a letter which had been written by him requesting to be allowed to substitute one Resolution for another. I do not think that this is a reasonable notice to give to Hon'ble Members here who have prepared themselves to meet the Resolution of the Hon'ble Member, and therefore I have no choice, as far as I can see, but to say that the Hon'ble Member must comply in this case with the rule, especially in a matter of such paramount importance."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, I bow to your Excellency's ruling. In so far as the question of notice is concerned, I quite see that the Hon'ble Member can insist on his three days' notice. But, my Lord, if that is the only difficulty, as my object is to get this matter considered by this Council properly, I should request your Excellency to allow me to keep back this matter and allow the Hon'ble Member to have ample notice of this Resolution. I am sorry I could not send notice of this earlier because the matter, as your Excellency has recognised, is of great importance, and I had to consult friends as to what course I should adopt. I came to the conclusion to which I did in consultation with several friends only last evening and took the earliest opportunity to intimate the fact to the Secretary of the Legislative Department. I am not entitled to go on with this matter unless your Excellency should permit me to do so. I therefore put two propositions for your Excellency's consideration. One is, your Excellency may allow me, if the Hon'ble Member waives his objection, to proceed with the matter and dispose of it. The second is, that if that is not to be, then as only one part of my Resolution is dead as Queen Anne, and the other parts are not, it will be my duty to proceed to discuss the Resolution. I will take either course. I have no wish to spend one minute more of this Council's time or my time than is necessary. If my Hon'ble friend wants notice, I am willing that this matter should come up after the three days' notice . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" May I speak on a point of order ?"

The President :—" Yes, on a point of order."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"I put it to your Lordship that a Member is not entitled to amend his own Resolution. An amendment must come from somebody else. If the Hon'ble Member seeks to substitute a new Resolution of his own, I am entitled to the full fifteen days' notice." 12-57 P.M.

The President :—" I think that is quite clear that if he substitutes one Resolution for another, he must give the usual time, which is fifteen days' notice."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" My Lord, I exactly used the word 'substitute' in the letter which I sent to the Secretary in which I requested that in view of the fact that a Committee had already been appointed to inquire into the measures taken, His Excellency the President might allow me to substitute the amended Resolution in place of the one of which I had given notice. I have complied with that requirement, but of course if your Excellency rules that I should give fifteen days' notice of it, I will, with your Excellency's permission, now give notice of it. I shall wait until fifteen days are over, in which case I understand that your Excellency will be pleased to allow me to discuss this substituted Resolution . . . . . . 12-59 P.M.

The President :—" I cannot give the Hon'ble Member any such promise. The Hon'ble Member's Resolution will then have to take its place in the list of Resolutions suggested to this Council. The Hon'ble Member's resolution has been given special priority in this case and put on the first day devoted to Resolutions, but the Hon'ble Member now wishes not to move that particular Resolution, and his Resolution, if he wishes to substitute another one, must take its chance with the other Resolutions."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :— " In that case I beg leave to proceed with the Resolution of which I have given notice. My Lord, the reasons which led me to give notice of the Resolution which stands upon the paper, it is hardly necessary for me to repeat. The Government, His Majesty's Government and the Government of India, acting together have recognised that the events which have recently taken place in the Punjab have been of so unfortunate and so grave a character that a Committee of Inquiry should be instituted in order to inquire into them. That having been done, my Lord, it becomes unnecessary for me to either go into those unfortunate events or to draw any inferences which would support such a request as is contained in the Resolution. But before proceeding further, as it is the first opportunity when this melancholy affair comes up before the Council, I wish to say with regard to the occurrences in the Punjab that every one of us, Indians in this Council, and indeed I may say I speak in this matter on behalf of all Indians whether in this Council or outside, deplores the distressing events that took place in the Punjab. My Lord, I do not agree with those who think that the Rowlatt Act agitation was responsible for those events. Nor do I agree with those who think that the Satyagraha movement was responsible for any evil results. The fact remains undisputed and undisputable that the great Satyagraha day—the 6th of April 1919—passed off throughout the country without a single untoward incident. I believe that if some of those who were in power and whose duty it was to keep law and order, had not mismanaged the situation none of the distressing events which we deplore would have occurred. In referring to those events, my object is not to raise a controversy on them, but to express my deep sorrow that they should have happened. I deplore the desecration that was committed on places of worship and the destruction of public buildings. I deplore more deeply the greater desecration which was committed on the living temples of God, on human beings, whether British or Indian, who were destroyed in a fit of fury or without any justification. My Lord, I mourn the death of the seven Europeans who were killed in these disturbances. I grieve for them as I would grieve for the death of my dearest and nearest. I mourn also the death of those several hundreds of persons—their number has been stated by the Government to-day to be more than 300, and it is believed by the public to be more than a thousand,—I grieve for the deaths of those who fell victims to the fury or the indiscretion of those who were charged with suppressing disorder. My Lord, as I have said, it is a sad thing to reflect that any places of worship were desecrated. I am a Hindu, but I never pass by a mosque or a church without paying it that silent reverence which is due to every place of worship. But, my Lord, places of worship are after all made by men ; if they are destroyed, man can remake them. But a man is a temple created by God, and all of us, men, Governors, Kings and administrators, cannot even if we combined, re-build one single human temple if it has been destroyed by the hands of man or beast. I am therefore grieved beyond expression to think of the appalling number of deaths which have been caused, but I will say no more about it at present. My object to-day is merely to express my sorrow for what has happened. It is not my object to apportion blame, whether one brother was to blame for it or another, it is equally a matter of pain to me. I have not any idea here of apportioning blame or desiring that blame should be fixed upon one rather than upon another. I only refer to these unfortunate events to remind you that very distressing things have happened, and it is right, and the Government have held that it is right, that they should be inquired into and their repetition made impossible.

" My Lord, while referring to these events in the Punjab, I wish also to say that it is a matter of real regret to me that I should have to raise questions relating to them at a time when Sir Edward Maclagan has assumed charge of the Government of the Punjab. His kindly and generous nature has inspired respect for him throughout the province and throughout the country, and the Punjab in its hour of distress honoured him by calling for him as a saviour. It was a cruel fate which kept him from the people of the Punjab and the people of the Punjab from him. It is a real regret to me, entertaining the respect which I do for him, that I should have to raise these questions at a time when he is the responsible head of the Punjab administration, and my regret is not quite shaken off by the thought that he was not responsible for the events to which attention is to be drawn and which happened at a time when he was not in charge. My Lord, I also want to say that it is far from my object to impute blame wholesale to the members of the Punjab service. On the contrary, it gives me pleasure to acknowledge that at a time when some members of that service did commit what the people consider to be great wrongs, there were several members of the same service whom the people esteemed and respected and were grateful to for having kept their heads cool and their districts calm. It is not my object to attack either the Punjab administration or the services as a whole. It is my object as a humble subject of the King and as a humble servant of the people to draw attention to events which require looking into. It is for this reason that, distressed by the delay which was caused in the announcement regarding the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry, I gave notice of the Resolution which stands on the paper.

" My Lord, as I have said before, it is not necessary for me now to justify the Resolution. The Government have thought it necessary to appoint a Committee of Inquiry. They have considered the situation to be so grave as to call for the appointment of a Committee of a very important character. Lord Hunter is to preside over it; several important gentlemen are to be members of it. Why then, it may be asked, is it necessary for me to take up the time of this Council by pressing this Resolution? The reason, my Lord, is this: As the expression of opinions through the press and associations has made it clear, the public are disappointed with the constitution of the Committee. Your Excellency must have noted, and other members of the Government must have noted, the chorus of dissatisfaction and disappointment with which the announcement has been received by the Indian papers. The 'Leader,' a leading organ of sound moderate opinion, has expressed itself in unequivocal terms: It has said that the Committee will not command confidence. The reasons it has urged are, first of all, that the Indian element on it is very weak. Secondly, that the Committee is to report to the Viceroy who has been so much identified with the Punjab policy. And, thirdly, that 'the terms of reference do not empower the Committee to go into individual cases.' It has concluded by saying: 'To say that the people will be keenly disappointed with the constitution and terms of reference of the Committee is only to express very mildly the effect they will produce.' Similarly, the 'Bengalee' and other leading organs of public opinion have expressed themselves dissatisfied with the constitution of the Committee and its terms of reference. My object here is not to attack anybody, not to impute any motives to any one, not to cast any reflections upon any officer of Government, but humbly to draw attention to the reasons which justify this dissatisfaction and disappointment and which should lead the Government to reconsider the matter.

"I will take up the first point with regard to the report being made to the Viceroy. My Lord, I speak with the utmost respect without any desire to say anything personal, and I shall be sorry if any remarks of mine in any way, either directly or indirectly, indicate any want of respect for the head of the Government or for the Government of India. My Lord, the Committee is to inquire into events which have happened in the Punjab with which the Government of India are closely identified. My Lord, it was the Government of India, or, if you please, the Governor General in Council, who declared that there was a state of open rebellion in Lahore and Amritsar. That was the starting point of the chapter of troubles. It was the Governor General who promulgated martial law Ordinances. It was the Governor General in Council who supported and sustained the late Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, Sir Michael O'Dwyer, in carrying on the martial law administration there. It was the Governor General in Council who accepted the resignation of Sir Sankaran Nair, which as a protest, a most emphatic protest, against martial law . . . . . .

The President:—" Order, order. What authority has the Hon'ble Member for making that statement. I told the Council in my speech the other day that Sir Sankaran Nair had not given out publicly his reasons for resigning, and that any communications he had made were entirely private as between colleagues."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"I beg your Lordship's pardon, my Lord. It has been said in the papers that Sir Sankaran Nair resigned on account of the administration of martial law in the Punjab, If I have erred in saying this, I beg your Excellency to pardon me.

"Now, my Lord, these are facts of such an important character that there is a feeling in the public mind that the Committee of Inquiry ought to report not tothe Governor General in Council, but to His Majesty's Secretary of State forIndi a. I disclaim, my Lord, any idea of suggesting that the Governor General in Council will not deal fairly and squarely with the Report of the Committee. Personally, I have not the least doubt that every member of the Government will give it his best and most impartial consideration and arrive at conclusions which justice and honour should dictate. But, my Lord, in this matter the Government has to pay heed to the public opinion of the country, and, in view of the events which have happened, the public clearly feel that it would be right, it wouldbe more satisfactory, if the Report went to the Secretary of State for India. This is a view which I consider it my duty to commend to the consideration both of your Excellency's Government and of the Secretary of State. It is not, I repeat, that I make any insinuation or any suggestion, or that I personally have any doubt about how the matter will be dealt with by the Governor General in Council. But it is my duty to draw attention to the public opinion of the country which is voiced by papers of the standing of the 'Leader' and the 'Bengalee,' as well as other organs of Indian public opinion, all of which want this matter to be re-considered.

"I will now come to the next point by reason of which I consider that this Committee is defective and unsatisfactory, and that is the personnel of the Committee. The Committee consists of six members including the President. Four of these are Europeans and only two are Indians. Now, my Lord, I would not have raised the question of Indians and Europeans, were it not that the Government have themselves raised it by proposing such a Committee as they have done.

"My Lord, it is deplorable that seven European lives were lost, but, your Lordship is also aware from the answers given to-day by the Hon'ble the Home Member that several hundreds of Indian lives have been lost; and several hundreds of barristers and vakils, merchants and bankers, and other respectable Indians are rotting in the jails of the Punjab as the list laid before the Council by the Home Member discloses. Several hundreds of Indians have been subjected to indignities which should have been inconceivable. When the Indian members and the Indian public cry for an inquiry into such a state of affairs, one should expect that the Government would appoint a larger number of Indians on the Committee of Inquiry than of non-Indians. Instead of doing that if the Government had put the number even as equal, it would have given more satisfaction. But they have not done this either.

"My Lord, here again I do not mean for a moment to insinuate that any member of the Committee will look at these questions from a racial point of view. I personally believe that every one of the members will act honestly and impartially as a gentleman, and I have no fear, not the remotest fear, in my mind that these gentlemen will not act impartially and justly; but how does the constitution of the Committee appear to the general public? Four of its members are Europeans. They ask why should there be four Europeans as members and why only two Indians? Are not Indians more concerned in this matter than Europeans? The matter ought not to be regarded in any racial light, but it ought to be looked at from the point of view of the persons, whose fates are to be tried or whose interests are at stake, who would naturally desire in a matter like this to see that the jury consists of persons in whom they have confidence. The Indian public do not know sufficiently about some of the members who have been appointed on the Committee. They know only of some;

and by reason of want of knowledge of the qualifications and character of some of the members, they do not feel the same confidence that they would if they had found in the Committee the names of some of those with whom they are acquainted, whom they respect and honour, and in whom they have confidence. For this reason, my Lord, the constitution of the Committee is defective, and I certainly say that it would have been wiser on the part of the Government if they had at least made the number of Indian and European members equal. It is even now possible for the Government to equalise the number by appointing a third Indian member. There are a number of gentlemen available in the country, both among Indian Judges and Indian public men, any one of whom, who enjoys the confidence of the public, might be appointed without any disadvantage to any interest. My Lord, it is in this respect that the constitution of the Committee is considered to be defective. I will not dwell upon the personal merits of any individual; as I have said I have absolute confidence that every member of the Committee will look at the questions in a straight way like a gentleman and come to conclusions which truth and justice and honour dictate.

" My Lord, why has the Government appointed this Committee? It has appointed it, in the first place, to redress wrongs which, it must be satisfied, have been inflicted; and, in the second place, to satisfy public opinion which has been outraged by the events which have taken place. Now, if the public is to be satisfied, if that is the object of appointing this Committee of Inquiry, I submit with great respect that the Government would be wise in appointing a third Indian as member of this Committee, and I hope it will.

"My Lord, the third respect in which the Committee is unsatisfactory is that the terms of reference are not sufficient. Your Excellency has seen from the answers given by the Home Member what sad havoc has been played with the liberty and honour of a number of His Majesty's subjects. Now, my Lord, even if their Lordships of the Privy Council hold that there was no justification for introducing martial law in the Punjab, even if they sweep aside all the proceedings of the martial law commissions and martial law officers, what would be the position? They will only deal with the appeals of those individuals who have gone up to the Privy Council; they will not be able to touch the cases of the vast number of men who have not appealed and who probably will not be able to appeal to the Privy Council. My Lord, the Committee of Inquiry will be an executive body; it can only make recommendations. In the Resolution I have suggested the Commission will be vested with legal authority to deal with, to annul or modify sentences. But it is the convictions which have to be set aside. My Lord, I have reflected that this cannot be done by a Commission or Committee unless it is constituted into a Court, for which either this Council should pass an Act constituting it as a judicial tribunal, or Parliament should do so. In the absence of such a constitution of a judicial tribunal, the Commission or Committee can only make recommendations which may be dealt with by the executive Government. Now, the Governor General in Council or the Secretary of State can, as executive officers, wipe out the sentences of any individual; but, my Lord, neither the Secretary of State nor the Governor General in Council has any authority to set aside any of the convictions; and, my Lord, if the convictions remain, can any of these men be happy to think that the stain of having waged war against the King will remain on their forehead for ever? My Lord, comparatively the sentences do not mean so much. What matters most to every decent citizen, to every loyal subject, to every gentleman, is that his honour should remain stainless, that the stain which has been cast upon his honour shall be completely wiped off. Now, my Lord, as matters stand in the British Empire at present, that can only be done by His Majesty's Privy Council. I submit, therefore, that the reference to the Committee of Inquiry is insufficient and incomplete, and that they should be asked to recommend, if they should think it fit, to His Majesty in Council that the convictions by the martial law commissions and martial law officers and tribunals specially empowered to deal summarily with cases of persons alleged to have been connected with the said disturbances should be annulled. I therefore, ...

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" May I rise to a point of order ? The Hon'ble Member is doing exactly what he said he would not do, that is, moving an amended Resolution."

The President :—" I should like the Hon'ble Member to show how what he is saying now in the course of his arguments comes within the Resolution which stands on the paper."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" My Lord, it will be quite clear in a minute. If the Hon'ble the Home Member had not interrupted me, he would have heard it by this time. My Lord, my Resolution says that :—

> ' This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that he should request His Majesty's Government to appoint without further delay a Commission consisting of gentlemen unconnected with the Indian administration.'

To support it I have to show that the Committee of Inquiry which has been announced is defective, and that the terms of reference are insufficient, and I have been endeavouring in my humble way to show it. I am surprised that this should not have been clear to the Hon'ble the Home Member. I will proceed more rapidly because I fear my end is approaching. My Lord, I have drawn attention to three circumstances by reason of which I am not satisfied with the proposed Committee of Inquiry; and by reason of which I humbly urge that this Council should recommend to the Governor General in Council that he should request His Majesty's Government that a Commission should be appointed by them to investigate the Punjab occurrences, and that the terms of reference should be laid down as I have suggested.

" Now, my Lord, if this is done, what will be the result ? The result will be that your Excellency's Government will satisfy Indian public opinion. I assure your Excellency that my countrymen are not unreasonable; my experience, extending over forty years, of public life in this country, has convinced me that there has not been one single occasion, when if the Government has been in the right the people have not recognised that they were right; and I believe that in the interests of the good name of the Government, in the interests of justice, in the interests of truth, nothing is more desirable than that the inquiry which the Government have recognised as necessary should be conducted by men who satisfy public opinion, by men who would inspire confidence in the public mind, and that the terms of reference should be such as would enable the Commission to wipe off any stain which has been cast on those concerned, if they should, after investigating the matter, come to the conclusion that it is right that it should be done and in order that the public feeling should be allayed.

" My Lord, it has distressed the people of the Punjab and of India that after the great war, after the loyal services rendered by the people of the Punjab, after the loyal services rendered by India—and we have been repeatedly told that the Punjab has borne the foremost share in the sacrifices made, and that her sacrifices have been appreciated by everybody who knows the fact—it has distressed us all to think that this province should be visited by such a terrible calamity, almost before the war has come to an end. The total number of persons who have been arrested has not been found out by the Government, though several months have passed; yet the number that has been announced by the Hon'ble the Home Member is distressing to think of. I have visited the Lahore Central jail and the Borstal jail on three occasions, and I was grieved to find that men, good men, any of whom might get a seat in this Council, men as honourable as any member of this Council, were rotting in those jails for no fault of their own, for no guilt of their own. I feel that this is a situation that calls for the most searching and impartial inquiry—an inquiry that should command complete public confidence, that would silence the tongue of calumny, silence false rumours and establish that Government does not favour anything except truth and justice; establish that the Government are as solicitous for the life and the honour of every single Indian subject of His Majesty as they are of the life and honour of every European subject of His Majesty. This demands, my Lord, a commission of the character which I have indicated. It is for these reasons that I move this Resolution, being thoroughly dissatisfied with the constitution of the Committee as announced and with its terms of reference. I hope the Government will consider the matter in the light in which I have presented it. I have no wish to embarrass the Government. I tried to modify my Resolution, but I will not speak about it now. I have indicated in my speech measures which might make the Committee satisfactory. I have suggested a modification which will make it unnecessary for the Government entirely to remodel the Committee, by means of a reasonable addition in one respect, and a reasonable extension in another. As this does not evidently commend itself to your Excellency's Government, I must press for the acceptance of my Resolution that a Commission, not a Committee, should be constituted on the lines I have indicated, with the instructions which I have indicated, including the power to recommend that any conviction might be annulled."

His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor:—"My Lord, I should like with your permission, to make a few remarks before this debate comes to an end. 1-25 P.M.

"In considering the steps which have been taken to deal with the recent disturbances, we must, I think, bear in mind the warning which your Excellency gave us at the first meeting of this Session against the tendency, now that the disturbances have been quelled, to minimise their gravity. I do not think that even while the disturbances were in progress people in other parts of India fully realised how extremely serious they were, and now that peace has been restored, there are a good many people inside the Province and outside it who have persuaded themselves that nothing very serious occurred. I have had an opportunity of meeting the chief citizens of two of the towns in which the more serious disturbances occurred. On both occasions I have had to bring to their memory the gravity of the danger through which they passed. If the disturbances had not been met with the utmost rapidity, had they been allowed to proceed a little further than they did, the lives and property of all classes, more especially of the trading classes in the central Punjab, and possibly in other areas extending even beyond the Province, would have been in the most imminent danger. The Province has escaped, and very narrowly escaped, a most serious catastrophe.

"The Hon'ble Member has spoken a good deal about the sentences passed by martial law commissions A good deal can be said about them, but I shall at present only say a few words in order to dispel any misapprehension there may be about the attitude which the Government has hitherto adopted in the matter. As regards the findings of these commissions, it must be remembered that they represent the opinion, the unanimous opinion, of three experienced officers, who had the accused and the witnesses before them and heard what had to be said on either side. It is only in cases where there is patent and incontestable evidence of error that findings of this kind can be upset by an executive authority, and although I have examined many cases, I have not found one in which I felt justified in impugning the substantial accuracy of the findings of the Court.

"As regards the sentences I think things are different The Courts were in a great many cases bound by the law to pass the severest form of sentences. They were influenced in a large number of cases, and I think justifiably influenced, by a sense of the great danger to which the persons before them had so recently exposed the country. It is always open to the Government in such cases to adopt a more extended view and to look upon punishments with regard to their aggregate effect. Where it feels it can reduce the sentences without unduly weakening their deterrent influence, it is justified—and where the numbers concerned are considerable, it is more than justified—in ordering a reduction. The sentences passed on the Ghadr revolutionaries in 1915 were in this way reduced by my distinguished predecessor and in the case of such recent sentences as came before him before he left the country, he had himself ordered a considerable number of reductions. To what extent and at what time he would have conducted a general review of these sentences, if he had stayed in the country, I cannot say, but I have reason to believe that after a suitable interval had elapsed, a review would have been undertaken by him. I have myself found that it was possible to effect reductions very shortly after quiet was restored, and I recognise that in doing so I have undertaken a considerable risk. The reductions have, however, served to show that the Government in punishing disturbers of order has no desire to be oppressive or vindictive, and they have helped to ease the tension which has inevitably sprung from the events of April last. They have been made in the hope that the old feelings of confidence between the Government and the people which the sudden upheaval of last April had so violently interrupted might be restored, and if in this hope we are, as I trust we shall not be, disappointed, it will not be for want of anxious effort on the part of the Government.

"I would in all earnestness ask the Council to appreciate the attitude which the Government has adopted. We cannot let past outrages go unpunished, but we are doing what we can to restore good feeling, and to bring things back to normal and peaceful conditions, and the least we can ask from those who have the interests of the country at heart is that they should aid and not impede us in our task."

1-31 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum:—"My Lord, I stand here to-day as a representative elected by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, but in speaking I speak not only for the Chamber but also for the great European community scattered throughout the provinces of India. And what is that community? It is a community as truly of the citizenship of India as any community in India. It has been said that we are simply foreigners who come to India to make what money we can in a few years out of the Indians and then go and spend it in England. My own position, my Lord, I will explain to the Council and ask them to judge. My father lived, worked and died in India. For twenty years I have worked in India. My children have been born in India, and I hope that my sons will come back and work in India. The money that I have inherited and the money which I have earned is all invested in India's trade and commerce, and as long as I live it will be so invested. And my position is simply that of many of the thousands of the European community who are scattered throughout India, and as such we claim citizenship of India and the right of protection. We are as solicitous for the future of India, for her material welfare and prosperity, as any other member of your Excellency's Council But, my Lord, with regard to what has happened in the Punjab, it is we who are the aggrieved parties. The Hon'ble Pandit has told us, and I believe with all sincerity, how much he regrets the murders, the sacrilege of churches and the destruction of property which have taken place. But that does not alter the fact that these murders did take place, that churches were burnt, and that property belonging to Europeans was destroyed because it belonged to Europeans. And so, my Lord, (we have the right not only to claim the protection of Government for those Europeans scattered all over India, but also must we be given some assurance that occurrences such as have happened in the Punjab will not happen again.

"My Lord, the Hon'ble Pandit paid a very just tribute to the good work which Sir Edward Maclagan is now doing in the Punjab. But I consider that India also should be thankful and should pay a tribute to his predecessor, Sir Michael O'Dwyer because it was all important for India that at that very serious time she had in the Punjab a man of the courageous fearlessness, of the justice and of the determination of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, and on behalf of the European community, I wish to thank him for the prompt measures which he took in quelling the disturbances. And, further, I wish to thank those officials of the Punjab, both European and Indian, who did their duty and stuck to their posts when circumstances were so much against many of them.

"I should like to allude, my Lord, to the behaviour of His Majesty's Army in the Punjab . . . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"May I rise to a point of order, my Lord? I did not want to go into details regarding the work of His Majesty's forces in the Punjab, and I doubt whether any of the Hon'ble Member's remarks are pertinent here. I have avoided, so far as I could all reference to facts which are to be inquired into by the Committee of Inquiry (Laughter) . . . . . . 1-36 P.M.

The President :—"It is impossible for me to hear what the Hon'ble Member is saying if his voice is drowned by laughter."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"A little levity is sometimes unfortunately imported even into the most solemn discussions. I have avoided going into those facts of a cardinal character which would establish whether Sir Michael O'Dwyer was responsible for creating the serious time referred to by the Hon'ble Member or not, and whether His Majesty's forces had done well or not. I have avoided all reference to these details, and I would suggest that Hon'ble Members may discuss the Resolution on the grounds I have put forward. I think it would be unfair to the Committee of Inquiry to prejudge matters which have been referred to them, but I put this before your Excellency so that the blame for importing these matters into the discussion may not rest upon me."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—"My Lord, I think also that the thanks of my community are due to His Majesty's Army in India, both European, Sikh, Muhammadan and Gurkha, who in spite of the greatest provocation behaved with a restraint and discipline which will be a model to the Army in India for ever afterwards. 1-37 P.M.

"Now, my Lord, I cannot help thinking that instead of the Hon'ble Pandit having moved this Resolution that I should have moved it as a member of the European community, and it seems to me that the wording of the Resolution is wrong. The Resolution asks for the annulment and modification of sentences on those who have already been convicted of murder, arson and sacrilege. My Lord, rather surely should the Resolution have asked that reparation should be made for the lives that have been lost and the properties that have been destroyed, and I would ask that in the terms of reference to the Committee of Inquiry which your Lordship has appointed, there should be included the question of reparation for those who have suffered, the question of who is to pay for this reparation, and the question as to how the scattered European community is to be safeguarded in the future. My Lord, I would go further, and ask that as this is a matter which concerns my community so deeply, your Excellency may be pleased to add to this Committee a member of the non-official European community. My Lord, the Committee consists of two eminent Judges, a member of your Excellency's Government, a distinguished soldier and two members of the Indian community. All that I ask is, that we non-official Europeans should also be represented, and since the Hon'ble Mover of the Resolution has asked that the Commission should consist of gentlemen unconnected with the Indian administration, I think that he at least can take no objection to my request."

1-40 P.M. The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi :— "My Lord, I think I would be failing in my duty if I were not to speak a few words in connection with the present Resolution. It is the barest truth to say that the recent happenings in the Punjab have grieved people all over India. The loyal and law-abiding section of the Indian community very much deplores the excesses committed by the mob in this province. But there is also a strong feeling, even among the most considerate and sober-minded, that the retribution visited on the people of the Punjab has been unduly severe and undiscriminating. A policy of conciliation and clemency has no doubt been adopted lately, but it has not succeeded in appeasing the public mind altogether. It is a matter of satisfaction that, in response to the public demand for an inquiry, Government have thought fit to appoint a Committee, as was announced by your Excellency the other day. The personnel of the Committee seems, however, to admit of improvement, and I would implore your Excellency's Government to strengthen it by the addition of a few more non-official Indian Members possessing public confidence. There is also a general desire that the terms of reference should be more comprehensive, so as to include individual cases. I venture to suggest that the disturbances in Calcutta should be included within the scope of this inquiry."

1-42 P.M. The Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan :—"My Lord, the request for the Commission of Inquiry ought to have come from a Punjabi who knew all that happened in the Province and not from an outsider. We have sufficiently suffered from the help extended to us from other Provinces. Most of the well-wishers and inhabitants of our Province are against the holding of any inquiry whatsoever, as they feel it may pour oil on the fast dwindling fire, and even the private inquiry of some gentlemen was resented by the people when some of the newspapers voiced their feelings.

"I also hope that the element of the public men from outside would not be further added to the Commission of these inquiries to enhance our troubles. If any other Indian is to be added to meet the wishes of some of the Members, I suggest that he may be a Sikh from Punjab, as most of the disturbances took place in the area mostly inhabited by the Sikhs, and as there was a Hindoo and a Muhammadan Member already on the Commission, the appointment will be welcomed by that community. The appointment of a Punjabi with the knowledge of the language of the Province, as well as with the first-hand knowledge of affairs not dependent on the misleading reports and extremist papers, will be of much value to the Commission. As I had worked throughout the disturbances as well as at the Frontier troubles, I wanted to deal at length about the close connection of the two and the origin and gravity of the situation as well as the minute plans, of those who wanted to prove their threats as genuine. I refrain from bringing forward any facts and reserve them for a future date when I hope to review the situation and try to prove what would have been the inevitable result if prompt measures had not immediately been taken."

The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal :—" My Lord, I am quite new to this Council and equally new to what happened in the Punjab. The affairs in the Punjab of course concern, as my friend just said, those people who can very well deal with them with some experience and not myself. Ever since I became a member of this Legislative Council, I have had a chance of visiting several provinces. To begin with I had to go to Calcutta, where I met certain gentlemen of importance who laid great emphasis on the serious nature of the sentences that were passed against certain people in the Punjab, but when I visited the Punjab, I met certain gentlemen who were on the spot and they told me a different story altogether. There are different views and different opinions, and as I have already said, I am quite new to this and may only refer to a report of the Marwari Association which was published last year, in which they have dealt with similar riots which took place in Calcutta. They say in connection with the riots which occurred last year :—' Armed military and police forces were present from the beginning, but they were powerless to control the rioters, knowing that neither the military nor the police could or would fire upon them at once, they openly snapped their fingers at them, pelted stones at them, wounded some of the high officers of the police, besides a number of constables, and went on committing dastardly crimes under the very eyes of the police and the military.' 1-45 P.M.

" They further say : ' Both the military and the police tried to control the situation, but a little exercise of power in time could have nipped the disturbance in the bud, or at least would have had a wholesome effect on the rioters, for ultimately exercise of power and force became unavoidably necessary to bring the rioters to their senses.' My Lord, I imagine that certain disturbances have also taken place in the Punjab, and probably the action which was taken by the Government was thought quite desirable then, and had the necessary wholesome effect. I have heard a lot also about the seriousness of the situation which then arose though most of the papers ignore this, and I hear nothing from them about it. It is possible that certain actions of the Government might have been a little bit serious, as also the action of the mob which was in great fury then. I suppose, however, everybody has got confidence, just as the Hon'ble Mover of the Resolution said, in the goodness and the policy of clemency exercised by the present Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, and therefore in view of the Commission that is coming, as already pointed out by your Excellency, to report on the causes of, and the measures taken to cope with, the recent disturbances in the Punjab and the Bombay Presidency, I am not prepared to support the Resolution as it stands."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—" My Lord, your Excellency in your opening speech on the 3rd has rightly given us a warning that nothing that we may do either here or outside should create or embitter the feeling of the various communities in India, and in view of the appointment of the Commission which has been announced by your Excellency, I think it would not be pertinent to make any remarks in detail with regard to our views of the occurrences in the Punjab. But I should be failing in my duty if I did not express in the Council the views of a vast majority of my countrymen, educated as well as uneducated, with regard to the happenings in the Punjab in so far as they have a bearing upon the Resolution in question. Every one whom I have heard deplores greatly the excesses of the mob in the Punjab, the violence and distemper exhibited and the disastrous consequences to European life and property, and I associate myself with what has been said by the Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya with regard to the keen regret of the country as regards those occurrences. Whether some of the later occurrences, or even all those occurrences were not the result of some of the measures taken either then or a little while previously are questions which will come up before the Committee, and I therefore think it would not be right to express an opinion on that question. 1-49 P.M.

"But with regard to the first part of the Resolution raised by my friend, there is something to be said and I hope your Excellency will not take us amiss when we express our view that it might have been desirable and even now would be desirable if a Commission from England, consisting it may be exclusively of Englishmen from there, were to inquire into these Punjab occurrences. Your Excellency will remember that a large part of the Indian public, while deploring the excesses, doubted and doubts whether the circumstances warranted the declaration of a state of war or open rebellion.

"The question is one which, I think, would have to be inquired into by the Committee, and the views of the Government of India and the Resolution of the Government of India may have to be canvassed. We are thankful to your Excellency for taking the initiative and appointing this Committee showing thereby complete confidence in your own honesty and integrity which nobody has ever doubted. But there are many who have doubted and still doubt on reasonable grounds as to whether the Government has not on one-sided reports been thrown into a state of panic and cast an unmerited slur upon the loyalty of vast sections of people in the Punjab and possibly elsewhere. Therefore, it would have been desirable if a Commission entirely unconnected with India, with fresh minds, had been appointed by His Majesty's Government at home to inquire into these questions, because the questions relating to the Punjab are not, as my friend the Hon'ble Sir Umar Hayat Khan thought, connected only with the Punjab, but are of an all-India or imperial character. It is with great distress of mind and regret that I have to state that, rightly or wrongly—and I hope sincerely, that the Committee will find that the opinion is wrong—rightly or wrongly, there is an impression abroad that British justice has never sunk so low as during the past few months, and nothing has distressed us so much, because we, who believe in the continuance of the British connection with India, have set great store upon the prestige of the British race, upon their reputation for integrity and for justice; and it has saddened us that that tie was being weakened by the events which took place in the Punjab. It would have been well, therefore, if the Committee had consisted exclusively of Britishers fresh from England, and if the Commission had been appointed by the Government at home to inquire into these questions and the Report had been made to His Majesty's Secretary of State. However, it may not be too late even now. The Government of India has shown its good faith in starting the inquiry itself, and there would be nothing to prevent them from asking His Majesty's Government to clear the doubts and fears of the Indian people. I was very glad to hear that my friend from Bengal owns his Indian citizenship. Nobody has ever doubted it. Nobody has ever doubted that there are large numbers of Britishers in India who are as proud of being Indian citizens as we are ourselves, and I agree with him that everything that is possible should be done to safeguard their lives and properties, especially as they are scattered all over India. But, my Lord, may I point out to the Council that what the people of India object to is not the swift, speedy, stern punishment of the offenders who are responsible for crimes, but to what they believe to be the use of Prussian methods of terrorism in order to inspire fear in the Indian mind when the European is approached. It is a continuance of that old spirit which we thought had ended and would end with the war that the Indian people fear so much; and if the European community does not back up the theories and doctrines supported by some of the Anglo-Indian papers and does not believe in methods of stern vengeance, I am sure everyone will cordially echo what was expressed by my friend the Hon'ble Mr. Crum. It is that question again which is one of the crucial questions which will have to be investigated by this Committee, the question, namely, not as to whether a few more than the really guilty had suffered or not—in every disturbance of this sort ideal justice cannot be dispensed and in administering speedy justice you must punish the innocent as well as the guilty—but the question is whether the methods that had been adopted were adopted with a view to mete out justice or perpetuate the old pernicious methods of upholding prestige even if terrorisim has to be employed. I therefore think that Indian confidence in British justice and integrity might be greatly restored—and that is the real point to be gained now—by the appointment of such a Committee as has been prayed for by my friend the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya.

" Then, as regards the question as to whether the Committee should be invested with power to annul sentences, there are of course legal and technical difficulties no doubt, but it may be permissible to authorise the Committee to make recommendations in this respect. With due respect I venture to say that we who have been trained in the administration of justice and who have been assisting the administration of justice have looked in vain in what appear in the newspapers as judgments in these cases, for materials to judge whether these sentences were right or wrong, whether the convictions were right or wrong, and in the few cases in which lengthy judgments have been written, I may venture to say that they have left the vast majority of lawyers as well as non-lawyers unconvinced and they have been forced to the conclusion that it would have been impossible to expect a British Court of justice to convict men on such flimsy materials as apparently formed the basis of such judgments. I hope the Punjab Government and the Government of India had ampler materials than were furnished to the public on which they could come to a decision as to whether the convictions were right or wrong. I hope one day the materials will be published and the public will be shown that they were absolutely in the wrong. But, so far as the materials in the hands of the public go, I can boldly state that, on the materials furnished and on the judgments, it would be impossible to justify any confidence in the conclusions, I would say, of the Hon'ble Judges who tried these cases. I am not going to impute motives. All of us are human; when we are perturbed by our feelings we are apt to have our judgments misled, and it may be therefore that in the disturbed Punjab of 1919 the atmosphere was too vitiated to permit correct conclusions to be come to. But the Government of India have materials, I hope, and, I think, it would not be wrong for us to recommend that this Committee should go into that question and make recommendations not simply as to whether the sentences should be reduced, but as to whether the convictions should be upheld. After all the Privy Council may be technical and justice may not be administered. I repeat again that the true foundation of the British connection lies in the confidence of the people in British justice and in British methods, and I hope that in accepting a portion of the Resolution the Government would not be doing wrong in attempting to restore that confidence."

The President :—" The Council will now adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock when Legislative business will be taken. The discussion of this Resolution will be continued on Friday, the 12th. If, by any chance, we finish the Legislative business down for to-morrow, of course we shall continue the discussion of this Resolution."

The Council then adjourned to Thursday, the 11th September 1919, at 11 A.M.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

(5 & 6 Geo. V, Ch. 61.)

The Council met at the Council Chamber, Viceregal Lodge, Simla, on Thursday, the 11th September, 1919.

PRESENT:

His Excellency BARON CHELMSFORD, P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., G.C.M.G., G.C.B.E., Viceroy and Governor General, presiding, and 52 Members, of whom 44 were Additional Members.

THE INDIAN COINAGE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard:—"My Lord, I beg to move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Indian Coinage Act, 1906. 11 A.M. The object of this Bill is succinctly stated in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, and I need only add a very few words. The object of the measure is to use nickel to a larger extent for our subsidiary coinage and thereby to conserve the available supplies of silver for our rupee coinage, and also, for the future, consequently to reduce our demands on the silver market. We moved some distance in this direction during the course of the war, when we introduced the two-anna nickel coin; this, in spite of some rather gloomy anticipations of our friendly critics at the time, has proved very popular. We thought of going further in this direction by coining four and eight-anna nickel pieces even earlier than we have done, but we were unable to do so for two reasons, firstly, our mints were very much pre-occupied with our rupee coinage and, secondly, nickel, like silver, was unobtainable in any substantial quantities. We are now in a much better position in both these respects. Our critical rupee position has been very greatly ameliorated, and we have secured a very large amount of nickel. We have had numerous complaints, as every Member of this Council knows, during the last eighteen months as to the hardships and grave inconvenience caused by the scarcity of small coin. Well, our mints at the present time are doing their best to make up any lee-way which still remains; recent complaints have been very sporadic and local, and I hope we shall soon be able to remove all causes for complaint on that score.

"The coins which this Bill will enable us to issue are not quite ready for immediate production, but I may explain that the intention is that the four-anna coin should have a waved edge similar to the present one-anna coin, so that they will be easily distinguished from other subsidiary coins; it will be distinguished from the present one-anna coin by reason of its larger size. It is proposed that the eight-anna coin should be round; it will be clearly differentiated in size from the rupee, and as it will be of the same value as the present silver eight-anna piece, no difficulty will arise on account of its similarity with that coin. We propose that these coins should be legal tender up to one rupee; the present legal tender value of our silver half rupee and four annas will be unchanged."

11-5 A.M. The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum:—"My Lord, I have great pleasure in supporting this Bill. When the Bengal Chamber of Commerce submitted their memorandum on currency to the Committee when I was in London, they regarded it as one of the most important features of the future currency of India to make the position, as far as possible, independent of silver, and that coinage of nickel and subsidiary metals should be increased as largely as possible. Speaking from memory I think that the absorption of small coins during the war has been something like an increase from 30 to 270 lakhs of rupees, showing that the Indian public are very anxious to have small coin; and, in view of the fact that there is a very large increase in the circulation of one-rupee notes, it is specially important that an increase should also be made in the small nickel coinage of the country."

The motion was put and agreed to.

11-6 A.M. The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard:—"My Lord I now introduce the Bill and move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE CANTONMENTS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

11-7 A.M. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief:—"My Lord, I beg to move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Cantonments Act, 1910. The purpose of the Bill is clearly set forth in the Statement of Objects and Reasons.

"The Bill embodies two proposals. They are quite unconnected with each other and are only dealt with concurrently for convenience of legislation, because they relate to the same Act.

"The first part of the Bill arose out of a proposal by the United Provinces Government to impose license fees on job porters in the Chakrata cantonment. On an examination of the Cantonments Act, it became evident that insufficient powers existed for the imposition of fees for the grant of licenses to persons carrying on trades and occupations in cantonments. It is accordingly proposed to make specific provision in the Act, empowering the Governor General in Council to make rules which will provide for the grant of licenses to such persons, and for the levy of fees when licenses are so granted. The second portion of the Bill relates to the suppression of prostitution and procuring in cantonments. This, it is needless to say, is a very necessary measure in the interests of the health of the troops. The existing provisions to this end in the Cantonments Act have been found in practice to be inadequate. Certain powers exist under the Defence of India Rules, 1915. These, however, are of a temporary nature and moreover, as explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons, have not been found to be fully effective. In order to secure the object in view, it is accordingly considered necessary to amend the Cantonments Act as now proposed."

The motion was put and agreed to.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief:—"My Lord, I now introduce the Bill, and move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE CINEMATOGRAPH (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Cinematograph Act, 1918. The principal Act was passed recently and will be within the memory of many Members of this Council. We deferred bringing the Act into operation in order to give facilities to the public to meet the new requirements of the law. 11-10 A.M.

"On examining the Act ourselves, however, we found that certain modifications were desirable in order to prevent general inconvenience. I think if I explain the clauses of the Bill very briefly to the Council, they will realise the position better than if I explained it in any other way.

"Clause 2 of the Bill provides for the introduction of the Act piece-meal. The present section allows of the introduction as a whole in any part of India. The effect of that is, that if the Act was brought into force, while films were being examined and until they were certified by an examining authority, there would have been a considerable period during which all exhibitions of cinematographs would have been stopped; great inconvenience to business and to the public would have resulted. We now propose to bring in a Bill piece-meal; first of all to take steps to get the films examined, and then to apply the provisions which apply to exhibiting films.

"Clause 4 is a decentralising provision. In the Act as it stood it was proposed that the Governor General in Council should have power to constitute certain authorities for the examination of films. On reference to Local Governments, it was found that it would be far more convenient if certain Local Governments were given this power, and the Bill has been amended accordingly. The opportunity has been taken to give statutory effect to the undertaking which I gave when the Bill was passed, that if the examining authority, is a Board of two or more persons, then not more than half of that Board shall be officials.

"The remaining sub-clauses of this Bill are, I think, really consequential; at any rate, it is not necessary for me to detain the Council at present further in respect of them. If any Hon'ble Member wishes to discuss any point in the Bill with me, I shall be very pleased to give him further information."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I beg to introduce the Bill, and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE INDIAN COMPANIES RESTRICTION REPEALING BILL.

11-14 A.M. The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard :—" My Lord, I beg to move for leave to introduce a Bill to remove the restrictions imposed on the withdrawal of capital from the money markets by Companies. It is very desirable to withdraw all the measures of control which were necessitated during the war as early as possible. My own feeling is that in each case the onus is on Government to establish that justification remains for retaining control. Unfortunately in many cases it is more difficult to demobilise control than it was in the first place to impose it. But, in the present instance, fortunately that difficulty does not exist, and though the existing Act would have died in the natural course in a few months' time, we have thought it desirable to take this opportunity to kill it at once. I think I may say that since the armistice we have been granting licenses freely, possibly too freely. The actual amount of the new capital for which licenses were issued by Government up to the end of December last was 29 crores ; since then licenses have been issued for the flotation of capital amounting to 76 crores. But though we have disposed of these as expeditiously as possible, we recognise that some delay and inconvenience must necessarily be entailed to Companies which have to prepare applications for us, and that they are put to a good deal of trouble in that connection.

" But while I think that this Act can suitably be repealed now, there is one word of warning I should like to utter. These huge figures I have mentioned show that a great deal of capital is at present forthcoming, but they do not show at all whether that capital is at present being devoted to suitable objects or the reverse. We have not exercised any scrutiny in recent months as to the inherent soundness of these Companies. Generally speaking, we have merely considered whether there were strong grounds for interfering with them or not, and we have not interfered with them except in the case of obviously 'kiteflying' Companies. For example, there was an Aviation Company with a capital of 2 lakhs.

" Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy at the last half-yearly meeting of the Bank of Bombay made some remarks which seem very relevant in this connection. He said : 'It seems necessary to caution the investing public against rushing into every new venture that is put on the market without knowing something about it.' Company promoting, divested of its speculative nature, deserves to be encouraged, but there is a danger that the present movement will be overdone and that it will lead to trouble in the future.' The only criticism that I have to make with regard to Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy's remarks is that they appear to me, if possible, to have understated the danger. It is very important that investors should not encourage flat-catching promoters by helping them to unload more or less worthless shares on the public. I am not so much concerned with the fate of the individual investors in such Companies, who may be left to 'hold the baby,' as with the effect that the collapse of Companies of the kind may have on the investing public as a whole and the possible danger that investments in sound enterprises will thereby be discouraged.

" I may say that I have heard that a good many Companies have been in the habit of placing in the forefront of their advertisements the fact that the Government of India have issued licenses to them under the Act. From what I have said it will be seen that that in itself is no testimony to their soundness, and an intending investor would do well to scrutinise the soundness of a new Company, in which he thinks of investing, on its merits."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—" My Lord, this Act was started 11-19 A.M. at a time when it was absolutely necessary to get in as much money as possible for national purposes. It has outgrown its usefulness and, I think, it is unnecessary that it should any longer be continued. It naturally imposed certain restrictions on Companies which are in themselves in every way admirable, and considerable delay has occurred, not lately but earlier in getting leave to float Companies. Latterly, as Mr. Howard remarked, the use of this Act has assumed rather a serious aspect and in the case of several Companies, the fact that Government have allowed the flotation of the Company, as Mr. Howard says, has been used really as an advertisement. There is no question about it that there is a serious danger of the public being misled into believing that the Government have carefully scrutinised the Company and approved of its flotation before it has actually granted leave for the flotation. I thoroughly endorse what Mr. Howard said regarding the speculation that is going on at present over Companies floated in India. There has been a tremendous boom of industrial progress. I think Mr. Howard said that the majority of the Companies were unsound or words to that effect...............

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard :—" I did not wish to convey that impression."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—" I think the majority of the Companies are thoroughly sound. But I doubt whether there is a single one of these Companies whose shares have gone to an enormous premium which is really worth the premium.

"We have a large number of Companies being floated with very large sums as capital, some of them excellent Companies no doubt in themselves, but in which the rise in the price of shares cannot be justified, and I would like to add my opinion to what the Hon'ble Mr. Howard has already said as regards warning the public against paying these excessive premia for shares of any kind whether they are sound or unsound."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha :—" My Lord, I entirely agree 11-21 A.M. with what has fallen from the Hon'ble Mr. Crum, and coming as I do from Bombay, where there is going on the greatest promotion of Companies and speculation in their shares, too, is very rife, I think a little warning of a determinate kind from Government would be very good. A large number of industrial concerns have been floated in Bombay, and as Mr. Crum has rightly said—of course he has not referred to Bombay—premium on the shares of these new Companies goes up in no time, aye even before a single brick foundation-stone of the concern is laid. Or even before the first call of Rs. 5 or Rs. 10 is made, the premium goes up to Rs. 20, Rs. 30, Rs. 40 and Rs. 100. This is really a very unsound state of affairs, and I believe that it is more the fault of the investors themselves and of nobody else. The Company promoters as a body of course are benefited. They put as much money as they can into their pockets. They under-write the shares of the particular Companies, and of course employ brokers who go and rig the market, after allotting all the shares for themselves and their friends. The promoters thereafter begin to sell their shares to the public at a premium. Everybody tries to grab at a few hundred shares of this or that Company. Meanwhile what happens is this; that while speculation is being fed by these Company promoters, premium goes very high, and they seize the opportunity to unload their shares at a profit and fill their own pockets. Now it is not the first time that such a thing has happened in Bombay. I am a very old man, and I remember very well as a young boy of 20 the feverish speculation that took place in Bombay in 1864-65 during the last two years of the American Civil War, when something like 50 Financial Associations and about 20 Banks or so were established, thanks to the 50 crores of silver and gold thrown in the lap of the cotton merchants as their colossal profits. I wrote specially some ten years ago a book on the mania of share speculation which is considered a standard book, because it is the only historical work that has ever been published; I specially related there all about the history of the causes which brought the old Bank of Bombay to grief and ruin. Of course, at that time the movement was led by a bold man like Premchand Roychand, who was the Albert Grant of those days. To-day there are several people like Premchand who fan most wildly the speculative flame. But I do believe, my Lord, that it would be a very wise thing were the Government to consider whether the Companies Act should not still be amended in a further way so as to restrict this kind of speculation by Company promoters. Of course, it is more a matter for those packs of geese who are called investors. The promoters' vocation would be easily gone were the geese not so foolish and credulous. The whole situation is this. The investing people are ignorant, credulous and very greedy of pocketting money. Some of them think that they can take a hundred rupees in the morning in their pocket and bring Rs. 200 in the evening. Thousands of people were ruined after the collapse of the mania of 1864-65. Immense properties and estates went to rack and ruin. Their owners never recovered. That was the aftermath. I gave a warning the other day to an audience where I presided that they had better be careful because the crash was sure to come and then they would feel the pinch. But whatever may be done, I think some sort of check should be devised by the Government so that this kind of speculation may be greatly abated, particularly restricting those astute promoters of Companies who are of course the greatest gainers in speculation of this kind and therefore the worst sinners. I am very glad that the Hon'ble Mr. Howard has referred to this to-day in his opening remarks. As far as the speculation of withdrawal or remobilisation of capital is concerned it has my hearty approval. The industrial regeneration of the country on a sound industrial basis is infinitely better than this sort of mere promotion of Companies for purposes of speculation. Industrial concerns on sound lines are to be welcomed, but the speculative mushroom concerns must be wholly deprecated."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard:—"My Lord, I now introduce the Bill, and move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

THE INDIAN MERCHANT SHIPPING LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

11-27 A.M. The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"My Lord, I beg to move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Indian Merchant Shipping Acts, 1859 and 1883. It is difficult to add anything to the clear statement as to the effect of the Bill which is set out in the Statement of Objects and Reasons. The measure is a very simple one, and, I think, all Hon'ble Members will agree, entirely uncontroversial. Section 114 of the Indian Merchant Shipping Act, 1859, and section 5 of the Indian Merchant Shipping Act, 1883, both exclude from the operation of the Act ships belonging to, or in the service of, His Majesty or the Government of India, or belonging to any foreign Prince or State. It is not very clear how the words 'in the service of' came to be inserted, especially as they are absent from the corresponding provisions of the English law; but the effect is that the exemption covers vessels which have been temporarily hired for transport or other purposes, as well as ships owned by Government. In practice this exemption has been found to be very inconvenient, in so far as it precludes investigations being made into shipping casualties occurring in connection with hired transports, and also precludes suitable disciplinary measures being taken against officers and crews of such vessels who may have been in fault. The object of the Bill is to confine the exemption strictly to shipping belonging to His Majesty or to the Government of India.

"It may perhaps be well to give Hon'ble Members an example of the inconvenience which has arisen, and which the Bill is intended to remedy. Accidents have from time to time occurred in the docks at Bombay and elsewhere in India to merchant vessels temporarily hired as transports. One, for example, while proceeding to her berth in the Alexandra docks to embark troops, owing to the engines of the ship being put full speed ahead instead of full speed astern, collided with the dock wall and damaged her hull. It is obviously desirable that a casualty of this kind should be inquired into in the ordinary way under the Indian Merchant Shipping Acts, and the certificate of any of the ship's officers who might be found to be in fault ought obviously to be dealt with. But, as the law now stands, no inquiry can be held. The whole effect of the Bill is to leave out the words 'in the service of' which now stand part of the two sections referred to above. My Lord, I beg to move that leave may be given to introduce the Bill."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"My Lord, I beg to introduce the Bill, and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

THE INDIAN TARIFF (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"My Lord, I beg to move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Indian Tariff Act, 1894. The effect of this Bill can be stated in a very few words. It is to impose an export duty of 15 per cent on hides and skins with a rebate of 10 per cent on hides and skins exported to other parts of the Empire, and there tanned. Its object is to ensure that our hides and skins shall be converted into fully tanned leather or articles of leather so far as possible in India, and failing this in other parts of the Empire, instead of being exported in a raw state for manufacture in foreign countries. 11-31 A.M.

"I need not take up the time of Hon'ble Members with any detailed account of the history of the hide and skin trade in India. It is common knowledge to all Hon'ble Members that before the war the hide trade was monopolised by the Germans, and at that time the tanning trade in India was comparatively very small. Great changes were brought about by the war. Immense quantities of leather were required for war purposes,—for soldiers' boots, for saddlery, and for equipment of various kinds, and sufficient tanneries for converting the hides into leather were not available outside Germany. The result was that tanneries for this purpose sprang into existence in India under the guidance and with the friendly assistance of the Indian Munitions Board. In this way India rendered an immense service to Great Britain and her Allies in the war, and incidentally greatly benefited herself. While the tanning of hides in India was fostered and stimulated by war requirements, the tanning of skins was injured, for it was found necessary to divert the energies of the skin tanners to the tanning of hides for military requirements. In fact during part of the war it was unfortunately necessary to prohibit absolutely the tanning of skins.

"The present position is that we have in India at the present time some hundreds of tanneries for the tanning of hides, a large number of which have come into existence in order to satisfy military requirements during the war. We have in fact the foundations of a flourishing tanning industry, but there is reason to fear that it may tend to dwindle and disappear with the diminution of military requirements, if some other support is not given. We want to keep this industry alive, and we believe that in this case protection in the shape of a 15 per cent export duty is justifiable and ought to be effective. It is clearly just also that the same measure of protection should be extended to the tanners of skins whose business, as I have already stated, was injured by the necessities of the war.

"Though Indian tanneries have enormously increased in number during the past three years, they can only deal with a comparatively small proportion of the raw hides and skins which India produces, and it is to the advantage of India and the security of the Empire generally that this large surplus should, so far as possible, be tanned within the Empire, and with this end in view the Bill proposes a 10 per cent rebate in respect of hides and skins exported to any place within the Empire. I should add that it is proposed to limit by notification the benefit of this rebate to hides and skins actually tanned within the Empire; and Indian hides and skins re-exported from an Empire port for the purpose of being tanned abroad will not be entitled to any rebate.

"I need not tell you, my Lord, that the effect of the Bill on the producers of raw hides and skins has been most carefully examined by our expert advisers. We have no desire to benefit Indian tanners at the expense of Indian cattleowners or dealers in hides and skins. We are advised that the world demand for Indian hides and skins is so great that there is no risk of any injury being done. We have no cause to be afraid of the competition of the raw hides and skins from other countries in the world's leather market. India has almost a monopoly in respect of skins; and produces such a very large proportion of the lighter type of hides, which are by far the most suitable for certain purposes, that the world will never be able to do without Indian hides in one form or another.

"In conclusion, the Bill is an effort to keep the tanning industry on its feet. The next few years will be years of difficulty and danger owing to the changed conditions and reduced demands for the Army, but when these years are past, I believe that the future holds out the promise of great possibilities for the tanning industry in India. We have the hides, the skins and practically all the tanning materials ready to our hands and an almost unlimited world demand for leather. It is one of the most promising Indian industries, and we hope that the beginning which has been so well made has a bright and successful future before it. I beg to move for leave to introduce the Bill."

11-33 A.M. The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum:—"My Lord, on behalf of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce I have much pleasure in supporting this Bill. As long ago as 1917, when a Conference of the Chambers was held in Delhi, this Conference recommended that any industries which can be regarded as 'key' industries should be supported. Again, in April of this year, the Madras Chamber of Commerce, I understand, wrote a letter to the Government of India proposing a duty on the export of raw hides and skins, and this was backed by a letter on the 9th of May from the Southern India Skin and Hides Merchants Association, an association entirely of Indian tanners, further supporting the proposal. I understand also that the Bombay and Upper India Chambers supported the proposal.

" Now, my Lord, I would like to quote two authorities on this question, because it is a matter of introducing into India what is really a new principle. A great supporter of free trade, Mills, writes to the following effect. It is his opinion that ' it is legitimate on principles of political economy to protect an infant industry in the hope of naturalising a foreign industry, provided that in itself it is suited to the circumstances of the country.' He says that ' It cannot be expected that individuals should, at their own risk, bear the burden of carrying out new manufactures until educated up to the level of those with whom the processes are traditional. The duty, however, should be imposed subject to the conditions that circumstances in the protecting country are really favourable to the industry, and therefore that it can be withdrawn when it has achieved its object.'

" Now, the Hon'ble Member has told Members of this Council that this country is as favourably situated as any other for the process of tanning. That is evident from the fact that it has been an indigenous industry in India for a great many years, and that there are in various parts of India, especially in Madras and Bombay, a very large number of small tanneries, small Indian tanneries, which in certain classes of leather have been able, so far, to compete with the rest of the world. The supply of hides and skins in India is practically unlimited, and as regards goat skins and sheep skins, goat skins especially, she may be said to control the markets of the world. The supply of tanning barks is also practically unlimited, and new tanning barks are being found every day.

" Further, India is just as rich as any other country in the necessary materials for chemical tanning, that is to say, in the chrome metals which can easily be converted into the salts required for the latest processes of tanning. Now, my Lord, I should like just in that respect to go into figures very shortly. In the quinquennial average for the years 1894-99 India exported 200,000 tanned skins and 92,000 raw skins . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—" Those were bales, I think, not individual skins or hides."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—" Hundredweights I should have said. In 1909-1914 the number of tanned skins had gone down from 200,000 to 137,000 hundredweights and the number of raw skins had increased from 92,000 to 548,000 hundredweights. I think the reason for this is fairly obvious. About this time America took up with great keenness the tanning of raw skins, and she imposed an import duty of 10 per cent on half-tanned leather and 20 per cent on fully tanned leather, and she continued that import duty until the year 1914 by which time her industry had become so strong that she was practically unassailable. I think, therefore, my Lord, that we have got a very good case for putting on a duty here from that point of view alone, and I certainly would not propose that the duty should be kept on any longer than is necessary to fairly launch the industry.

" Now, my Lord, my other authority is the Prime Minister. He described the other day a key industry in the following words : ' A product essential for war or for the maintenance of the country during a war. Industry so neglected before the war that there was an inadequate supply of product. Industry about which the Government found it necessary to take special steps during the war. Industry which, if special Government support were withdrawn, could not maintain itself at the level of production essential to national life.' My Lord, I think the tanning of hides and skins within the Empire, as Sir George Barnes has already told us, comes within the meaning of all those four descriptions.

"I have only just had time to glance through the Bill and, as far as that is concerned, it is a very simple Bill, and it seems to me that it should work quite satisfactorily. But there are two points which I would like to bring to the Hon'ble Member's notice. We cannot increase the tanning industry of India unless, somehow or other, we get tanners, and, at the present moment, it is almost impossible to get tanners from England. When I say tanners, I refer to the really expert tanner in the finished article. There are any number of tanners who can tan up to a certain point and tan very well, but they only tan what is known as crust leather which afterwards has to be curried and finished by certain processes in order to make it of actual use to the leather manufacturer, and, as far as I can see, the only possible way in which we can really make sure that the tanning industry in India will be a success, is by educating as large a number of Indians as possible in modern tanning.

"Now, my Lord, we have got a precedent for the suggestion which I am going to make in the Tea Cess. The Tea Cess is largely used for the advertising of Indian tea and generally for improvements in the production of Indian tea. For instance, you have got a chemical staff, a large staff of experts, who do nothing but consider improvements in the fertilising of tea and in the kind of tea which should be sown. I should like to suggest, my Lord, that a part of this duty, which it is proposed to impose, should be set aside for one or two schools of tannery in India, and they would have to be fairly large, that is to say, they would have to be big enough to produce practical tanners. It is no use sending out a man who has learnt the theoretical side of tanning only; he has got to do considerably more than that; he has got to learn the practical and commercial side as well, and these schools would have to be big enough for teaching that. If we had one or two of these schools of tannery located in different parts of India, and if we got out for those schools of tannery a really first-class staff, which staff would have to be imported from England, I am quite sure that within a very few years we should have in India, Indians trained, if they were not absolutely expert tanners, at any rate to the stage of being really good foremen in the tanneries.

"Then there is another point, my Lord, also which I should like to touch on, and that is as regards another use to which this duty might be put. I think it is only right to say that the exporters of raw hides and skins very strongly oppose this Bill, and they oppose it on the grounds chiefly as to the effect that it will have on the Indian producer, that is to say, on the seller of the actual raw hide. Their opinion is that it will mean a reduction in the prices which he receives, and they actually go so far as to say that the export of raw hides will be stopped because of the increase in the duty. Well, Sir George has told us that he does not believe that and that his expert tanner has given his opinion against that, and I do not think there is anything in that point. There may be something, probably there is something, in the point that at first the actual producer of the hide will receive less than he got before. Now there is room for very very great improvement in the class of hide which is exported from this country, and it is a matter of teaching the village people in the case of the slaughtered animals to properly flay their hides, and in the case of dead animals to properly preserve them. I am quite satisfied that if part of this import duty was used in propaganda work for the teaching of the producer of the raw article to improve this article that he would very soon get back more than any loss in prices that he might suffer from the export duty being imposed. The tanneries already established and to be established in future in India are interesting, in that they have been started largely by both Europeans and Indians. In Madras, the indigenous tanneries are all Indian. The same is the case in Bombay. In Cawnpore there are both. In Calcutta, one tannery has been started purely by Europeans, i.e., by Messrs. Bird and Co. Sir Nilratan Sircar started a tannery some years ago which is likely to be exceedingly successful. My own firm started a tannery in conjunction with a large Muhammadan firm in Bombay. We equally own the shares. And there is one other European tannery started; while a tanner from Madras, Mr. Chari, probably the best Indian tanner in India, has also started one large chrome tannery in Calcutta and proposes to start another. I think it is, therefore, evident that it is a trade in which Europeans and Indians can combine and work together, and in which the individual knowledge of each will be of great assistance, and for these reasons, my Lord, I have much pleasure in supporting the Bill."

The Hon'ble Mr. N. F. Paton :—" My Lord, on behalf of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce I desire to support this Bill. It is a most welcome departure and if accepted, as I have no doubt it will be, it will prove a landmark in the economic history of India. I look upon it as the first fruits of the labours of the Industries Commission; the first instalment of the support and encouragement which I hope and believe Government will extend in future to the indigenous industries of the country. I trust it is the forerunner of many measures having for their object the industrial regeneration of India." 11-52 A.M.

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur :—" My Lord, I desire not only to support the Bill, but congratulate the Hon'ble Member for Commerce and Industry for introducing this measure at an opportune moment, a new and welcome departure in the administration of tariff." 11-53 A.M.

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha :—" My Lord, I am a convinced free-trader, and in that respect I think I differ from the majority of my own countrymen who are all rank protectionists. I have said it before and I will say it again now, that I am a convinced free-trader; but, at the same time, I have all along for these many years entertained the opinion that young industries require to be protected until they are able to stand on their own legs, and this is one of the industries to which Sir George Barnes has referred. I am very glad to hear that this leather industry is to be protected until such time as Indian tanners are able to stand on their own legs without any crutch of a protecting duty. So far it is all right, and I hope it will be the harbinger of other industries of the same sort, which of course will also be protected until they make India economically more prosperous than before. Mr. Crum referred to the practical part of it, and I admire him very much for the very practical suggestions he has made in the matter, namely, that part of the proceeds of this duty should be employed for a very useful purpose, namely, establishing schools and getting out expert tanners from England. In India there are at the present moment practically no able experts at all. As a matter of fact, I know that for some years in Bombay one or two small traders had established a tannery where they used to cure skins, and at the same time make roller skins which are necessarily used by every mill in India. These roller skins were used in several of our mills, but were found not equal to the best roller skins that they used to get from England; and when we asked the manufacturers themselves what the difference was due to, and whether they could not improve their methods and the quality of their material, we were told that they had not sufficient knowledge; but if encouragement was given by way of expert training they would supply skins equal to the imported quality. Here is thus an instance of Indian manufacturers who have commenced this enterprise, standing in need of Government assistance by way of experts to put it on a proper footing. I therefore support the very practical suggestion made by Mr. Crum, and I hope Sir George Barnes will induce Government, whatever the state of the finances may be, not to sit too tight on the finances, but to set apart part of the duty for this purpose." 11-54 A.M.

11-56 A.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"My Lord, I congratulate the Government most heartily upon this departure from the economic policy which has been pursued so far by it. Every community in India would heartily welcome this Bill as a happy augury of the industrial policy which is to be pursued by the Government, and which has been foreshadowed in the Industrial Commission Report. I, coming from Madras, am singularly interested in this Bill, because it would affect my province, I think, much more than the other provinces. The export trade from our province is very large and the tanners there are more numerous than elsewhere. I have had conversations with hide merchants in Madras on this subject, and there seems to be practical unanimity that this will be a very welcome measure to the trade in Madras, as, I think, it will be elsewhere also. The only question is as to whether the proposed duty goes sufficiently far; that is a matter of detail which will have to be considered later. Even if a duty were to be imposed for purely revenue purposes, I believe it has been asserted in several quarters that we might go so far as 20 per cent without the duty being of a protectionist character. There is, therefore, a question as to whether a 15 per cent duty would be really protectionist in character, but that is a matter of detail. But, my Lord, this duty is proposed to be levied not for revenue purposes but for protectionist purposes and on principle; there is another principle also involved in this Bill which we heartily welcome, and that is that where it is to the interest of the Indian Empire that a particular industry should be fostered, when it is suited to the country, Government will be prepared to protect that industry, even against the interests of other parts of the Empire. That is the principle that is involved here, and we have therefore peculiar cause for gratification and satisfaction and thank the Government which has undertaken this measure. Coming to the question as to whether this would prejudicially affect the agriculturists who are largely interested in the prices that are to be paid for skins, I may submit, my Lord, that so far as my province is concerned, I do not think there would be any dissatisfaction felt. The cry there has been at almost every conference that the export trade has been artificially stimulated by poisoning and killing cattle, very valuable cattle, as meat on a very extensive scale, and if this Bill to a certain extent checks that artificial growth of the export trade, I think no one will welcome it more than the agriculturists themselves. Then, again, judging from the statement of the Hon'ble Member in charge, and the expert investigation which has been bestowed on the matter, there seems to be absolutely no fear that the agriculturists would suffer because we have a monopoly so far as the skin trade is concerned, and that is the view of the Madras merchants. I, therefore, welcome this Bill and thank the Government on behalf of Madras particularly.

"With regard to the suggestions made by the Hon'ble Mr. Crum, we are in hearty agreement therewith. Something has been attempted to be done by the Madras Government and a leather expert has been at work there for some time past. Now a great stimulus would be afforded to the Madras Government by reason of the passing of this Bill, and I daresay steps will be taken to remove any difficulties in the way of the trade, and to place it on a thoroughly sound footing. With regard to the other suggestion, steps have been taken by the Agricultural Department in Madras to try and teach the people, as far as possible, the methods of getting a fair price for skins, and I think funds could not be better utilised than for the propagandist purpose. We thank the representatives of the Chambers of Commerce of Bombay and Bengal for their hearty support and for the sympathetic manner in which they view the industries of India."

12 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, I welcome this Bill so far as it proposes to impose an export duty of 15 per cent on hides and skins, but I say frankly that I do not see any justification for the other proposal, namely, that a rebate shall be given in the case of hides and skins exported to any part of His Majesty's dominions, etc. My Lord, the Hon'ble Sir George Barnes and the Hon'ble Mr. Crum have reminded us that India is situated in a peculiar position in regard to this trade. We produce unfortunately—it is a sad thing that there should be so many hides produced by the brutal murder of cattle, but it is a fact we have to take into account—we produce a large quantity of hides and skins, but having all those hides and skins available to us, having all the tanning barks available to us, having most of the chemicals available or producable, if I may say so, in this country, having an unlimited supply of labour, having a large market at home and having the whole world to export our manufactures to, it seems a tragedy that the Government of India, with its mighty resources for starting a large tannery in this country, should allow the bulk of the hides of the country to go out, and should allow a rebate to certain countries which will import them. My Lord, I think that with the resources the Government possesses, it is high time that the Government of India made up its mind to establish large tanneries in this country, and to establish also large factories for manufacturing leather of the highest kind. The war has shown what the Government of India can do, the Munitions Board have a record of results which have gratified India. It is not beyond the power of the Government of India to lay aside a few crores of rupees and to import experts to do what is needful. The Government of India have got an example in the Tata Steel Works. They did not wait to train all the expert Indians who would be needed in producing the highest kind of steel that was required. They did better; they did what Germany and Japan had done before; they imported most of their experts for their steel trade, and they achieved a success which has earned the plaudits of all people. I can quite understand, as the Hon'ble Mr. Crum pointed out, that it will be impossible to get experts, at any rate for some time, of the best type from England. But let us not take too narrow a view of the matter. Let us not reject the services of outsiders altogether. If their service helps us to raise our own country economically and industrially, it should be accepted. If English tanners of the best type cannot be got, let us not carry our prejudice and hatred so far as to refuse the service of other tanners; I will not say hatred and prejudice, let us not take a narrow view and refuse to take in tanners from other countries.

"My Lord, the next point to consider is, within what time it will be possible to do what I suggest. Assuming that this counsel, which I claim is a counsel of common sense, and not of perfection, assuming that this proposal is acceptable to the Council, in theory at any rate, it will take some considerable time before this can be put into practice. I do not expect otherwise. Works like the Tata Iron and Steel Works could not be built up in a day. But the Government ought to make up its mind as to what it is going to do. If the Government should make up its mind, it will have to consider whether the policy adopted in the Bill is the right one to adopt. If you determine as a matter of duty to the people of India that you will use all the resources of the State in men, money and material to build up a great leather industry in this country within as short a time as possible, then I ask you to pause before you agree to the policy of a rebate. Once you establish vested interests, once you create certain advantages for other parts of the Empire, any later attempt to take away these advantages will be met as furiously as have been met the attempts to prevent the people of Fiji from continuing to exploit Indian labour. If once the other parts of the Empire will obtain the advantage of the rebate, it will be most difficult to get them to give them up. Therefore, I say you should not introduce into this legislation this question of a rebate.

"My Lord, I ask the Government to consider what is our economic and political position. Has any of the many countries indicated shown any desire to help India in any such way in which it is proposed that these countries should be helped by India? I should like to know if any other part of the Empire has offered to allow a rebate on its export duty on articles imported into India. I should like to know in what matters this has been put into practice. No doubt there are proposals that something like this should be done, but I should like to know whether it has anywhere been done. Further, I find that a new and very important element has been introduced into this Bill. I find that the rebate shall be allowed not only in respect of hides and skins exported to any part of His Majesty's dominions or any territories under the protection of His Majesty, but also to those in respect of which a mandate of the League of Nations is exercised by the Government of any part of His Majesty's dominions. We shall therefore be in future not merely under the fiscal Government of the United Kingdom, but also of the Government of the League of Nations. The Resolution which we passed yesterday offering our congratulations and thanks also reminded us that we should expect to enter upon a new era of orderly progressive self-government on a truly democratic basis, under the guidance and protection of a League of Nations. We should wait to see what the League of Nations is going to command us to do in certain matters before we commit ourselves to this large policy. If we do not proceed cautiously, I do not know where we shall be landed. I do not see why India should make a present of 10 per cent. of its export duty on hides and skins to other parts of the Empire. India is a poor country. No country lost 60 lakhs of people from Influenza as India did. That means, my Lord, great and pervading poverty, widespread want of sufficient food and clothing. In this state of things with all the existing taxes that have been imposed upon the people, with all the needs that stare us in the face, in the matter of education and sanitation, and every other kind of advancement, it seems to me that every pie that can be raised by export duties should be reserved and conserved for the people of India. We are not unhappily as rich as some other countries are. If we were, then it might not be a matter of such deep concern. But being the poor people we are, knowing the many needs we have to minister to, our economic situation being what it is, I respectfully ask the Government to pause and to consider whether the part of the Bill which proposes to allow a rebate of two-thirds of the duty levied on hides and skins exported to certain parts of His Majesty's dominions should be retained. We should have some solid ground upon which we are to proceed by way of reciprocity. When the human relations which should subsist between one member and other members of the Empire have been established on a decent footing, it will be time to consider this question. I hope the Government will pause and reconsider this part of the Bill."

12-10 P.M. The Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan:—"My Lord, I welcome the Bill and thank the Government for it. It will greatly benefit my province, especially the Muhammadans."

12-11 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, I do not desire to pose as an expert on this question, but I think some of the remarks of the Hon'ble Pandit can hardly go without a reply, more especially as the Hon'ble Pandit referred to the common sense of this Council. I think the common sense of this Council will agree with me that it is absolutely necessary to have a very definite outlet for the country's surplus hides. Then the Hon'ble Pandit says: 'Oh work your export trade without any rebate'. The only result would be that we should lose our export trade from India. The Hon'ble Pandit knows that India at present takes not more than quite a small proportion of the hides which this country produces, and if we merely maintain a high export duty, we should, if I may adopt the same expression that I have heard him use recently, have the bulk of the trade rotting in certain parts of India, or possibly going to a country with which we have had very unpleasant relations of late. What we desire is to find an outlet for surplus hides, and we propose that that outlet should be within the Empire rather than in the hands of our recent enemies.

"The Hon'ble Pandit also expressed great horror in his speech at the production of hides at all. If I mistake not, he is hardly practising the doctrine he preaches inasmuch as he appears in this Council shod in the produce of the very barbarities which he so stoutly deprecates."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum:—"May I ask the Hon'ble Member one more question, my Lord?" 12-13 P.M.

The President.—"Yes".

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum:—"It is with regard to the date when this Bill should come into operation. I understand that it comes into operation. . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"To-day".

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum:—"But the point, my Lord, is that probably a considerable amount of business has already been done and contracts made for export of hides and skins, and exporters will be at a great disadvantage if the duty were imposed at once. Might I ask that no duty will be imposed as regards the contracts which have already been made if satisfactory proof is forthcoming that bona fide contracts have been made?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"I should like to say one or two words in reply."

The President:—"Is there any other member who wishes to address the Council?"

The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal:—"My Lord, the measure as proposed by the Hon'ble Sir George Barnes will have the support of all classes in India, and as a business man who has some experience of the trade in myrabolams which can largely be used for the preparation of tanning materials, I can assure the Council of your Excellency that the introduction of the Bill further to amend the Indian Tariff Act, 1894, deserves hearty congratulations for your Excellency's Government, and I pray that leave to move the same should unhesitatingly be granted." 12-14 P.M.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"My Lord, I should like to answer the question which the Hon'ble Mr. Crum asked me a minute or two ago. He asked me whether contracts which have already been entered into would be respected, and whether any duty would be imposed on such contracts. I think I can say that all contracts will be respected which are contracts with persons in countries to which export was not prohibited at the time of the imposition of the duty. With regard to the contracts with persons in countries to which the export of hides and skins was prohibited, as at present advised, I think those contracts cannot be respected; but I am willing to consider further any particular case which the Hon'ble Member may put before me. 12-15 P.M.

"My colleagues who sit near me point out that I was obscure throughout my opening speech, in that I never explained the difference between a hide and a skin. A hide, I may say, is the hide of a buffalo or of an ox or cow, and a skin is the skin of a goat or a sheep.

"Then, my Lord, I will deal with the suggestion that the Hon'ble Mr. Crum made that a portion of the proposed duty should be put aside for schools of tannery and for propaganda work having for its object the improvement of hides and skins by more skilful preparation and treatment. I can assure him that his suggestion will be carefully considered.

"My Honourable colleague, Sir George Lowndes, has practically answered all that the Hon'ble Pandit said. But there is one thing that I should like to add. The Hon'ble Pandit urged that Government ought to start large tanneries in this country and large factories for the manufacture of leather. I would like to ask him to consider a little further what that means. First, I must remind him that we have only got a limited amount of money that can be spent on enterprise in this country, and that we want a great deal of money for railways, telegraphs and telephones and for all other purposes of that kind. This being the case the Hon'ble Pandit asks us to put aside money for the purpose of setting up Government tanneries and Government leather factories. It is of course clear that any money spent in that way must come out of the money available for railways and telegraphs and such other purposes. If the Hon'ble Pandit's wish were carried out, the net result would be that Government would go into the business of tanning and of leather manufacture on a large scale, and the result of that again would be that the small tanners, the small Indian tanners in Bengal, the small Indian tanners in Madras, would be crushed out by Government. I do not think that is a good thing at all. I think we ought to rely upon individual effort and try to help individuals to succeed in their business and not to crush them out by Government action.

"Then the Hon'ble Pandit asked what has any other country done for us in the way of giving preference. A preference has in fact been given by Canada, and only last spring in the Imperial Budget a preference of 2*d.* in the £ on tea was given, and in that way the Imperial Government gave up a revenue—I am speaking from memory—of about 2½ million sterling. I should deprecate altogether the view of the Hon'ble Member that we should wait and see as to what other people will do. I think in this particular case it is quite reasonable that we should take the first step, but as a matter of fact, as I have already pointed out, the Imperial Government took the first step in the early part of this year when the Budget for the current year was introduced. My Lord, I now beg leave to introduce the Bill."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes :—" My Lord, I beg to introduce the Bill, and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

12-20 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" I still think, my Lord, that the Bill in the form in which it stands requires further consideration, and in speaking of it once more, I will be very brief and lay stress on a few points only. The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes said that exports will be checked if the high duty of 15 per cent is imposed on hides and skins. Well, do not impose such a high duty if it will check exports. If you act on the principle of doing what is good for India, that will determine the extent or measure of your action in this direction. If such high duty will check exports, then levy a lower duty. That is my answer to the first point taken by the Hon'ble the Law member.

" As regards the second, I am sorry and ashamed that I wear leather shoes. I have canvas shoes but I do not wear them in Council.

" My Lord, I grieve it, I am ashamed that I use leather. When the thought comes to me that some dear creature of God might have been killed, I feel sincerely sorry and ashamed, and my only consolation is that I use as little leather as I can, and that I do not fatten on the destruction of the life of other creatures.

"Then, my Lord, with regard to the argument urged by Sir George Barnes, that only a limited amount of money is available for investment, I did not mean that Government alone should start tanneries and factories. I was wrong, I should have qualified my expression. What I do mean is that Government should encourage the establishment of tanneries and leather factories, and if the Government will take up the matter seriously, India will find money enough to help the growth of this industry. My esteemed friend, Sir George Barnes, has said that there will be a great demand for money in various directions, particularly for railways. That is true; but the railways alone will not absorb all the money available for investment, and we should not think of devoting all the money we can raise to the construction of railways alone, and leave this great question of the development of the hide industry aside. I submit that if the Government will give a lead, if the Government will find out all the information that is available—and the correspondence of the Government of India and the Secretary of State with British tanners does supply a lot of information as the Hon'ble Sir George Barnes knows—I submit if that information is placed before the public and if encouragement and advice and expert assistance are made available to the public, if, that is to say, the Government of India takes up this business as the Government in England are taking up the questions relating to national industries, I believe there will be capital forthcoming to help the growth of tanneries and large leather factories. My Lord, as I said in my other speech, I do not expect this trade to grow at once, it will grow by and by. But I ask the Government to make a new departure, to make up its mind to make a large departure in this direction, so that this trade may grow. I am thankful to be reminded that preference has been given to Indian tea in England. Well, that is good; but Indian tea stands in a very different position to Indian hides and leather, and the question deserves still to be considered whether this high rebate of 10 per cent should be allowed.

"Lastly, before I resume my seat, I should like to join with the Hon'ble Mr. Crum and the Hon'ble Member from Bombay and support the suggestion that the Government should start at any rate some good schools of tanning. I should also add that the Government should set apart a sufficient sum for sending out capable Indians who are Bachelors of Science and Masters of Science to foreign countries to acquire the highest skill as experts in the tanning industry.

"My Lord, I regret that discussions in this Council are becoming acrimonious."

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"I have refrained, my Lord, from interrupting the Hon'ble Pandit in his speech, but I do not think that any part of it was relevant to the motion now before the Council."

The President:—"Sometimes the longest way round is the shortest way home."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE INDIAN ARMS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Indian Arms Act, 1878. If Hon'ble Members will look at the Statement of Objects and Reasons attached to the Bill, I think they will find there expressed more lucidly than I can explain them the reasons which have led the Government of India to undertake this legislation. Under section 16 of the present law a person, who has arms in his possession without a license or the possession of which is unlawful for any reason, has to deposit the arms at the nearest police-station, and unless he can get a license to possess them within a specified period, the arms are forfeited 12-25 P.M. to Government. We now propose in lieu of this provision to provide that a person who is not entitled to possess arms by reason either of his exemption being withdrawn or his not having obtained a license, may deposit the arms either at a police-station or, subject to any conditions that the Local Government may prescribe, with any licensed dealer. He will then have an opportunity within a reasonable time of disposing of the arms in any way he thinks fit or of getting a license if he so wishes. It is only on his failure either to dispose of the article or get a license within the prescribed time that the arms will be sold. The last clause of the Bill is really a decentralising clause enabling the Local Government to make rules to carry the new provisions of the law into effect."

12-27 P.M. The Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan :—"My Lord, while thanking the Government for removing the racial distinctions with regard to licenses in connection with the Arms Act, it will not be out of place to bring to its notice that the bargain has not been a profitable one. Most of the loyal Indians whose services have been recognised by the conferment of titles will be deprived of the special privileges which they have hitherto been enjoying. I think I am voicing their feelings when I say that they are very much dissatisfied on hearing this. My Lord, in the Punjab these approved loyal gentlemen are not more than a thousand in number, and if each paid Rs. 5 to get a new license, it will only bring in Rs. 5,000, which is a trifling sum when their feelings are weighed. Approximately the same number will be found in the other provinces. They are mostly retired and old veterans and are unable to derive any pleasure whatsoever from using their arms for the purposes of sport, but have to look to them for their personal safety. When on the 6th of April last and onwards till the declaration of martial law the excitement of the public was running higher daily, the poor title-holders were hooted and abused if they came out in public. Their only consolation was in these obsolete, rust-eaten arms. Some of those which I saw not only had never been used, but perhaps were not cleaned since they were obtained, and the only effect they could have had, if used, would have been perhaps to kill or injure the owner, but this would only happen if these arms were in a condition to be used and the owner knew how to use them . . . .

The President :—"I must draw the Hon'ble Member's attention to the fact that he is rather wandering from the particular Bill which is before this Council. I hope he will try and confine himself to the proposals contained in this Bill."

The Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan :—"My Lord, I was only asking about the new license; the old license, I hope, will be retained by these title-holders."

12-30 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"My Lord, it is so seldom that I can see eye to eye on a public question with the Hon'ble the Major Sahib that I must express my opinion publicly that on this question I agree with him . . . . .

The President :—"I hope the Hon'ble Member will confine himself to the subject under discussion and not wander off as his Hon'ble colleague with whom he agrees did."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"I only say I support the views of the Major Sahib. The reason is this. The Hon'ble the Home Member says in the Statement of Objects and Reasons that this Bill which he is introducing to-day is for the purpose of bringing into effect certain changes in the administration of the Arms Act . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" May I rise to explain, my Lord, that I did not say so ?"

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—" He did not say so, but there it is in the papers supplied to us, and I believe he is responsible for the papers he supplies us with. Now, in the Statement of Objects and Reasons it is put down that 'the changes in the administration of the Indian Arms Act, 1878, which were announced in the Government of India (Home Department) Resolution No. 2125-C., dated the 21st March 1919, are to come into force on the 1st January 1920. One of the changes is a curtailment of the list of exempted persons ; and there are probably a number of persons now in lawful possession of arms and ammunition, of which the possession by them will become unlawful by reason of that curtailment.' It is, therefore, the Bill has been brought into the Council to-day for the purpose of giving effect to those changes. If I am wrong I shall be glad if the Hon'ble the Home Member will explain now ; otherwise I shall be . . . ."

The President :—" The Bill speaks for itself, Mr. Sinha."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—" I accept that, my Lord. I always thought that a Bill, even when speaking for itself, could be explained in the light of the Statement of Objects and Reasons. If I am wrong, I accept your Lordship's ruling."

The President :—" Read through the Statement of Objects and Reasons."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—" I have done so, my Lord. In so far as this Bill purports to give effect to the Government of India's Resolution curtailing the exemption list—if I am right in my understanding of the scope and object of the Bill—I take exception to the principle involved in this matter, and I think it is wrong to that extent as the persons who enjoy certain rights before this measure will come into force should not be deprived of those rights."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" My Lord, I oppose the motion for leave to introduce this Bill. The question relating to the Arms Act has been long discussed. It has long been a matter of complaint to the Indian public that there is an invidious distinction drawn between Indians and Europeans in the matter of the possession of arms. The Government have now decided to remove that invidiousness, and they have framed certain rules for that purpose. But that was only one point of complaint in relation to the administration of the Arms Act. The second point was that arms should be available more freely to Indians, as freely as to Europeans. Now, my Lord, that is the effect of the rules which the Government of India has made. This Bill is now brought forward before the Council in order to deprive a number of persons of the right . . . 12-32 P.M.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" May I rise to a point of order ? The Bill does not deprive any person of any right to carry arms whatever. "

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" The limitations which have been imposed by the Resolution of the Government of India to which reference is made will show that many persons who were free to possess arms without a license will not be able to do so hereafter. The taking out of licenses will be necessary and that is essentially a curtailment. The Statement of Objects and Reasons says : 'The changes in the administration of the Indian Arms Act, 1878, which were announced in the Government of India (Home Department) Resolution No. 2125-C., dated the 21st March 1919, are to come into force on the 1st January 1920. One of the changes is a curtailment of the list of exempted persons; and there are probably a number of persons now in lawful possession of arms and ammunition, of which the possession by them will become unlawful by reason of that curtailment.' Now, my Lord, I submit that if a curtailment of the right to possess arms is to be brought about, there ought to be an opportunity given to this Council to discuss the matter. If a Bill is introduced which, without allowing a discussion as to the propriety of the curtailment, seeks to make provision for that curtailment being given effect to, I submit, my Lord, it is open to exception. The proper course is that the whole policy which is involved in the Resolution of the Government of India referred to above should be considered by the Council and the administration of the Arms Act be put upon a sound and satisfactory basis . . .

The President:—"The Hon'ble Member must not discuss the whole question of the principle of the Arms Act. He has read a portion of the Statement of Objects and Reasons but he did not proceed to read to the end. If he had read to the end he would have found that this was intended to be a liberalising measure rather than a curtailing measure. He must confine himself to the Bill which is before the Council at the present moment."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, my complaint is that, having read the Bill, the Statement of Objects and Reasons and the Resolution of the Government of India, I find that the Bill and the Resolution taken together are not liberalising measures. I, therefore, object to the introduction of the Bill, and I submit that the Government ought to adopt a measure of a really liberal character for the possession of arms by His Majesty's Indian subjects in this country."

12-35 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi:—"My Lord, I was somewhat surprised when I heard my friend the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya say that he opposed the introduction of this Bill. Now, if he had carefully perused the main section in the Bill and compared it with the corresponding section in the Act of 1878, which this particular section is intended to amend, he would have found that the present Bill is a liberalising measure, and, in consequence, I am perfectly certain that he would not have adopted the position which he has done this morning. It seems to me that he has really not compared section 16 of the old Act, which it is intended to amend, with clause 2 of the present Bill. Now, Hon'ble Members will see, if they refer to section 16 of the old Act, that this is what is laid down therein:—'Any person possessing arms, ammunition or military stores the possession whereof by him has in consequence of the cancellation or expiry of a license or by the issue of a notification under section 15 become unlawful, shall deposit the same without unnecessary delay with the officer in charge of the nearest police-station.' This is the provision embodied in section 16 of the old Act, and it is this provision which is intended to be amended by clause 2 of the present Bill, and if my Hon'ble friend had carefully read sub-clause (1) of clause 2 of the present Bill, he would have seen that what the proposed enactment intends to bring about is this, that under the circumstances specified in clause 16 of the old Act the person who is in possession of arms and has no longer the right to keep those arms in his possession may, in addition to what he is required to do by clause 16 of the old Act, also, at his own option, instead of delivering the prohibited weapons at the police-station, go to a licensed vendor and deposit the weapon with him. That is to say, the proposed enactment saves him the trouble, the worry and occasionally the vexation which results when Indian subjects have to go to police stations in order to obey the directions of law. Instead of going to the police-station, he can go to a private licensed vendor and say to him under the new law: 'I have no longer the right to keep this weapon in my possession. Will you please sell it for me and let me have the sale proceeds.' Without comparing the provisions of the old Act with the provisions of clause 2 and then bringing in irrelevant matter which has nothing to do with the Bill before the Council but may have some reference to the general policy underlying the Arms Act which would be the subject-matter of discussion only if a new Arms Act were to be before the Council and if we were passing a new Arms Act, I submit, is really taking up a position which is entirely irrelevant to the subject-matter of the discussion before us."

12-40 P.M. The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur :—" My Lord, I beg to point out that one of the effects of the passing of this Bill would be that the Resolution of the Government of India stating that the list of exempted persons should be curtailed would come into operation from the 1st of January, 1920. . . .

The President :—" That is not in the Bill, Mr. Sita Nath Ray. I must ask you to read the Bill and to confine yourself to the discussion of the Bill."

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur :—" But the fact is that the Resolution would come into operation from the 1st of January, 1920, and I do not think that the list of exempted persons should be curtailed. They are very loyal subjects and they were given this privilege of being exempted from the operation of the Arms Act by reason not only of their high position, but also on account of their loyalty and faithfulness to Government. Now they are going to be deprived of that privilege from the 1st of January, and that is what I deplore."

12-41 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" My Lord, I think that the discussion on this Bill, which is really a harmless measure intended to facilitate the disposal of arms by persons who happen to possess them without authority, has gone a little astray. The sole object of the Bill is to make things easier for such persons, and it has nothing to do with any general question of policy. It is of course open to Hon'ble Members on a Resolution properly framed to criticise the policy of the Home Department Resolution on the Arms Act, which was recently issued. Any Member can move a Resolution on that point any time, but this present Bill in no way affects the policy involved or the time at which the Resolution will come into effect. The new policy will come into effect on the 1st of January of next year. We postponed the introduction for one year in order to give time to those affected ; but all that this Bill does is to say that persons who would otherwise be prejudicially affected by the change of policy involved in that Resolution shall receive certain facilities and be saved inconvenience. The motion has however been used as an opportunity for attacking the Home Department Resolution by the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya who said, inter alia, he thought that the Government of India should never have changed the policy in relation to the Arms Act without previous consultation with the Members of this Council. I do not wish to discuss the question of policy, but may I remind Hon'ble Members of this Council that last year we had a discussion of this subject and immediately afterwards there was a prolonged sitting of official and non-official Members of this Council . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" How many non-officials ? "

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" I cannot remember the exact number, but there were a large number of non-officials. "

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur :—" About six or seven. "

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"More than that."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Not so far as I know."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"I will ascertain the figures if there is time. At any rate it was after that and after discussion in this Council and very careful examination of the question that was then in practice that the Government of India adopted the present policy. I am quite prepared to admit, however, that there may be some ground for complaint in regard to the point which the Hon'ble Major Malik Umar Hayat Khan has raised; the Government of India are quite open to re-examine any points of that kind, but what I submit to this Council is, that the discussion of this Bill is not the proper occasion for that subject. I am glad, however, that he has brought it to my notice and I will have it re-examined."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent—"My Lord, I now introduce the Bill and move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, I regret I have to oppose this motion to introduce the Bill. . . .

The President:—"The Bill has been introduced. The motion is to publish it."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"May I invite your Lordship's attention to the words 'Also to introduce the Bill.' He first asked for leave to introduce the Bill and he now introduces the Bill."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"There is no motion for introduction before the Council, my Lord."

The President:—"No. The Hon'ble Member is quite incorrect. Leave has been given to Sir William Vincent to introduce. I do not know by what outward act he could introduce the Bill, but he has introduced the Bill; leave has been given to introduce the Bill. The only motion is that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Thank you, my Lord. Then, my Lord, I oppose this motion that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English; and, my Lord, in doing so I beg leave very respectfully to invite your Lordship's attention, the attention of your Excellency's Government to the position as explained by the Hon'ble the Home Member. Last year, my Lord, in this Council a Resolution was brought up relating to the Arms Act, and as the Hon'ble the Home Member has told the Council after that Resolution was discussed in the Council, he invited some non-official Members to a discussion. Now, my Lord, as the result of that discussion he has issued, the Home Department has issued, the Resolution. . . .

The President:—"Really, really, that has absolutely nothing to do with the motion before this Council. The motion before this Council is that this Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English, and the Hon'ble Member will strictly confine himself to that motion. He says he is going to oppose it; he can give his reasons for opposing it, but he must confine himself to the motion."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Exactly, my Lord. I confine myself to the reasons which I urge why this Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, should not be published in the Gazette of India. I am confining myself exactly to that, my Lord; and in doing so I thought I was justified in inviting attention to the circumstances in which this measure was introduced, and those are the reasons for asking the Council not to accept this motion, but to ask the Government of India in their executive department to reconsider the Bill and then to ask for leave to publish it in the gazette. The reasons I have tried to explain briefly are these, that the policy which underlies the Resolution which the Government of India issued and to which reference is made in the Statement of Objects and Reasons of the Bill, ought to have been discussed before this Council. By this Bill being introduced in the way in which it is being introduced, Members of this Council are being deprived of the opportunity of discussing the policy of that Resolution. As the grievance relating to the Arms Act is a long-standing one, my Lord, I very respectfully submit to the Government of India that it would be wise, it would be right, if the Government would give this Council the opportunity of discussing the policy of that Resolution before publishing this Bill in the gazette; as a result of that discussion Government might think it fit to amend the Bill before asking that it should be published in the Gazette of India."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, in reply, I wish to point out one fact only, and that is that the effect of negativing this motion would be that the Bill would have to be brought before this Council for consideration without having been published, without the public having any opportunity of expressing an opinion on it. That, I think, is a result which even the Hon'ble Member, however much he may seek to abuse his privilege as a Member of this Council, can scarcely desire." 12-49 P.M.

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE DACCA UNIVERSITY BILL.

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi:—"My Lord, I have the honour to move for leave to introduce a Bill to establish and incorporate a unitary teaching and residential University at Dacca. 12-50 P.M.

"My Lord, the problem which the proposed enactment is intended to solve is by no means new. This important question came under consideration as far back as the year 1904, when the province of Eastern Bengal was constituted as a separate administrative unit. . . .

The President:—"Order, order. The Council is rather noisy. It is quite impossible for the Hon'ble Member to introduce his Bill unless there is less noise."

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi:—"But in the published letter of the 6th April 1904, from the Government of Bengal to the Government of India, it was, on that occasion, stated that 'unless and until the new province has so developed as to possess a University of its own, there will be no interference with the influence of the Calcutta University.' In other words, the new province was then considered to be not sufficiently developed in education to be able to support a University of its own. From 1904 onwards, the march of educational progress in East Bengal was indeed phenomenal. To illustrate this remarkably rapid advancement, I venture to invite the attention of Hon'ble Members to figures relating to the years 1907 and 1912. Between these years, the rate of increase in the number of pupils in East Bengal was higher than in any of the major provinces in the country save the Central Provinces, and was considerably higher than in the western division of Bengal. The percentage of increase in public expenditure on education in the five years was no less than 59·6 per cent as against an average increase of 36·8 for the whole of India. The number of Arts College students increased by 150 per cent, the increase in West Bengal being 87, and 56·6 per cent in the country as a whole. The expenditure from public revenues on Arts Colleges went up by 164 per cent, being far higher than any other province during the corresponding period. At the commencement of the quinquennium, there was not a single aided college in the province ; at the end of it, there were five aided colleges. Turning to secondary education, the increase in the number of pupils in East Bengal amounted to 82·9 per cent as against 37 per cent in the western divisions, and 41 per cent in India as a whole. The expenditure from public funds on secondary English education rose by 62 per cent against 40 per cent in Western Bengal, and 33 per cent in the whole of India. In view of this remarkable educational progress in East Bengal, due in part to the concentration of official effort in the then newly constituted province, and the consequent awakening among its population, the demand for the establishment of a separate University in that part of the country naturally became more insistent. In April 1910, the Hon'ble Babu Ananga Mohan Naha eloquently pleaded in the local Legislative Council for an early establishment of a University in the city of Dacca.

"My Lord, the progress of educational evolution in East Bengal was thus going on apace, when suddenly the announcement, on 12th December 1911, of what are known as the Coronation Darbar Administrative Changes created a deep stir throughout the country. The profound effect of that announcement, particularly among the Muslim majority in East Bengal, need not now be referred to. Having been present in Calcutta as an elected member of this Council and being in close touch with my lamented friend, the Hon'ble Nawab Sir Salimullah Khan of Dacca, and my friend the Hon'ble Nawab Sayed Nawab Ali Chaudhri, I well remember the happenings which resulted in the presentation of an address to His Excellency Lord Hardinge by a Muslim Deputation at Dacca on 31st January 1912, in which they gave expression to the feeling, prevalent among the Mussalmans, lest the modification of the partition of Bengal might retard the educational progress of their community. In his reply to that address, Lord Hardinge assured the Deputation that the Government of India 'realized that education was the true salvation of the Muhammadans, and that the Government of India, as an earnest of their intentions, would recommend to the Secretary of State the constitution of a University at Dacca.' (Report, Vol. IV, Chapter 33, paragraph 2.) And, on 2nd February 1912, a Communiqué was issued by the Government of India embodying that declaration. After receiving the general assent of the Secretary of State, the Government of India announced their decision to establish a University at Dacca in a letter, dated 4th April 1912, addressed to the Government of Bengal and invited that Government to submit a complete scheme with the necessary financial estimate. It was stated in that letter that 'the Government considered the creation of new Universities as an important factor in educational progress, and that it was desirable that these Universities, where possible, should be of the teaching and residential type, binding together the colleges of a single town or a single circumscribed area.' (Report, Ibid, paragraph 4.) In pursuance of this decision by the Government of India, the Bengal Government published a Resolution in regard to the proposed University at Dacca and appointed a Committee of 13 members, with Mr. Nathan as President, to frame a suitable scheme. Into the details of the activities of the Nathan Committee, it is not now necessary to enter. They made a thorough investigation into the whole problem and, on 10th December 1912, submitted their report embodying a scheme for the constitution of the proposed Dacca University. The Government of Bengal published that report on 26th December and, after consideration of the criticism invited from all classes, framed detailed plans which formed the subject of communication between the local and Imperial Governments, as well as between the latter and the Secretary of State for India.

" My Lord, it was at this stage that the unrighteous ambition for world-dominion of the German military circles plunged the civilized world into a conflagration unparalleled in the past history of mankind. Great Britain having thrown the weight of her vast power and unlimited resources on the side of the sacred cause of Liberty and Freedom, and India having taken up spontaneously her share in the burden of the Empire in this righteous cause, it was inevitable that domestic schemes involving expenditure, including that of the proposed Dacca University, should, for the time being, remain in abeyance. But with the unexpected prolongation of the world war, urgent domestic problems could no longer be neglected. An inquiry into the condition and prospects of the Calcutta University and the formation of a 'constructive policy in relation to the questions which it presents' being considered matters of urgency, your Excellency's Government, by means of a Resolution, dated the 14th September 1917, appointed a Commission consisting of highly qualified educational experts, presided over by Dr. (now Sir) M. E. Sadler, Vice-Chancellor of the Leeds University, for the proper solution of what may be characterised as the whole problem of Higher and Secondary Education in Bengal. Previous to the issue of this Resolution, the Government had, in reply to a question asked by my friend the Hon'ble Nawab Sayed Nawab Ali Chaudhuri on 7th March 1917, announced that action regarding the Dacca scheme would be postponed until the Calcutta University Commission, then about to be appointed, had reported. Presumably because of this reply, the Nawab then moved a Resolution in this Council on the 20th March urging that the necessary steps be taken to draft a Bill for the establishment and incorporation of the proposed Dacca University. While replying to that Resolution, the Hon'ble Sir Sankaran Nair stated that the Government of India were definitely pledged to the establishment of a University at Dacca, and that there had been no wavering on the part of the Government in this respect. In the speech concluding that Session, your Excellency, referring to this important subject, confirmed in a most distinct and unequivocal manner, the promise made by Lord Hardinge of the foundation of a University at Dacca.

" My Lord, now that the terrible conflagration which India, in common with the rest of the civilized world, has had to face during the last five years has ended in the complete triumph of Righteousness and Liberty over Militarism, and the arduous task undertaken by the Calcutta University Commission has resulted in a well considered Report which will rank high among historical documents of the first importance, it was but natural for your Excellency's Government to take the earliest opportunity of fulfilling the solemn pledges repeatedly given to the people of Eastern Bengal by taking immediate steps towards the establishment of a University at Dacca. It is nearly seven years ago when the people of East Bengal were first promised their University. Their growing impatience during the past few years is well-known to those who have been in close touch with the public life of the country, and the inquiries made by me during my recent visit to Calcutta have convinced me that this is undoubtedly a case of 'Hope deferred maketh the heart sick'. In view of the urgent educational needs of Eastern Bengal, as well as on vital political grounds, your Excellency's Government have considered it incumbent upon them to introduce the Dacca

University Bill in this Session. It should, further, be remembered that of the three reforms adumbrated in the Calcutta University Commission's Report, that relating to the establishment of the Dacca University is comparatively more simple than the two complicated schemes relating to Secondary and Intermediate Education and the University of Calcutta. The views held generally, in official and non-official circles, as regards the former, are already fairly crystallised; while the complicated nature of the recommendations concerning the two latter requires a great deal of consideration and discussion. The simultaneous handling of the three great problems would have constituted a task of tremendous magnitude and difficulty, and would have inevitably resulted in a considerable postponement of the Dacca scheme which had already reached a mature stage, and for which the demand in East Bengal was universal, irrespective of class and creed. The step which we are now taking is, moreover, in entire consonance with the policy laid down by the Government of India and with the drift of public opinion in the country. Over and over again have representative Indian spokesmen invited the attention of Government to the need for the establishment of more Universities in principal educational centres in order to meet the growing needs of higher education in India. I well remember the eloquent appeal of the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, delivered in this Council not very long ago when, after quoting statistics regarding the population and the number of Universities in Great Britain, France and America, and referring to the small number of our Universities, he urged upon your Excellency's Government the necessity of taking steps to establish more Universities in India. My Hon'ble and learned friend will, I feel sure, welcome the establishment of a model unitary teaching University at Dacca as the harbinger of a new era which he, in common with other advocates of educational progress in this country, has already desired for so long. The Calcutta University Commission too, in Chapter XXXIII of their Report, after reviewing the past history of the movement for the establishment of a University at Dacca, proceed to observe as follows:—' It will be apparent from other portions of this Report that even if the establishment of the University of Dacca had not been promised by the Government of India, the whole policy of University re-organization in Bengal which we advocate would have led us to recommend the establishment of a University in that town either immediately or at an early date. For, if this scheme of decentralization, of relieving the excessive burden of Calcutta and of gradually creating separate Universities in the mofussil is to be carried out, Dacca is clearly indicated as the first centre for the creation of such a University.' This is to be found in Volume IV at page 132. Again, at page 227 of the same volume, they observe: ' We think that, pending the establishment of the Secondary and Intermediate Board, the Dacca University should have the right to prescribe its own tests for admission,' thus contemplating the necessity of the establishment of the Dacca University even before the Secondary and Intermediate Board comes into existence. And, finally, at page 241 of the same volume, they use the following significant language: ' We strongly urge that the University of Dacca should be established without further delay. The end of the War will, we hope, have eased the financial situation. But if the money available is not sufficient to provide at once for the full scheme which we propose, we hope that the University will be started on the lines laid down, and in such a way as to allow for its early enlargement and development. ' Hon'ble Members will note that this recommendation of the Commission, couched in such emphatic language, was entirely unanimous, and I trust that my friend the Hon'ble Sir Asutosh Mukerjee will be gratified that your Excellency's Government are now taking the earliest possible opportunity to carry the recommendations of the Commission into effect. The nervousness visible in certain quarters in Calcutta lest the adoption of the Dacca University scheme might result in the postponement of the reform of Secondary and Intermediate Education and of the Calcutta University, as recommended by the Commission, is devoid of justification. I venture to avail myself of this opportunity to assure our Calcutta friends that the Government of India are earnest in their intention of taking steps, as early as circumstances permit, towards bringing about the solution of those two important problems. Educational experts in my Department have already been, for some time, at work in crystallizing the recommendations of the Calcutta University Commission in relation to these two great questions for the ultimate object of undertaking legislation, in so far as it may be necessary, and the Local Government, as well as other authorities interested in these vital problems, will have ample opportunity of studying our proposals and of expressing their opinions thereon. The Government of India hope that after the necessary preliminaries have been gone through, it may be possible for them to introduce the desired legislation in the Delhi Session. Meanwhile, the Dacca University Bill is being merely introduced in this Session and will, after introduction, be circulated in the usual way for opinion, its Committee stage being also taken in the Delhi Session. Those interested in the proposed legislation will thus have ample time for deliberation and submission of their opinions before the next stage in the consideration of the Bill is reached.

"My Lord, in view of the weight which must attach to the recommendations of a Commission consisting of educational experts of the position and experience of Sir M. E. Sadler and his colleagues, it was but natural that the Bill which I am now about to introduce should, in the main, closely follow the lines laid down in their Report. The Report has now been in the hands of Hon'ble Members for nearly a month, and a comparison of the principal recommendations contained therein with the provisions of the proposed enactment makes the correctness of this position self-evident. The Dacca University will be a non-affiliating body as proposed by the Commission, but it will be of a more perfect type, and its organization will be facilitated by the fact that it will be a unitary and not a multi-collegiate University. Further, as intended by the Commission, it will be an autonomous and not a Government institution. And a new feature of the institution will be the proposed system of control of the staff by the University itself. The Commission and the Government of India have found difficulty in squaring this last proposal with existing facts and with exigencies of recruitment. The provisions of the Bill offer what we consider a satisfactory solution of these difficulties. In the matter of finance and regulations also the proposed University will have large independent powers. The constitution of our older Universities does not sufficiently distinguish between the administrative and the academic sides. According to the proposals embodied in the Bill, there will be an Executive and an Academic Council, each charged with different functions and each, to an appropriate extent, subordinated to the general control of a representative Court whose functions, in the main, will be legislative and supervisory. The new University will have nothing to do with the teaching of the intermediate classes, a branch of teaching which has often been regarded as having no real affinity with University work. I need not, at this stage, enter into a detailed description either of the other provisions contained in the Bill or of the various smaller bodies which will figure in the University constitution.

"It is sufficient to say that the proposed constitution is more liberal than that devised by the Committee which was appointed in 1912 and was composed, to a large extent, of non-official representatives. I may, however, mention the fact that the Government of India do not stand committed finally to those minor deviations from the Report of the Commission or additions to the proposals embodied in the Report, which it has been thought necessary to introduce in the scheme embodied in the Bill. These, on receipt of opinions after publication, will be subject to reconsideration when the Bill is referred to a Select Committee in the Delhi Session.

"My Lord, long have the people in East Bengal waited for their University, and I have reason to believe that all classes and creeds in that part of the country will warmly welcome the near prospect of possessing a University of their own. The proposed University will stimulate the cause of education in a locality where, as I have shown, there has been enormous educational expansion in recent years. It will result in the lightening of the heavy burden which at present falls on the University of Calcutta. It will present to the country a bold and, I trust, a successful experiment in a type of University which, as yet, has had no type in India, but which conforms to the most up-to-date Universities as established in England and Australia. It will, I firmly believe, constitute a profound boon to the population, Hindu and Mahomedan, of a tract of which Dacca forms the centre. The Dacca District is perhaps the most forward in higher education in the whole of India, and the residents of that part of the country have, for long, been conspicuous for their intellectual activity, their energy in establishing educational institutions, and the keenness with which they avail themselves of educational facilities. There could hardly be a more promising soil in which to plant a new tree of knowledge or one more congenial for the success of this experiment. There may, I conceive, be some small apprehension in Calcutta at the severing of so promising a branch from the parent tree. But, in accordance with the inexorable laws of nature, time is inevitable when the dependent shoots of the Banyan Tree must themselves take root and grow into flourishing trees giving shade and rest to the weary traveller. Indeed, the heart of the University of Calcutta should not be filled with misgiving when she sees her off-shoots maturing into independent and life-giving growth. Surely, it is not for her to grudge a generous measure of healthy independence to so promising an offspring as the proposed University at Dacca, and I feel sure that, instead of opposition, she will offer an attitude of fostering care and friendly interest in its creation and development.

"My Lord, the population of East Bengal, irrespective of caste and creed, are ardently looking forward to the realization of their cherished dream of a University at Dacca, and, on their behalf, I claim the unanimous support of this Council and of the educational leaders of Bengal for the Bill which I now ask for leave to introduce."

1 15 P.M. The Hon'ble Nawab Saiyed Nawab Ali Chaudhri:— "My Lord, it gives me intense pleasure to rise to-day to speak a few words generally in support of the Bill, which is being introduced by my friend the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi, to establish and incorporate a 'Unitary teaching and residential University at Dacca.' It is in human nature, my Lord, to be jubilant, if one wants a thing and gets it, or at least sees a reasonable chance of one's cherished dream being realised at no distant date. In the matter of the proposed Dacca University, I have not merely been entertaining a desire to see the scheme fructify. As a matter of fact, I have been working for its success at considerable loss of time and energy, and have given myself no rest until, at last, to-day I see my dream fairly on the way to realisation As a member of the Dacca University Committee of 1912, I promoted the idea as far as lay in my power and imparted an impetus to the movement. I may be pardoned for saying so, but, my Lord, I say this in no spirit of vain gloriousness. Standing before your Excellency to-day, I look back with reasonable pride to the memorable 31st day of January in the year 1912, when your Excellency's noble predecessor, Lord Hardinge, replying to a Muhammadan Deputation, which I had the unique privilege to lead at Dacca, pledged himself to the establishment of a University in that city. Two days later, a Communiqué was published, stating the decision of the Government of India. But there were dangers ahead. Fortunately, His Lordship remained firm when opposition appeared from certain quarters and the Government of India, after receiving the assent of the Secretary of State, announced their decision on the 4th April, 1912, to establish a University at Dacca. The Calcutta University Commission, after recommending for Dacca a teaching and residential University, with special facilities for the study of that Arabic Philosophy and Science which, to quote from their report, '' gave fresh intellectual life to Europe during the middle ages,' have urged that ' the University of Dacca should be established without further delay.' The Bill under discussion has not, therefore, been placed on the Legislative anvil a day too soon. On the other hand, it was long over-due and the people of Eastern Bengal were getting impatient over it. This fact made it incumbent on me to move a Resolution in this Council on the 20th March, 1917. With reference to this Resolution of mine, your Excellency, on the 23rd March, 1917, was pleased to give us in Council a fresh pledge in unequivocal terms. It is surpassingly strange that, in spite of these facts, opposition is still presented in certain quarters. I refer of course to certain criticisms recently made in Calcutta on the action of Government. But I do not like to waste your Excellency's time by criticising this action. Now that the Bill is at last to be introduced, I hope that, belying the hopes of some and the fears of others, it will soon be passed into law; and the Dacca University will become a reality within the next twelve months. It is expected that, in the ordinary course of business, the Bill will become law during the ensuing cold weather at Delhi, but I do hope that all necessary preliminaries will be finished in the meantime. It is further to be hoped that no time will be wasted, after the passing of the Bill, in carrying out its objects. My Lord, it is impossible for me to give vent to the feelings of joy that are uppermost in my heart today. I shall not be far wrong if I say that in this Council Chamber nobody is happier than I am at this moment. As my heart is full, I do not propose to make any observations to-day on the details of the Bill which, however, I reserve for a future occasion. There are certain matters, e.g.,

(1) scope and jurisdiction of the University,

(2) Government control on the University,

(3) service system,

(4) representation and proportion of Muhammadans in the various bodies of the University and their provision in the Act itself, and

(5) condition of secondary and intermediate colleges of Eastern Bengal in general and Dacca town in particular, which will require careful consideration of this Council after obtaining the views of the Local Government, and I shall express my opinion thereon after consulting my constituency. It only remains for me to welcome the Bill with all the emphasis that I can command and, before I resume my seat, I would like to express, on my own behalf as well as on behalf of those whom I have the honour to represent in this Council, our sense of thankfulness and gratitude to your Excellency's Government for having taken up the matter in right earnest. The very able and lucid speech, in which the Hon'ble Member in charge has introduced the Bill in Council, brings into clear prominence his genuine sympathy with the educational aspirations of the people of Eastern Bengal who, I am confident, will always remain grateful to him. Your Excellency will ever be remembered by the people of Eastern Bengal as conferring on them the priceless boon of education and your Excellency's name will go down to posterity as one of their greatest and noblest benefactors."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi :— 1-22 P.M.
" My Lord, I fully appreciate the motives which have prompted your Excellency's Government to introduce the Bill to-day. They are, I understand, the extension of higher education and the redemption of a pledge. It is the duty of every Government to extend higher education as much as possible, and I can assure your Excellency that you will have our whole-hearted and unanimous support for any steps that might be taken in this direction. As for the second object, there is nothing which shakes the moral foundations of authority so much as the breaking of a pledge, and I should be the last person to advise Government to go back upon its plighted word.

" But there are some considerations which make me hesitate to welcome the Bill at the present moment and in its present shape. In the first place, the Dacca University Scheme—which was ready some years back in its original form—was kept in abeyance pending the findings of the Calcutta University Commission. The Report of this Commission has, it is true, recently seen the light of day, but the people interested in education have not had sufficient time and opportunity to consider this Report and, so far as I know, the public bodies have not yet been invited to express their views on it. The present Bill is based largely on the Calcutta University Report, which has raised issues of fundamental importance, and most of whose recommendations are inter-connected and inter-dependent. To my mind, it would be an advantage if, instead of seeking to give effect to these recommendations piecemeal, Government, after taking into consideration the Report as a whole, were to formulate a broad and general policy in regard to secondary and higher education in Bengal, and then to bring forward a legislative measure or a series of legislative measures to give effect to such a policy.

" The second reason which stands in the way of my lending support to this Bill is the fact that there are several questions of principle involved in it, which ought to be threshed out before being incorporated in this Bill. I may mention as instances the residential system and the question of communal representation. How far the residential system in its purer form is suited to the conditions of life which prevail in India, and whether the communal principle ought to have a place in a seat of learning, are questions which, for good or for evil, are likely to have an important bearing on the educational activities of our people and ought, as such, to receive the most careful and dispassionate consideration.

" Lastly, the new University will require for its success the support of public opinion. Such support can be secured in a larger measure if the Bill is considered in the reformed Legislature with its increased popular element than in the Council as it is constituted at present. I would urge this particularly in view of the fact that education is expected to be one of the subjects transferred to popular control. As the public will have a voice in the matter of giving financial support to the University, it seems to me to be only right and proper that popular opinion as expressed through the reformed Legislature, should be an important factor in determining its constitution. My Lord, I am not opposed to the establishment of a University at Dacca, but I submit that nothing will be gained by rushing the present measure. Should it be thought undesirable or inadvisable to withdraw this Bill, I would implore your Excellency to defer its consideration till the reformed Legislatures come into existence."

1-28 P.M. The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal :—" My Lord, I am in full sympathy with the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi's request for leave to introduce a Bill to establish and incorporate a unitary teaching and residential University at Dacca, and I am only sorry for the fact that my Province has been very unjustly treated and is yet lagging behind in this respect, and I only trust and hope that I shall have full sympathy from the Hon'ble the Education Member to-morrow when I will have the honour of moving a Resolution on this subject. I will at least have this satisfaction that, as a result of this delay, my Province would have now those advantages of the Report of the Calcutta University Commission which otherwise would not have fallen to their lot, and I am sure this will outweigh the disadvantages which one has to experience by such an unfair treatment between a province and a province."

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur:—"My Lord, I beg to congratulate the Government on the introduction of the Bill to-day. As an inhabitant of Dacca I rejoice that the promise of establishing a University at Dacca is at last being redeemed. It has taken the Government so long to mature the plan that we were being reminded of the words of the proverb 'Hope deferred maketh the heart sick.' I am not a little surprised to hear, and I was not a little astonished to find, that a keen supporter of education like the Hon'ble the Maharaja of Kasimbazar should get up and oppose this Bill on the ground that the establishment of a University at Dacca should be postponed till action is taken on the recommendations of the Calcutta University's Commission as a whole. But they forget that the promise to establish this University was made—as far back as 1912—long before a Commission for the Calcutta University was contemplated. Lord Carmichael expressed his regret that war conditions had delayed the fulfilment of that promise. And I am glad the Government have now decided to take necessary action in the matter. 1-29 P.M.

"While according my humble support to the scheme generally, I cannot help taking objection to a few details:

"A number of appointments have been provided for, which seem to be unnecessary and out of all proportion to the requirements of a small University, whose jurisdiction is to be confined to a radius of five miles from the Dacca Convocation Hall. I fail to understand, for instance, why a treasurer should be necessary for a University consisting of only a few colleges, when the affairs of all the colleges in Bengal could be looked after by one Registrar of the Calcutta University. Moreover, the Calcutta University has jurisdiction over all affiliated High Schools and second grade colleges, which the proposed University will not have. So many posts are going to be created and so many sub-divisions are going to be made that, I am afraid, instead of simplifying matters they will only complicate them. I urge that something be done to simplify matters.

"It is proposed to create a Mahomedan Advisory Board. Though I am averse to any scheme of education that differentiates between communities, I do not grudge my Mahomedan friends the privilege of a separate Board. But I fail to understand why, if the interests of Mahomedan students, who I hope will take full advantage of a University in Eastern Bengal—require the watchful care of a special Board—the interests of the Hindu students would not require it. I would, therefore, recommend the addition of a Hindu Advisory Board.

"Lastly, my Lord, I take strong exception to the territorial limitation proposed. My Lord, I remember how the Hon'ble Justice Sir Ashutosh Mukherjee deplored the proposal to establish a University at Dacca on the ground that it would curtail the jurisdiction and income of my alma-mater the Calcutta University. But I am sorry to have to differ from him. And I hold that for purposes of more careful supervision there should be a separate University for Eastern Bengal. Unfortunately the proposal now is to have a University with two or three colleges located at Dacca. This, my Lord, reminds me of a proverb current in the province from which my Hon'ble Friend the Education Member comes—'Owns two acres and talks of his head gardener.' When it is a question of more careful supervision I see no reason why the colleges at Barisal, Mymensingh, and Chittagong should not be affiliated to the Dacca University and the professors and students there should be compelled to cross the mighty Padma and go to Calcutta to satisfy their educational needs. This anomaly should be removed, and the jurisdiction of the Dacca University should be extended over the whole of Eastern Bengal and the University made really useful to the people."

1-34 P.M. The Hon'ble Chaudhri Muhammad Ismail Khan:—"My Lord, permit me to congratulate your Excellency's Government on having at last made up their mind in regard to the Dacca University. There were so many impediments in the way of the scheme materialising since Lord Hardinge promised this boon, that the people of Eastern Bengal had almost begun to despair. And now that we are within a measurable distance of the establishment of a University at Dacca, our amiable friends in Calcutta have raised specious pleas for its postponement. The Senate of the Calcutta University seem to think that the recommendations of the Sadler Committee must be given effect to in one comprehensive measure, if at all. They conveniently forget that the report itself recommends that the Dacca University should be established immediately. The Committee have, moreover, suggested various alternative transitional schemes, in case it should be decided to give effect to their recommendations piecemeal. I can well understand reasonable criticism aimed at improving the Bill in regard to its principal features; but, my Lord, the critics of this measure desire to improve it altogether out of existence. I hope, however, that under your Excellency's fostering care, the Dacca University will fulfil the high expectations entertained by Lord Hardinge about it, and will be a real boon to the people, particularly to the great Mahomedan population of Eastern Bengal."

1-35 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, I offer my cordial congratulations to the Hon'ble the Education Member on the very able speech with which he has introduced the Bill. My Lord, I welcome the Bill whole-heartedly, and I think that my countrymen of Eastern Bengal have every reason to be gratified. I do not share the opinion that the introduction of the Bill should have been delayed for any other reason than that before such introduction a larger consideration of the recommendations of the University Commission as a whole would have been very helpful. If any of my Calcutta friends, friends from Western Bengal, have any feeling of opposition to the University on any other ground, I have no sympathy with them. I think all the intellectual men in Western Bengal will rejoice, as the Maharajah of Kasimbazar rejoices, in the establishment of a new University in Eastern Bengal. It is a matter on which not only the people of Western Bengal and Eastern Bengal, but of the country as a whole, may well rejoice and feel thankful to the Government.

"My Lord, I do not mean to say that the addition of one new University will be sufficient for the needs of the country; but I welcome this addition as an important one, for I feel that the people of Eastern Bengal, keen intellectuals as they are, and largely as they have distinguished themselves in the Calcutta University by adding to the store of knowledge in the field of science, I am sure that the people of Eastern Bengal would have distinguished themselves much more and given a much better account of themselves if a University had been established in Dacca sixty years ago, i.e., when one was established at Calcutta. But, my Lord, while I heartily welcome the Bill for the reasons I have stated, I do think that the Bill is disappointing in several respects. In the first place, it is a matter of regret and surprise to me that after the very able report of the Calcutta University Commission, the authors of the Bill should have contented themselves, on the academic side, with proposing the inauguration of the Faculties of Arts, Science and Law only. My Lord, I understand that over two thousand students attend the law classes in Calcutta, and in view of this fact one should have thought that the branch of law might well be relegated for a little while, and that practical science, applied science, might be given a place instead. I do not mean to say that the University should not have the Faculty of Law. Every University ought to provide instruction in all important departments of knowledge; but if funds are not sufficient to enable the University to start all the more important branches of instruction, I would certainly prefer that provision should be made for the teaching of applied science instead of law. My Lord, arts, science and law have been the faculties which have mainly occupied the attention and largely absorbed the funds of existing federal Universities, and therefore I would request the Hon'ble Member for Education and the Government to re-consider section 23 of the Bill which says : 'the University shall include the Faculties of Arts, Science and Law and such other Faculties (whether formed by the sub-division or combination of an existing faculty or faculties or by the creation of a new faculty or otherwise) as may be prescribed by the Statutes.' The Statutes do not give any hope that any faculty of applied science will be created at an early date. I, therefore, most earnestly request the Government to consider the advisability of making provision for instruction in applied science at the very commencement of the University. This is with regard to one branch.

" My Lord, I should like another branch to be brought in, namely, a Faculty of Commerce. It is evident that the framers of the Bill have taken the same model as we of the Benares University did, namely, the modern Universities of England. These have devoted special attention to the teaching of applied science and of commerce, and it is highly desirable that the new University, which is to be started under the fostering care of Government, should start with providing instruction of a high degree in applied science and in commerce. I should also like to see provision made for the teaching of agriculture of University standard in this new University. Dacca is peculiarly happily situated for all these purposes, and it is very desirable that at the very commencement the funds that may be available should be applied at least in a fair measure to the creation of some of these faculties which do not exist in the existing Universities, and not absorbed in creating fresh Faculties of Arts, Science and Law. As I have said before I do not mean to suggest that the Faculties of Arts, Science and Law should be entirely cut out. I am only urging that if funds are not sufficient to start a full-fledged University with seven or eight faculties, even then you should be able in the first instance to introduce at least one of the faculties of applied science, commerce or agriculture. The Council will be pleased to hear that the Benares Hindu University, with its limited resources, has already established a college of engineering, and that provision has been there made for instruction of a high class character in mechanical and electrical engineering, and I have every hope that it will very soon develop a technological side also. We are also very anxious to create a faculty of agriculture, but we are hampered for want of funds. The Dacca University, however, my Lord, has, I understand, a fund of a crore and 20 lakhs ear-marked for its purposes—I wish we at Benares had half that fund available to us for starting new faculties—and so my countrymen of Eastern Bengal should have the advantage of these new important Faculties being started from the commencement of their University.

" We have long heard the complaint that Indian students do not take up practical science, that they do not take to commerce and industry, that they do not take up scientific agriculture. My Lord, Indian students are not to blame for this. They need facilities for training, guidance and fostering care. Let such facilities be provided at least at the proposed unitary and residential teaching University, and you will find that Indian students will take full advantage of it. I hope the Government will seriously consider the advisability of making an advance in this important direction.

"My Lord, I wish to say a few words about the administrative side of the University also. I regret I cannot congratulate the Government on the frame of the Bill on this side either. The Dacca University is coming into existence when great changes in administration are in sight; but even if these changes were not in sight, if constitutional reforms were not under consideration, I would say that once you have constituted the administrative body of the University, consisting of scholars, of the guardians of the students, and heads of departments, who are to find employment for the students who will be produced by the University, you should leave the administrative control entirely to them.

"While I should like the University to have the honour of having the Viceroy and Governor General as its Lord Rector, as the Benares Hindu University has, I think that the rest of the provisions prescribing the power which the Governor General will exercise over the University as Visitor, should be reconsidered. In the case of the Dacca University the Governor of Bengal will be the Chancellor. I think, my Lord, the Court and the executive and the academic Councils, should be trusted to manage the University without any interference by the Visitor. I hope that this matter will be re-considered. Then there are provisions which give certain special powers to the Chancellor which also require reconsideration. The Chancellor is empowered, where there is a Committee of Selection to be constituted, to appoint one or more members of the Committee. I should like the Chancellor to take part in the University as a member of the University, as one belonging to the University, but not as one standing apart from or outside it. I want him to guide the work of the University as an inside member.

"In regard to the appointment of the Vice-Chancellor, I think the liberal provisions which the Government agreed to pass in the case of the Benares Hindu University, should be adopted. The Government have recognised the wisdom and usefulness of allowing the Court, in the case of the Benares University, to elect its own Vice-Chancellor, and I wish the Court of the Dacca University to enjoy the same privilege. Then, my Lord, with regard to the duties imposed and the powers given to the executive and academic Councils of the University, I submit that the provisions of the Bill should be more liberal than is the case at present. Official control and interference should be eliminated to a large extent; it should be left to the bodies constituted under the Act to deal with the Executive and academic administration. That is all I would say for the present. So far as the introduction of the Bill promises an early establishment of the Dacca University, this is a matter which I hope will be welcomed by every Indian; but so far as the details are concerned, I have no doubt that the Bill will receive, as it needs, the closest criticism from the public, and that before it is referred to a Select Committee we shall know the opinion of those vitally concerned in high education in Eastern and Western Bengal and even outside those areas. I hope that, as in the case of the Patna Bill, there will be a complete transformation of the Dacca University Bill before it assumes its final shape. My Lord, I accord my hearty support to the proposal that the Dacca University Bill be introduced."

1-47 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"My Lord, I rise to support the motion before the Council, and in doing so my first words will be those of congratulation to the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi for the very able and lucid speech in which he has introduced the measure. In regard to the delay that has taken place, I confess I do not quite see the justification for the postponement of the measure for so long. Mr. Shafi says that the war was the cause of this four years' delay, but during the same interval, while the war was going on, the Government placed the Patna University Bill on the Statute-book and there appears to be no reason why the Dacca University Bill was not passed.

However, I am glad that it has now been brought forward and I congratulate my countrymen of Eastern Bengal on the promise of the fruition of their hopes and especially my friend the Hon'ble Nawab Ali Chaudhri who has worked so hard to bring the University into existence.

"I have read the Bill rather cursorily, but there are one or two points that strike me as involving questions of principle and, my Lord, with your permission, I should like to say a few words on them. The first is as regards what the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi said that this University is going to be an autonomous and not a Government institution. On reading the Bill, however, I find there is a very large number of officials in its constitution; in fact, their number really is preponderating. I find here the Commissioner, the Collector, the Sessions Judge, the Director of Agriculture, the Civil Surgeon, the Engineer, the Chairman of the Municipality, the Inspector of Schools, and many other officials of similar position. Now it is not strictly in consonance with the claim put forward that this is an autonomous and not a Government institution—on which so many officials will have a permanent place. In an official institution I have no doubt they serve a useful purpose, but I do not see why in a University, which ought to be as far as possible self-governing and self-controlling, there should be so many officials introduced into the court of the University. I should like to have an explanation as to how this provision is in consonance with the claim put forward as to the autonomous character of the proposed University. The second point of principle is this. This is the first time that in a measure of this character,—for it is not like the Benares University, frankly, Hindu,—I find a provision as to communal representation. Now in the Patna University Act there is a small reservation made for the representation of Orissa; all people who have permanently been domiciled there have got the right to return a certain number of representatives. The province of Orissa has thus representation on a territorial basis and to that no exception can be taken. But here for the first time we have representation provided for certain communities. I must tell your Lordship frankly that I have no objection to reasonable Muhammadan representation. The Bill, however, says :—' Provided that should a committee so constituted not include both a Hindu and a Muhammadan member, the Chancellor shall nominate an additional Hindu or Muhammadan member or both, as the case may be.' That is how it finds a place in the Bill. I am simply addressing your Lordship on the question of principle, as to how far it is consistent with a Government measure for education, to provide for the representation of the Hindu or the Muhammadan, as such. That is a point that requires careful consideration.

"The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi told us that this Bill has been drawn up in consonance with the recommendations of the recent University Commission. I have not read carefully the whole of their Report, which is a prodigious one, but I shall be glad if he can refer me to any such recommendation of the Commission where they lay down—I only want information and nothing else—that in the Dacca University provision should be made for communal representation as such. But any way, these are matters, besides the others referred to by the Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya, which require very careful consideration. The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi has frankly said that he is not tied down to the measure as introduced. He hopes in course of time when opinions will be elicited from the public and considered, and when the matter goes to the Select Committee, all these points will be carefully taken into consideration. I am, therefore, only inviting the attention of the Council to these two points. In the Bill I find two things, the over-representation of officials and communal representation, and these prima facie go against sound principles, whatever the recommendations of the Commission. With these few words, my Lord, I give my cordial support to the motion before the Council."

1-43 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda:—"My Lord, in the first place I wish to associate myself with my Hon'ble friend Pandit Malaviya and the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha in offering our sincerest congratulations to our friend the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi on the very lucid exposition of this Bill. My Lord, this Bill for establishing a University at Dacca is a very much belated measure. The promise to give a University to Dacca was given, as the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi has said, as late as 1912, and I much regret that there should have been so much delay, and this delay has almost been interpreted in certain quarters as a breach of faith on the part of Government; and in so far as this Bill seeks to redeem that old promise, it is most welcome, and I wish to give my humble and cordial support to it.

"My Lord, my province and my district are not directly interested in this matter. We are under the Calcutta University, and, I believe, we shall remain so. But I find, my Lord, that our province will have some share in the administration of the new University, as the Chief Commissioner of my province will have the right of nominating certain members of the Court. That apart, my Lord, we are much interested in this matter as the inauguration of another University in the country. My Lord, the Calcutta University, as has already been referred to by some previous speakers, is rather opposed to this legislation. My Lord, the ground on which it is opposed is not very objectionable. I think it possesses some weight. It objects to this legislation before the report of the Calcutta University Commission shall have been considered as a whole. If it was not for the fact which I have alluded to, that this matter is very much belated, I would be prepared to support the objection of the Calcutta University of which your Excellency was pleased to nominate me a member lately. But, my Lord, as it is, I am bound to support the introduction of this measure. As I said, it is very much belated, and in so far as it removes this want from Eastern Bengal, it has my cordial and hearty support.

"But, my Lord, there are certain features of the measure to which exception must be taken. Here my Hon'ble friend Pandit Malaviya has anticipated me. Only this morning I spoke to my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sharp about the inadequacy of Faculties. My Lord, in a new University which is going to come into being after the publication of the report of the Industries Commission, and may I add, in view of the constitutional reforms and responsible government which will be granted to this country, and in view of the undoubted fact that the economic condition is very acute, I would expect, my Lord, that in a new University, in addition to the existing Faculties, provision would be made for new Faculties which may, to some extent at least, help to improve the economic condition, the Faculty of Commerce, for instance, the Faculty of Technology and so forth. But, my Lord, it is a matter for disappointment that far from providing for any new Faculty, we find that even the existing Faculties, which are very important, the Faculty of Medicine and the Faculty of Engineering, which are existing in the Calcutta University, are not provided for. No doubt, there is a provision in section 23 of the Statutes for constituting new Faculties. But, my Lord, it would be far more desirable and will evoke more enthusiasm if new Faculties and the older Faculties of Medicine and Engineering are provided for in the Bill itself. Then in the second place, my Lord, there are certain other features concerning the constitution of the University which are open to objection. Some of these have been referred to by my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sinha, and I associate myself with his remarks. My Lord, I would remark that a University, which is a seat of learning whose motto must be advancement of learning should be the last place where the new fetish of communal representation should find a place. These features I beg your Excellency's Government to seriously consider, and at this stage there is nothing more for me than to give my hearty support to the introduction of this measure."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum:—"My Lord, I fully approve of this Bill, and that for several reasons. First of all, it shows that however slow its growth the University Commission Report is going to bear fruit rapidly, and secondly, from the figures which the Hon'ble Mr. Sharp has given us it is very evident that education is spreading so fast in East Bengal that a University there is a necessity, and the third point is, that Calcutta is so crowded at present that the more we can discourage visitors coming to Calcutta, the better. Of course I do not refer to visitors like your Excellency and the Members of your Excellency's Government whom we shall always welcome in Calcutta." 1-59 P.M.

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi:—"My Lord, I am naturally highly gratified at the reception which the motion before the Council has received at the hands of Honourable Members. Representatives of various provinces have welcomed the motion for the introduction of this measure, and on the whole, barring one voice, one discordant voice, the spokesmen have all been unanimous in welcoming the measure. 2 P.M.

"And even as regards the one discordant note which has been struck—I allude to the speech delivered by the Hon'ble the Maharaja of Kasimbazar,—I noticed that he himself was willing to admit that the Government was bound to carry out its pledge. Secondly, he said that he was not opposed to the creation of a University at Dacca. Now, in the face of these two admissions, it seemed to me somewhat difficult to understand the position of the Hon'ble Maharaja when he raised certain objections with reference to the introduction of the Bill. In brief the objections amounted to this. 'Although I admit that Dacca ought to have its University, although I also admit that the Government is bound to fulfil its pledge, yet I would rather the fulfilment of that pledge and the consequent establishment of the University at Dacca were postponed.' That was really the net result of the speech delivered by the Hon'ble Maharaja. Well, my friend, the Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya has dealt with that portion of the Maharaja's speech. He has pointed out that there is really no valid reason whatever disclosed in the points raised by the Maharaja for the postponement which he has advocated.

"Certain other Hon'ble Members pointed out that the number of Faculties which we propose to create is too small, and that there ought to be a Faculty of Commerce, a Faculty of Engineering and a Faculty of Technology. In reply to that criticism I wish only to point out that there are at this moment at Dacca materials in existence for the immediate creation of the three Faculties which are expressly mentioned in clause 23 of the Bill, and in consequence, those three Faculties have been named in the clause; but at the same time a provision is made in that clause for the creation of other Faculties hereafter. The reason for that is obvious. No statutory enactment could in express terms at the outset provide for the creation of Faculties in the manner in which clause 23 has provided, unless there was either the material in existence already or a likelihood of the material coming into existence immediately after the passing of the enactment. That is the sole reason why none of the other Faculties are mentioned, but provision is made in clause 23 for the creation of other Faculties, and I have no doubt that when the University does really come into existence and the various bodies, the creation of which is contemplated by the Bill, actually are created, if they find that there are prospects of successfully running those Faculties which my Hon'ble friends have mentioned, then I have no doubt that the authorities of the University will create those Faculties. But in any case the addition of one or two more Faculties is a matter which can be considered in the Select Committee stage. As I said in my opening speech, the Government is not tied down finally to every provision of the Bill as it has now been framed.

"Some of my friends objected to the introduction of communal representation in the University bodies. My Hon'ble friend Mr. Sinha asked me to point out in the Report of the Commisson any reference to the application of the principle of communal representation. Well, I need only refer him to just two or three places in the Report of the Commission to show that we have in this respect merely carried out the recommendations of the Commission. If he will refer to page 217 where the constitution of the Court is described in the Report of the Commission, he will find for instance, in regard to the representation of graduates—' 30 graduates of the University elected by the registered graduates from their own body, of whom 15 should be Muslim graduates elected by the graduates registered as Muslim graduates.'

"Then he will find '40 members appointed by the Chancellor, of whom not less than 20 shall be Mussalmans.'

" Then in another part of the Report, at page 219, in the constitution of the Executive Council, he will find ' 4 persons appointed by the Chancellor, of whom 2 shall be Mussalmans.' Then ' four persons elected by the Court, two of these being elected by the Muslim members of the Court,' and so on. I think it is hardly necessary for me at this stage to cite for the benefit of my Hon'ble friend the various passages dealing with the question of Muhammadan representation in the Report. He must have seen from the few references I have made that the Commission have provided for Muhammadan representation, and we have simply embodied in the Bill the recommendations of the Commission.

" Certain other matters to which Hon'ble Members have invited attention are really matters of detail which do not require any discussion at this stage. It will be open to Hon'ble Members to invite the attention of the Select Committee to them, and as I said in my opening address, opinions received from Local Governments, from the Universities and from public bodies between the date of the introduction of the Bill and its reference to the Select Committee, will be duly considered by the Select Committee.

"I am grateful to my Hon'ble friends for their kindly references to myself and I am very glad indeed that the Bill has received such a warm welcome at the hands of representatives of all provinces."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi :—" My Lord, I now beg to introduce the Bill and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English and in the local official Gazettes in English and in such other languages as the Local Governments think fit."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Council then adjourned till 11 A.M. on Friday, the 12th September, 1919.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

(5 & 6 Geo. V, Ch. 61.)

The Council met at the Council Chamber, Viceregal Lodge, Simla, on Friday, the 12th September, 1919.

PRESENT:

His Excellency BARON CHELMSFORD, P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., G.C.M.G., G.C.B.E., Viceroy and Governor General, presiding, and 53 Members, of whom 15 were Additional Members.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :— 11 A.M.

1. "Do Government contemplate any change in the law of naturalization with a view to keep out Germans ?" Change in the law of naturalization.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"The only change in the law of naturalization which the Government of India have in view is that contained in the Bill to amend the Indian Naturalization Act, 1852, which was introduced in this Council on the 3rd September, 1919.

The Hon'ble Member's attention is drawn to sub-section (2) of section 3 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1918, which permits in exceptional cases only, during a period of ten years after the war, the grant of certificates of naturalization in the United Kingdom to subjects of countries which were at war with His Majesty at the time of the passing of that Act. That provision of the law does not apparently apply to India, but the Government of India have adopted the same policy. The result is that any application in India by a German for a certificate of naturalization will, during a period of ten years after the war, be refused, unless the applicant—

(a) has served in His Majesty's forces or in the forces of any of His Majesty's Allies or of any country acting in naval or military co-operation with His Majesty; or

(b) is a member of a race or community known to be opposed to the enemy governments; or

(c) was at birth a British subject."

Report of the Weights and Measures Committee.

2. "When do Government contemplate taking action on the Report of the Weights and Measures Committee?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"The matter is under consideration. I am unable to say yet whether any action will be taken on the Report."

Duty on silver.

3. "Has the present duty on silver the effect of raising its price in this country? If so, have Government considered the question of removing the duty?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

"As the import of silver into India on private account is at present prohibited, the effect of the import duty on the internal price is probably nil, though in ordinary times no doubt the effect of the duty is as stated in the question. It would be premature for Government to state what their policy will be as regards the duty when the present restriction on import is removed, as this matter is one which will no doubt come under consideration by the Currency Committee."

Gold at the Ottawa Mint.

4. "(a) What is the amount of gold held by the Ottawa Mint on account of the Secretary of State for India, who has authorised it to sell on his behalf telegraphic transfers on India, without any limit as to the amount for gold to be tendered at that mint?

(b) In taking this step, were Government aware of the strong feeling in this country against the location of the Gold Standard Reserve in London?

(c) Will not this power given to the Ottawa Mint operate against a flow of gold from the United States to this country?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

(a) "The Government have so far received no information of any gold having been tendered at the Ottawa mint under the arrangement referred to by the Hon'ble Member.

(b) Does not arise, as any gold so tendered would in all probability not form part of the Gold Standard Reserve, and in any case would be shipped to India.

(c) The answer is in the negative. The effect of such transactions, should any take place, will for the reason just given be the opposite of that suggested by the Hon'ble Member."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

5. "Does the exemption granted to the Tea Industry from payment of income-tax continue? What was the loss to revenue from that exemption in 1918?" Exemption of Tea Industry from income-tax.

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

"The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative, but assessment of the tax has been postponed pending the decision of the Calcutta High Court on a test case.

To answer the second part of the question is not possible without a detailed examination of the books of all the companies concerned, and, in view of the labour which this would entail, the Government do not feel justified in asking the companies to supply the information."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

6. "Is it true that the coinage of gold coins at the Bombay Mint has been stopped in obedience to an order of the English Treasury? Will Government be pleased to make a statement on the matter and indicate when gold coinage in India is to be resumed?" Coinage of gold at the Bombay Mint.

"It is the case that the minting of gold coins at the Bombay branch of the Royal Mint has been suspended. This was done on a suggestion from His Majesty's Treasury, as their Deputy Master, who was in charge of the Bombay Mint, had to be invalided in April last. In point of fact it was a substantial convenience for the Government of India to be able to utilise the plant of the gold mint, in order to supplement that of their own silver mint, the resources of which were severely taxed in order to cope with the great demand for rupee coinage; while at the same time experience had shown that, owing to the large internal premium on gold, the minting of gold coins for use as currency was in present circumstances of little assistance, as such coins did not remain in circulation. The resumption of gold coinage in India will depend on the future currency policy of the Government as arrived at after the Indian Exchange and Currency Committee, now sitting in London, has concluded its deliberations."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

7. "Will Government be pleased to state what progress has been made with the Conkan Railway on the Western Coast? To whom has the concession for construction been given? Is it an Indian Company? Will the State build and manage the Railway themselves?" The Conkan Railway on the Western Coast.

"A detailed survey by the agency of the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway has recently been sanctioned for a metre gauge railway from Karad via Chiplun to Ulva.

Consideration is also being given to an alternate proposal for serving the same interests by a broad gauge branch taking off from the Great Indian Peninsula Railway.

No decision can be come to as to the agency which will build and work the railway until both proposals have been fully examined."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

The Currency Committee.

8. " What is the number of Indian and European witnesses invited from this country to give evidence before the Currency Committee ? "

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

" The number of witnesses who have gone from India with the special object of giving evidence before the Currency Committee, are :—

Indians	4
Europeans	None.

The Government of India understand, however, that apart from these, the Committee are taking the opportunity to examine several persons from India who happen to be in England for other reasons."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

Commission allowed by firms manufacturing Railway materials.

9. " (a) Is it a fact that firms manufacturing Railway material give large commissions on the prices quoted to the agencies through which orders are placed ?

(b) Is the Railway material purchased for the Indian Government either by the Railway companies or their agents or by Government purchased direct from the manufacturing firms or through commission agencies ?

(c) Who appropriates the difference, if any, between the actual net rate received by the manufacturer and the nominal quotation rate ?

(d) What is the percentage of difference, if any, on the average ? "

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied :—

" In reply to the first two parts of the Hon'ble Member's question, Government have no knowledge of commissions being paid by firms manufacturing railway materials to those through whom orders are placed, and would not countenance the existence of any such practice. Government do not employ commission agencies for the purchase of railway materials.

The other parts of the Hon'ble Member's question do not arise."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

10. " Will Government be pleased to state—

Proceedings taken against persons under the Defence of India Act, etc., since 30th March, 1919.

(1) the number of persons against whom proceedings have been taken since the 30th March, 1919, (a) under the Defence of India Act, and (b) under the Bengal and Madras State Prisoners Regulations, in each of the provinces in India, and

(2) the number of persons interned or deported since that date ? "

" (1) (a) So far as information is available the total number of persons against whom proceedings of any kind, including judicial prosecutions, were taken under the Defence of India Rules during the period named was 111. This includes action taken temporarily against Afghans during the Afghan war ; and also temporary orders of precensorship or exclusion passed against particular newspapers and orders for the censorship of correspondence. It does not include some prosecutions which were ordered by District Magistrates in the Punjab under powers delegated to them. The number of these is not known to the Government of India.

(b) The number of persons against whom action was taken under the Bengal and Madras Regulations was 18, of whom 13 were deported from Peshawar when martial law was declared there after the outbreak of the war with Afghanistan.

If the Hon'ble Member wishes to have the information I shall be glad to furnish him with a statement showing the number of persons confined under these Regulations who were released during this period.

(2) The total number of persons interned or deported under the Rules or Regulations, again including action taken in consequence of the Afghan war, was 49. Orders of restriction were also passed in 26 cases."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"May I ask a supplementary question? How many were released?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"I shall be very glad to give the Hon'ble Member the information privately or lay it on the table as he may desire."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

11. "(a) What is the estimated additional cost per annum by reason of the increases sanctioned since January, 1919, in salaries, pensions and other emoluments under each of the following heads (i) the Army, (ii) the Indian Police Service, (iii) the Indian Forest Service, (iv) the Indian Medical Service and (v) the Educational Service?

(b) Will Government be pleased to state whether any additional taxation is contemplated and, if so, in what directions, to meet such increased cost?"

"(a) The estimated additional cost per annum on account of increased salaries sanctioned since January 1919 is as follows :—

	Recurring cost per annum. Rs.
(i) The Army :—
A. Increase of pay of matrons employed in Station Family Hospitals	24,000
B. Revised rates of furlough pay to Indian Army and Indian Medical Service Officers	3,30,000
Total	3,54,000
(ii) The Indian Police Service	13,00,000
(iii) The Indian Forest Service	4,50,000
(iv) The Indian Medical Service, Civil and Military Sections	25 00,000
(v) Educational Service ad interim relief	2,50,000

The Government of India have addressed the Secretary of State regarding the recommendations of the Public Services Commission in respect of pensions and other allowances of the civil services, including the Police, Forest and Educational Services. Orders have very recently been received on certain points only, the financial effect of which in regard to the above services cannot yet be stated on the data now available.

(b) The Government do not know how far additional taxation may ultimately prove necessary to meet the expenditure involved by these increases of pay, coupled with the revisions of the pay of subordinate establishments which have been recently carried out or are under contemplation in the various provinces."

The Asiatics Trading Act. 12. "Has the attention of Government been drawn to the recent enactment by the South African Union legislature of the Asiatics Trading Act and to allegations that serious disabilities are thereby imposed upon the Indian community in the Transvaal? If so, what steps have Government taken to safeguard Indian interests in the colony?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied:—

"This matter was fully dealt with in His Excellency's speech on the opening day of this Session, to which I refer the Hon'ble Member."

RESOLUTION re APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSION TO INQUIRE INTO RECENT DISTURBANCES IN THE PUNJAB—(Contd.)

The President:—"The debate will be resumed on the Resolution moved by the Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya."

11-15 A.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda:—"My Lord, rising to speak on this Resolution at this stage I confess to a feeling of some embarrassment. There is so much to say that I really do not know where to begin, where to end, what to say or how much to say. Now, in spite of what has fallen from the lips of my Hon'ble and gallant friend sitting to my right (Hon'ble Sir Umar Hayat Khan) whose authority on military affairs in the Punjab no one for a moment will dispute, I feel constrained to say that one feels that recent happenings in the Punjab have been such as to make it impossible to believe that anything even making a near approach to them could happen under the British administration I take it, my Lord, that my Hon'ble and gallant friend and gentlemen of his way of thinking believe that there was nothing to complain of about the treatment meted out to the people of the Punjab recently But, my Lord, on the other hand, I do not refer to the communications, the harrowing accounts which some of us have been receiving first-hand from people living in the Punjab. Leave that alone. There is the resignation of Sir Sankaran Nair which the other day the Secretary of State told the House of Commons, as wired by Reuter, was due to his views with regard to martial law in . . . .

The President:—"Order, order, I stopped the Hon'ble Pandit when he referred to Sir Sankaran Nair's resignation. There is no official statement to which the Hon'ble Member can refer. The Hon'ble Member must leave the subject."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda:—"I bow to your Lordship's decision. I referred only to what was stated by the Secretary of State in Parliament. However, that is interpreted by the people differently and simply on that account, apart from other evidence the people feel distressed about the Punjab. Then, my Lord, when a saintly character like Mr. C. F. Andrews was denied entry into the Punjab to see with his own eyes the state of things there, you cannot expect that that would have a reassuring effect upon the public mind that everything there would bear open scrutiny. Then there are the proclamations, notifications, ordinances, orders, I do not know by what name they are called, issuing from the martial law administration, some of which have seen the light of day and which fill the mind with amazement mingled with indignation. I am not surprised my Lord, that my Hon'ble and gallant friend, the Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan, Tiwana, not only sees nothing to object about the treatment of the Punjabis under martial law régime, but would resent any one from outside calling attention to what has been described by Sir Rabindranath Tagore, the poet and recluse who never mingles in politics, but felt constrained in his protest against the administration of martial law in the Punjab to request to be relieved of his knighthood, 'as a degradation not fit for human beings' under 'methods of administration without a parallel in the history of civilized nations.' I say, my Lord, I am not surprised at that attitude. The mentality is easily understandable. Then, my Lord, if even a tenth part of the allegations and suggestions which the industry and devotion of the Hon'ble Pandit has formulated in a string of questions of the most searching character and which has found its way into the press, bears anything like semblance of truth in them, one would say that he would like to run away from this land and go into the jungles. I sincerely trust, my Lord, for the good name of the Government under which I am proud to live that my Hon'ble friend is mistaken. I sincerely trust that these charges are untrue, but, if true, my Lord, would they not constitute a very grave indictment against the administration of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, hardly less grave than the charges that were made against Warren Hastings? My Lord, I humbly submit that these things must be refuted, must be disproved by the findings of a tribunal, of an independent tribunal, whose verdict will carry universal assent. My Lord, it is hardly necessary to point out in the words of the Court of Directors of the East India Company that it is not enough that justice is done but the people should be made to realise, to feel that justice is being done. The Government of India is responsible for ratifying the policy adopted by Sir Michael O'Dwyer, and it is a matter for grave regret that the Government do not see its way to have a Royal Commission to investigate these charges, a Commission whose verdict, whose decision would carry infinitely greater weight than that of any Commission or Committee that may be appointed in this country. My Lord, in view of the fact that the policy that will have to come under the scrutiny of the Committee is ultimately the policy of the Government of India, it can hardly be doubted that the finding of the Committee in so far as it may find in favour of that policy will not carry conviction if it has to report to the Government of India. On the other hand, my Lord, I fully realise that in view of the fact that your Excellency was pleased to announce the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry and the terms of reference to it, it is hardly likely that the Government will feel disposed to accept the suggestion of my Hon'ble friend to have another Commission.

"My Lord, I submit that under these circumstances it is very desirable to find a via media, and a practical solution would be to ask the Committee to report not to the Government of India but to the Secretary of State. The composition of the Committee should also be revised. It cannot be denied that the composition of the Committee has not evoked much enthusiasm in the country among the Indians. Of course I do not speak about the Anglo-Indian press which in this matter does not count. My Hon'ble friend read extracts from the leading organs of what is known as the moderate party, and even they do not appear to be satisfied with the composition of the Committee. In the first place, the Indian element is hardly adequate. In a matter like this I submit that the number of Indians should be equal to that of the Europeans. In the next place, as regards the personnel of this Committee, we see here as we saw in the case of the recent Reforms Committee that a Moslem member is drawn from one of the Indian States. I do not know if that means the introduction of a new policy. Without making any the slightest reflection in the remotest degree against the gentleman concerned, I submit that it is hardly right and fair to the great Moslem community to go out of British India to the Indian States, to make a selection of a Moslem member. I submit that this is a matter for your Excellency's consideration. I submit that in these circumstances the best thing would be to add another Indian member selected in such a manner as would give satisfaction to the Indian community. I do not know that any better selection could be made than one from the panel which my Hon'ble friend suggested in the revised Resolution which he wished to move but was not allowed to move. Say what you will, it is impossible to deny that the judgments or decisions, call them by the term judgments if you like, of the courts of martial law, which was described by Lord Haldane when dealing with applications to grant leave to appeal to the Privy Council from the martial law decisions, 'as a negation of law' have caused deep distress to the public that Indians of the Punjab who are held in high esteem for their character and position are branded as rebels. There may be technical difficulties in the way of a Committee going into these matters, but surely something can be devised if you really wish to bring peace to the land. The Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya suggested that there had been convictions without any record of any summary or any memorandum of evidence, convictions without reasons of decisions, cases without even disclosing the offences, cases taken up at midnight without giving due notice to the accused persons, their relations, friends or lawyers of the change of date, because martial law was going to expire after midnight. In such cases the mind is distressed and unless you find some means by which these cases can be scrutinised, the grievance will remain. I really feel that there can be no real difficulty in finding a means, if you wish it. If you can have an Indemnifying Bill you may as well have some measure which will enable these cases being revised. A simple process would be to vest the Committee with power to investigate the cases with power to investigate this matter, look into the judgments and then report to His Majesty in Council with recommendations for annulment of convictions. We are grateful to your Excellency and to His Honour Sir Edward Maclagan for acts of clemency in the wholesale reductions of sentences ordered. I do not know if the Government have seen an account given by a press correspondent of his interview with Kali Nath Rai after his release from jail. It appears therefrom that these acts of clemency failed to evoke any response in the hearts of the accused persons. It appears almost as a mockery to tell an innocent man that his sentence has been reduced or that he has been pardoned. In these cases what is prayed for is no clemency but justice, no favour but fair treatment. With these humble words I support the Resolution of my learned friend."

11-28 A.M. The Hon'ble Sardar Sunder Singh Majithia:—"My Lord, I sincerely deplore the most unfortunate events that have happened in my province, and in view of the Committee of Inquiry that was announced by your Excellency in your Excellency's opening speech this Session on the 3rd September, and which I have no hesitation in saying will be welcomed by my fellow-subjects in the Punjab, I think the Resolution of my Hon'ble friend is unnecessary, as the necessity of an inquiry which my Hon'ble friend wanted has already been conceded. I would, however, very strongly urge the addition of a third Indian member, from amongst the public men in India, on this Committee. I hope that if your Excellency's Government were to accede to this request, it will satisfy everybody.

"Your Excellency, as representing His Majesty the King Emperor, is, I think, the right person to whom this report of the Committee should be submitted.

"One point more I would, however, suggest if the enquiry has to serve a useful purpose ; and that is that an assurance should be given to the people who are to give evidence before this Committee that they will be fully protected from every sort of harassment from the underlings of the Police or otherwise.

"The need of an inquiry having been admitted and a Committee having been appointed, I would advise my Hon'ble friend, the mover, if it would not be wise to withdraw his motion."

The Hon'ble Raja Sir Rampal Singh :—"My Lord, I think I would be failing in my duty towards my country and its Government if I do not make a few observations in support of the Resolution that was moved by the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya. After the announcement made by your Excellency as to the appointment of the Committee and its personnel and the terms of reference, I thought it might not be of much avail to press the Resolution on the attention of the Government. But the exigencies of the situation require that the views of the non-official Members of this Council and of those whom they represent, may with advantage be put before the Government, with the object of impressing upon them the desirability of some modification in the constitution of the Committee and their terms of reference in order to restore confidence in the public mind which has got shattered in the sense of justice of the Government. 11-30 A.M.

"With all the precautions that were taken to exclude the public from getting a glimpse of the terrible happenings in the Punjab, the country is full of all sorts of rumours which have created a wide-spread dissatisfaction, discontent and resentment. I have no direct knowledge of the disturbances and the manner in which the Punjab authorities quelled them, but the little that I could gather from the papers and other sources is enough to convince me that the stern measures adopted under the plea of restoring law and order were uncalled for, hasty, and out of all proportion to the gravity of the situation. Was the Government justified in declaring a state of open rebellion in the Punjab, I believe not. At a time when the Government was entangled in the grip of bloody war, the Punjab showed by her enormous contributions in men and money, her sincere earnestness and loyal devotion to the cause of the Empire. How was it that a few months after the war which had terminated in the much desired victory of the Sarkar she got her head turned as to rebel against that very Sarkar ?

"It requires too great a stretch of one's imagination and too great a strain on one's credulousness to believe that a state of open rebellion did exist in the Punjab. However, if for argument's sake, it may be admitted that such a state of things did prevail there was it justifiable for the authorities concerned not to have used proper and wise discretion in the exercise of the unrestricted powers that seem to have been bestowed upon them ? The seriousness of the recent Punjab affairs cannot be too highly exaggerated and a patient and impartial inquiry and the redress of the wrongs that might have been done can only clear the atmosphere and restore confidence in British justice. The times are changed. The moral sensibility of India has become very sensitive in sympathy with the modern standard, and so any miscarriage of justice or any high-handedness creates a feeling of alarm and resentment not only in the locality concerned, but throughout the length and breadth of the country.

"(Political demonstrations, strikes and passive resistance are matters of common occurrence in modern political warfare in democratic countries. What wonder there is if India, walking on the footsteps of such countries and taking her lessons from the people who rule over her, indulges in similar movements. Never in those countries is a state of open rebellion declared, then why should India receive a different treatment at the hands of her Government?) I admit the populace of this country is not as disciplined and orderly as of some of the European countries, and sometimes control over the mob is lost and most reprehensible excesses are committed which cannot be too highly deplored and condemned. No sane man can have the least sympathy with the culprits of such excesses. By all means they deserve the severest punishment which the Criminal Law provides. But, my Lord, to conclude from such excesses that the country is in a state of rebellion is nothing short of libel to the good name, reputation and honour of India. I, therefore, pray that the Government will be pleased to see their way to modify the constitution of the Committee and the terms of reference in such manner as to secure the confidence of the country.

"My Lord, we are very keen on an inquiry to be made by an independent and impartial Committee having a sufficient number of Indians on it and commanding the confidence of the public. If the Punjab will be adjudged by such a tribunal to be guilty of rebellion against the Sovereign, I am sure she would willingly do the penances for her misdeeds and the people outside her limits will only pity her folly. But if the case is otherwise and there were potent provocative causes for the disturbances, the sin of defaming the name of India will fall on those who misled the Government of India into commiting this serious blunder."

11-35 A.M. The Hon'ble Mr. K. V. Rangaswamy Ayyangar:—"When I rise to say a few words on this occasion, I am not unmindful of your Excellency's advice not to accentuate the differences between the races by our speeches. Had the Government of the Punjab and the Imperial Government only cared for this principle not to stir up race hatred by unnecessary and unjust acts, there would have been no occasion for such an advice as came from your Excellency at the opening day to the Members here. As if those acts have not already created a feeling of estrangement our speeches expressing the sentiments of the people are not going to create any new differences. Your Excellency also said on the opening day that the Government cannot deviate from the policy and all our talks and efforts to make the Government deviate from the policy were futile.............

The President:—"I never said anything of the sort, Mr. Ayyangar. Please quote me correctly if you quote me at all."

The Hon'ble Mr. K. V. Rangaswamy Ayyangar:—"Then I much regret. It is our duty to voice forth the sentiments of the people, and this makes me bold to say what I feel, and what the country feels over the Punjab incidents.

"It was on the occasion of the Anniversary of the Durbar Day in 1912, the gravest act of treason was committed by some individual in throwing a bomb at no less a person than that most humane and just ruler Lord Hardinge. The then head of the Government did not commit any hasty action and pronounce martial law at Delhi and sack Delhi. There was even a talk that some military authority approached the Government for a similar proclaiming, but that it was not permitted. Thus the then rulers averted a great calamity that would have befallen India as it happened during recent times.

" Your Excellency had asked us to go and see the spot personally even now. No one denies there were certain rash acts committed by some stray individuals in tearing asunder the railway lines and telegraph wires and burning properties. The loss of innocent European lives is highly regrettable. By all means trace out the culprits and award them due sentences. But how could the British sense of justice suffer to see other than the real culprit pay the penalty ? The organisers of the meeting for the repeal of the Rowlatt Act should not have been held responsible for the rash acts of these stray individuals. Could the organisers of the Durbar Day in 1912 be court-martialled for the rash acts of the bomb-thrower on Lord Hardinge ? Against such an act there have been demonstrations in the whole of India. But in the other parts of the country the authorities acted with calmness and prudence, while in the Punjab they immortalised themselves by interpreting constitutional agitation as ' open rebellion.' I have it on the authority of the moderate journal ' The Leader ', that the Provincial Satrap of the Punjab is said to have declared his intention of taking a note of the Anti-Rowlatt agitation and Passive Resistance demonstration before there was any disturbance of peace. A meeting was held at Amritsar and the two leaders that took part in it were deported under the Regulation, III of 1818. At Lahore on the 10th April, a small crowd passing through the street in an unoffensive manner was fired upon. Bombs were thrown from aeroplanes; the authorities in the Punjab did not apprehend any rebellion; and the martial law was not declared to quell any rebellion, but to teach a lesson to the political agitators what it is to mix up with politics. As a matter of fact, I was told by a respectable gentleman, that an Englishman who wanted to enter the Punjab and make inquiries for himself was told by a very high authority, that the people should be taught a lesson, as to how they would fare if they would molest any European. If it is asserted that martial law was only introduced only after a serious rioting, it may be pertinently asked, whether Martial Law Orders were not issued to the province of Delhi and parts of Bombay also. But for the tactful handling of the situation Delhi, Bombay and Calcutta also should have fared the fate of the Punjab. What I want to point out is, that the Martial Law Orders were passed before there was rioting or rebellion ; and without the martial law there would be restored quiet in the Punjab as in Delhi, Bombay and Calcutta. The measures adopted there are according to the judgments of persons who were in touch with the Punjab, and gentlemen, who cannot come to false conclusions, grossly illegal, excessive, and wrong, and the reports conveyed in the papers about such atrocities as committed at Jallianwalla Bagh and other places, fill one's heart with horror and dismay. Other ways of teaching the people to look at a European with awe and respect should be resorted to, and martial law is not at all the weapon for that purpose. The principles laid down for the promulgation of martial law does not at all seem to have been observed. ' The only principle on which the Law of England tolerates what is called martial law, is Necessity.' Every bad act in this world is only the result of hasty action ; and hasty actions should be questioned by an impartial Tribunal and retribution effected.

" The Right Hon'ble Lord Sinha says, in the House of Lords, that it was not in the power of the tribunal to sentence these men, save for anything else than transportation for life and forfeiture of property. The Judges and the Tribunals, and the Right Hon'ble gentlemen were convinced that the judgment is quite unjustified in the case of Hari Krishnan Lal, and a lot of others, but yet they have to plead that it was not in their power to award just and deserving judgments. Why should we drag in a martial law and place these men for trial under Martial Law Tribunals when the ordinary courts were going, and then plead that it is not in our power to award just judgments? The judgment in the case of Hari Krishnan Lal read together with the Amritsar one forms one of the saddest commentaries on British justice . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" May I rise to a point of order ? Is the Hon'ble Member in order in discussing a judgment which is now pending before the Privy Council ? "

The President :—" The Hon'ble Member is not in order. If the Hon'ble Member will look at Rule 3(c) and at Rule 15 he will see that he is not in order in referring to any matter which is under adjudication by a court of law. Therefore he must not mention the matter at all."

The Hon'ble Mr. K. V. Rangaswamy Ayyangar :—" We want the Committee to inquire whether martial law was necessary and justified, and whether the findings of the Martial Law Courts, the severity and the cruelty of their sentences were right. And if they were not right what are the proceedings to be taken against the administrators and promulgators of martial law, and what is the compensation that is to be given to the innocent and injured? Many adult earning members of large families were incapacitated and many died. The Committee should find out whether the shooting of the people was justified before there was any disorder and whether there were any disorders before fire was opened. It is to question the action of the Government of India, the Government of the Punjab, and the administrators of martial law, that we want the Commission of Inquiry. The Commission that we want should be unconnected with the Government of India, and it should be elected by the Non-Official Members of this Council or nominated by His Majesty's Government. The Committee that has been appointed may carry out the orders, and act up to the terms of reference, of the Government of India. But what we the people of India want is, that an independent Committee should be constituted to find out how the wrongs done to the people may be rectified and compensated, and to devise means how such outrages will not be made possible to be repeated again by an easily excitable authority with an inflammable Press.

" It is unfortunate that of all the Provinces, the Punjab which has supplied so many recruits to the army, and on whose wheat the major portion of the life in the British Empire is sustained, should suffer this monstrous treatment. It was only the other day, in this very Council, that Sir Michael O'Dwyer wasted nearly an hour in praise of his province, the Punjab. The latest Administration Report also is very eulogistic of the Punjab services and loyalty. Then as the ' Modern Review ' puts it, either those protestations were reprehensible untruth, or the province was suddenly converted to a mire of discontent on account of bad rule. Will the Committee be empowered to suggest how the authorities who were the cause of all this discontent, and those of them who were responsible for unnecessary harshness and cruelty, and those also who by corrupt practices became rich at the expense of the people, should be punished?

" I am bringing to notice that such a thing has happened and I hope that the people will be treated with justice by the Committee of Inquiry."

11-45 A.M. The Hon'ble Raja of Kanika :—" My Lord, I entirely agree with my friend the Hon'ble Sardar Sundar Singh that a Committee having already been appointed to inquire into the recent events in the Punjab, it is not necessary for my Hon'ble friend Pandit Malaviya to press this Resolution. I think if another Indian is appointed to the Committee it will give satisfaction to all."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I am afraid that the Hon'ble Member has been a little unlucky in his attempt to modify the terms of his Resolution, but if that is so, I think that many in this Council will agree that it is largely owing to his own fault. Since the Secretary of State's speech in the House of Commons most people have been aware of the character of the inquiry which the Government of India proposed into these disorders, and certainly on the 3rd of this month it was quite obvious what the intentions of the Government of India and the Secretary of State were. The Hon'ble Member at that time, although there was sufficient interval between that date and the 10th, did not give us any notice of any amended form of Resolution until the very last moment, and it is reasonable to assume or conclude,—and the conclusion is fortified by what I have heard here during this debate,—that one of the reasons which led him to this modification of his Resolution was that he could find no support for it in its original form, or no adequate support. The Hon'ble Member has evaded the difficulty by some very clever manœuvring; and he really made a speech which covered all the points in the amended Resolution, although nominally moving the original one. But even then, I think, the Council will realise that he has got himself into a pretty fair muddle at the end. I have not heard one speech from any Hon'ble Member who has been able to support the Resolution in its entirety in its present form. I have heard various suggestions of different kinds from Hon'ble Members. The Hon'ble and gallant Member, Sir Umar Hayat Khan, suggested the addition, I think, of a Punjabi if any one was added to the Committee. The Hon'ble Mr. Crum said 'You should add another European to the Committee'. Mr. Sarma, who is generally a whole-hearted supporter of the Hon'ble mover, said, 'I really cannot support the last part of this Resolution' but other measures to revise sentence should be taken. My Lord, I think it will be obvious to this Council that it is quite impossible for me to announce the decision of Government on any of these new suggestions at a moment's notice. The constitution and terms of reference of this Committee have been settled after very careful consideration and prolonged consultation with the Secretary of State, and Hon'ble Members will themselves realise that it is quite impossible for me to answer these questions offhand. What we all want is an impartial inquiry into this matter which will result in the ascertainment of the facts. The Government deplores as much as the Hon'ble Member does the loss of life that has occurred during these recent disorders. We cannot agree with him, however, that it is a matter of the number so much as of the manner which and the reasons for which these men and women unfortunately met their death. . . . . 11-46 A.M.

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"No 'women'."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"But, my Lord, I do think there is some cause for complaint......

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"May I interrupt my Hon'ble friend? The Hon'ble Member said 'women'; has any woman met her death in these events?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"I did not say death, my Lord, or if I did I made a mistake. One woman was however treated with the greatest indignity and left for dead; I do not know if that will satisfy the Hon'ble Member. But what I was trying to say was that, while the Hon'ble Member and others have deplored these dreadful happenings, there has been, in some quarters, a tendency unfairly to minimise them. If I may cite a very prominent example I could not do better than quote the Hon'ble Mr. Ayyangar. It is my misfortune, my Lord, that the Hon'ble Member cannot hear what I say, charm I never so wisely, so that if I address myself to this point it is not in the hope of convincing him. But what I take exception to is his minimising of these events and calling them 'rash acts.' He referred to injuries and the deaths, murders or some words of that kind, of Indians but not one word of what happened to the outrages on those unfortunate Europeans. Now, I have no desire whatever to excite prejudice in this matter, and if other Hon'ble Members had followed the example of the Hon'ble mover it would have been possible for me to avoid reference to details to a great extent. But I do deprecate any such minimising of terrible incidents. We have, for instance, the case of this lady, Miss Sherwood, to whom I referred just now. Now what are the facts in regard to this unfortunate woman? She had worked for years in this country as a doctor, a perfectly inoffensive woman, respected, as I understand, by all. She was attacked by a mob of people which knocked her down six times, beat her with shoes, struck her with lathis and left her for dead. This is described at a meeting of the All-India Home Rule League, of which I believe the Hon'ble mover is a member..................

11-50 A.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"I am President of the All-India Congress Committee."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"Am I to understand the Hon'ble Member is not a member of the Home Rule League? However, that outrage was described at a meeting of this body as a petty assault. Now I put it to the Council that that is not a fair description..................

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"May I know which body described it as a petty assault?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, may I be allowed to continue my speech without these constant interruptions?"

The President:—"The Hon'ble Member will have an opportunity of replying later, and I think he should allow the Hon'ble the Home Member to continue without interrupting him."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, may I submit that in Parliament questions are asked as the discussion is going on. These questions cannot be asked at the end of a speech."

11-51 A.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, may I ask that the time for which the Hon'ble Member interrupts me may be deducted from the period which I am allowed.

"Then, my Lord, there is another class of men who deplore the occurrence —gentlemen who protest their horror and indignation really as a prelude or as an introduction to deprecating any effective measures being taken to suppress disorders. No attempt, my Lord, was made by gentlemen of this category in any way to stop the false reports about the Rowlatt Act or to quell the disturbances.

"But, my Lord, while I mention these men, it would be ungrateful and unfair of me if I were not also to refer to the services of other Indians, some of whom are in this Council now. I include my Hon'ble and gallant friend Sir Umar Hayat Khan Tiwana, Sardar Sunder Singh and many other members of the Punjab whom it would be invidious to mention, who not only sought to assist Government in this time of trouble, but did everything they could to allay the disorders and further, my Lord, did what was necessary—that which, thank God, has not been necessary since 1857—to save European lives from murder and outrage at the hands of the mob. To them the thanks of Government, as we said in a Resolution at the time, the greatest thanks of Government are deservedly due. I am anxious, my Lord, not to enter into these matters because I do not seek in any way to prejudice this inquiry. I want, as I have said before, to deal with the proposal which is actually before this Council. There have been modifications of the Resolution suggested on which I can, as I have explained, express no opinion. They are matters on which the collective counsels of the Government of India must necessarily be taken, and on which consultation with the Secretary of State will in some cases at least also be necessary. I trust therefore that Hon'ble Members will not press me on points which are not directly before them as part of this Resolution. The proposal before Council is in the first place for the appointment of a Royal Commission. May I point out that the only authority which can constitute a Royal Commission is His Majesty's Government. Now, His Majesty's Government is represented by the Secretary of State so far as India is concerned. The constitution and scope of the present Committee have been settled after prolonged consultation with him and it is, I submit, idle now to ask us, the Government of India having decided the constitution of that Committee, to re-open the matter with him. The Secretary of State, who is His Majesty's representative, has accepted our view that the present form of inquiry is adequate. If any motion for a Royal Commission is now to be made, I submit that it should be made in the House of Commons. But, when he was making the motion, although that is part of the Resolution, the Hon'ble Member did not suggest that the inquiry should be by Royal Commission or that the Committee should be so appointed, but he suggested that certain members should be added to it and that the Committee should report direct to the Secretary of State. There are various arguments which will, I think, commend themselves to reasonable Members of this Council why the Government of India should only appoint a Committee to report to itself. The Government of India cannot say to a Committee 'you are to report to His Majesty or to the Secretary of State or any authority but itself.' Of course, in the normal course of things the report of this Committee will be forwarded by the Government of India to the Secretary of State and will be laid undoubtedly in the ultimate resort before His Majesty's Government. But the authority who appoints a Committee of this kind must, according to ordinary procedure, require that Committee to report to itself. There is, however, really a very much larger question of principle involved. The Government of India has certain statutory responsibilities for the peace and good government of this country, and it cannot divest itself of those responsibilities save for very cogent reasons. To do so would be tantamount to an admission that the Government is not competent to fulfil its proper functions, that it is unworthy of the confidence of His Majesty's Government, and that it is unable to discharge its duties towards its own officers. That is a position which, I think, although some Members of this Council may wish it, the majority will, I hope, not approve. The idea underlying the proposals is that the Government of India is on its trial. My Lord, that is a position that the Government of India do not and cannot accept. Because certain persons have chosen to promote serious disorders in this country, because certain measures have been taken to quell those disorders, is the Government of India for that reason to divest itself of its responsibilities in a matter of this gravity? There can be only one answer to a question of that kind. It is not reasonable that the Government should be required to take such a course, and if such a proposal is to be made, then the proper place in which to move it is another place.

"There remains this question, the third question, I think, of remission of sentences. My Lord, the sentences have been reviewed with the greatest care by the Local Government, and in many cases by the Government of India, and as admitted by many Members of this Council clemency, great clemency, has been shown. It has indeed been alleged in some quarters that the clemency shown by the Government in this matter is an indication of weakness. That is a proposition which the Government of India do not for a moment support. They recognise that many of the unfortunate men who were concerned in these disorders were the dupes of others ; the disorders are now over and the desire of the Government is that normal conditions should return. My Lord, I confess that one is not much encouraged in the exercise of clemency by language such as that used by the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda, but such language will of course not deter the Government of India from continuing in that course which it conceives to be right and just.

" The Hon'ble Mover suggested that it was necessary that the report, so far as sentences are concerned, should be made to His Majesty in Council because otherwise the guilt of these men could not be wiped off, that they could not be purged of the stain that lay on them by reason of the convictions. At least that is what I understood. I think there is some misapprehension on that matter, because your Excellency has in this matter delegated to you exactly the same powers of pardon as those which are exerciseable by His Majesty. This therefore is a reason which will not really hold water.

" The Hon'ble Mover in his opening speech admitted, in the most candid manner, his full confidence that your Excellency and your Excellency's Government would deal with this matter with justice and integrity. He could say nothing himself against the personnel of the Committee and admitted that it really would deal with the inquiry justly, impartially and fairly. I tried to take the words down and I believe I am substantially correct. Now, my Lord, if that is so, is there any reason for changing the whole of the personnel of this Committee ? Is there any reason why, if this Government is, as the Hon'ble Mover says, anxious to act with the utmost fairness, why we should divest ourselves of our responsibility in this matter or that the Committee should report direct to His Majesty's Government ? The inquiry will, as is already known, be as far as possible public, and it is our intention, unless there is some unforeseen reason to the contrary, to publish the final report. The personnel of the Committee is such that it must, in spite of what has been said, command very considerable confidence. There are certain additions proposed to which I have already adverted, but to which I can at the present moment make no definite answer. But I want to assure the Council of this, that the desire of the Government is one and one only, that there may be an impartial inquiry into these disorders, that the truth may be ascertained, and that what is possible may be done to restore normal conditions, to allay racial feeling and restore the country to peace and quiet."

12-6 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha :—" Your Lordship in a controversy on a subject of the character which is now under discussion by the Council, it is very natural that sentiments, feelings, suspicions, imagination and one thing or another of a kindred character should always be mixed up. It is quite natural; and it is only human that in such a controversy there should be extreme views. It is also natural that there should be moderate views as well. Human nature being what it is, I am not at all surprised that one set of controversialists have gone to one extreme and another set of controversialists to another extreme. The pendulum swings from one end to the other. There is no golden mean, as it were, where the whole controversy might be balanced, as we could balance a pair of scales, and come to a right judgment on the subject. That being the situation, my Lord, I am very sorry that the controversy has assumed a kind of character here which is undesirable. But I do believe that what the Hon'ble the Home Member, who has taken the wind out of my sails in some respects, has already said on the subject I may observe that after what the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent has said on the questions raised by the motion of my friend, Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya, it is very necessary that we should calmly consider the matter and have a balance of mind so adjusted as to arrive at a very correct decision on this Resolution. In this matter, I believe that it is always the case that where passions and prejudices and feelings are excited there is not, what you might call, ' clear thinking '. Clear thinking requires clear grasp of facts ; and as far as facts are concerned I find, of course, that facts have been adduced by more than one speaker, which may or may not be right. The merits of the question will be decided by a Committee of Inquiry which has already been appointed. That Committee will really be the tribunal which will go into the correctness of facts, which will inform us exactly what are and what are not facts. Personally, speaking for myself, I am not aware of what the actual facts are and what are not. In Bomby, I read a variety of papers and heard a variety of ' facts ' from persons who said they had had facts on first-hand information received from people in the Punjab who knew what the course of events was. Still, after all, we, Indians, are the persons who have asked for the inquiry. The Government has rightly responded to the request of the public, and, of course, asked the Secretary of State to appoint a Committee of Inquiry. That Committee has already been appointed. Therefore, the only thing now left to us, is to suspend our judgment and see what the inquiry does, what the facts elicited are, what the situation was like, and await their final conclusions. As far as their judgment is concerned I have certainly no fear on the subject. I have, as my friend Pandit Malaviya has said, firm faith in the integrity and impartiality of the tribunal itself ; and I have also large and firm faith in the sense of British justice. British justice may be erratic sometimes, as every human thing is ; even the planets and constellations sometimes go out of their orbits. But still, if there is any prestige for the British Government in India, and if there is any love of British Institutions, among Indians, it is certainly on account of the stern sense of British justice ; and, I repeat, in that justice I have the firmest faith. That being the case, I will only say this : I appeal to my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Malaviya to withdraw his Resolution ; or if he cannot withdraw it, at any rate let him delete that part of it which goes before and refer only to the request that there may be a third Indian member who commands the confidence of the public. Your Lordship, I may say this that I myself have felt, and so too my numerous friends in Bombay as well as my association which has sent a telegram on the subject to the Home Member, that India would be quite satisfied, (so far as I have read the public papers of all sorts and shades of opinion) if a third Indian member enjoying public confidence is appointed. I appeal to your Lordship to intervene in the matter and request the Secretary of State in response to the prayer of the Indian public to appoint a third Indian member, and I think all controversy, all animated controversy, will be at an end. Everybody will be satisfied that a Committee of Inquiry, so constituted as to inspire full confidence, will do full justice to the responsible task entrusted to them. I cannot forget at the same time what my Hon'ble friend Mr. Crum said on this subject from his point of view. Europeans have also a large concern in this inquiry. If there is to be a third Indian member, why not also have a non-official European member who will represent the non-official European point of view ? After all, the Committee, if constituted as now suggested, should inspire confidence, and it is to be hoped that they will come to a right decision. I respectfully resquest that your Lordship with your great authority will represent to the Secretary of State the feelings of the people on the subject. With these few words I resume my seat."

with a sense of very great responsibility. I have had the privilege of addressing Viceroys in this Council on many previous occasions, but never have I addressed the Council on an occasion like this. I realise that feelings have been naturally roused on both sides, which have to some extent found expression in the Council. Far be it from me to say one word that would add to the tension of these feelings on either side, but I hope the few temperate observations I propose to make may be of some use in persuading your Lordship's Government to accept the very reasonable proposal that we have made jointly before the Council. Much has been said by previous speakers to represent the Indian point of view in regard to the situation in the Punjab, and the Hon'ble Mr. Crum has represented to your Lordship the view which our European fellow-subjects have taken in this matter. I would like to give the Hon'ble the Home Member and the Hon'ble Mr. Crum the assurance that I am not one of those who either minimise the gravity of the situation in the Punjab, or say a few words of sympathy by way of a prelude to making further demands. On the contrary, I frankly confess that I am ashamed of the doings of such of my countrymen in the Punjab as had any hand in killing Europeans, or in injuring them or destroying their property, for they had not only harmed Europeans, but injured us also in the matter of our demands for the rights and privileges that we legitimately claim as British subjects in this country. We are all against mob rule. I, therefore, claim that I am not at all minimising the gravity of the situation. In fact, I go further. I heard with surprise the Hon'ble Mr. Crum say that because a few Europeans had suffered or lost their lives, therefore he felt that he and the Europeans were the aggrieved party.

"I venture to say that it seems to me to be putting the case at rather a low level. Whether the people who lost their lives, through the action of the mob, be Europeans or Indians, so long as they are our fellow subjects, of whatever nationality, all British subjects are the aggrieved party. I claim that I feel it as much as the Hon'ble Mr. Crum that my European fellow-subjects should have lost their lives through the action of the mob. At the same time, while candidly admitting that, I would like to lay before your Lordship the Indian point of view. To put it in a short sentence the Indian point of view is this; that although the Government were fully justified in resorting to all effective measures for the purpose of re-establishing law and order, their action went far beyond the requirements of the case. In fact, in the name of law and order things were perpetrated which cannot be justified in the light of that high standard of British justice with which we have been long associated in this country. That, in short, is our point of view. If your Lordship will permit me, I will read out a sentence from a well-known Anglo-Indian paper, the 'Madras Mail'. Coming from an adversary its admission is very valuable. It says in its leading article in a recent issue :—

> 'We are quite convinced that Indian sentiment has been genuinely and deeply stirred by the events in the Punjab, and that, however much capital may be made out of that affair by factious individuals ever on the lookout to vilify the British Raj, there is a substantial body of loyal and moderate opinion which has been shocked by what it regards as an outrage upon Indian fellow-countrymen.'

"My Lord, I submit that in this one short sentence the leading Anglo-Indian paper of Madras summarises and sums up correctly the Indian point of view. My Lord, it is very desirable, therefore, that the Committee which has been constituted should be one which will be able to inspire confidence in the public mind. I do not wish to take up the time of the Council in discussing whether it would have been of greater advantage if this Committee had been a Royal Commission, reporting to His Majesty's Government through the Secretary of State, but I desire to say that in asking for the Royal Commission there is no such feeling as the Hon'ble the Home Member spoke of, namely, that we desire to place the Government of India on their trial. The Hon'ble the Home Member shakes his hand to imply that he refuses to accept my statement, I can assure him . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"That was not intended."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—" I can assure him, speaking with the full weight of responsibility, that it is far from our desire to place the Government of India on their trial. I remember my late lamented leader, Mr. Gokhale, declare on a memorable occasion in this Council that he could not defeat the Government if he would but that he would not defeat the Government if he could, as the prestige of the Government of India was as such a valuable asset to our progress. For similar reasons we do not desire to place the Government of India on their trial. But the real point is this. The Government of India are believed to have been associated too closely with the policy pursued in the Punjab by Sir Michael O'Dwyer. I hope I shall quote your Lordship correctly and shall not make the mistake as the Hon'ble Mr. Ayyangar did. Your Excellency said in your opening address on the 3rd of this month :—' I promised support to the head of each Local Government for such measures as he thought it might be necessary to take, and that support was given unwaveringly throughout.' Now, I am far from suggesting that your Lordship was not justified in taking the line of action you did. I am fully aware of the fact that your Lordship appreciates and realises your responsibilities in this grave matter. I merely submit that the people naturally believe that when that was the view of the Government of India, and they took such action as they did in pursuance of it, the people are not wrong in assuming that the Government of India were too closely associated and identified with the policy pursued in the Punjab. And the reason why we press for a Royal Commission is, that we believe that all human beings, howsoever exalted their position, are liable to be influenced in their action and judgment by an inherent unconscious bias. When the Government of India have admittedly made themselves responsible for the policy of the Punjab Government, we believe that your Lordship's Government will not be in so good a position, for appreciating the evidence and of passing judgment in the matter as another independent body would be. However, the Hon'ble the Home Member says that it is too late now to bring up the proposal and it could only be done in the House of Commons. I do not think I personally can bring it up in the House of Commons, and there is not time enough for us to get it done as the Committee will be coming out soon. That is why we are concentrating our efforts and pressing for an additional Indian member on the Committee. In spite of what the Hon'ble the Home Member said, it is a fact that the Committee, as at present constituted, does not find favour with the bulk of the people. I am sorry to say . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" The Hon'ble Member is wrong."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—" I can assure your Lordship that so far as Indian public opinion has found expression in the press, the constitution of the Committee has been found to be wholly unsatisfactory, and I find that the 'Times of India,' which says that the constitution of the Committee should satisfy all reasonable persons, goes on in the next breath to say that it would like one more member on it. That is a sample of the reasonableness of persons who say in one breath that they accept the constitution of the Committee and in the next that they would like to have one more. That shows that all parties in this country are more or less dissatisfied with the constitution of the Committee. Now I am not going to make any personal observations about the personnel of the Committee, but I would point out that out of the six members of the Committee no less, my Lord, than five are officials, Indian or European, and I believe that there is only one non-official, Sir Chimanlal Setalvad. It is not a matter of race or nationality, but I maintain that when there are no less than five officials and but one non-official on the Committee, it is bound to find very little favour with the public. I, therefore, submit that on this particular matter, the Members of this Council who have spoken so far—the Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha, the Hon'ble the Raja Saheb of Kanika, the Hon'ble Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia and others—all agree that your Lordship should move in the matter and give us at least one more non-official Indian Member to satisfy the public demand. Speaking for myself, if your Lordship's Goverement thinks that there should be added to the Committee a non-official European member also as the Hon'ble Mr. Crum suggested, I have no objection to it. I venture to hope, my Lord, that in the few observations I have made, I have said nothing to rouse feelings on either side, and that they will, therefore, carry weight with your Lordship's Government. I hope that they will be pleased to consider sympathetically the proposal in regard, at any rate, to adding one more non-official Indian member to this Committee. If that is done, I think the Committee's Report may satisfy the public in a larger measure and carry more weight than it otherwise would."

12-24 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. N. F. Paton :—"My Lord, as the Hon'ble the Home Member has said, the object of this Commission is to arrive at the truth in regard to the very deplorable occurrences that took place in the Punjab, and I think that if the widest satisfaction is to be got from the findings of this Commission, it is necessary that the greatest possible confidence should be reposed in it from the start.

"On behalf of the non-official European community, I beg your Excellency's Government to consider the suggestion made by my Hon'ble friend Sir Dinshaw Wacha and by the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha, that there should be nominated on this Committee not only another Indian representative but a representative of the non-official European community as well."

12-25 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, I am indebted to your Lordship for many things and have to thank you for many kind acts. But throughout the period during which I have had the privilege of being known to you, I have never had occasion to be more thankful to you than when you did not allow me to substitute the Resolution which I wanted to substitute for the one that stands on the paper. My Lord, Simla is one of the worst places that could be selected by the Government of India for its headquarters. Matters of the gravest importance are being dealt with by the Government of India, and we are so far removed from the places where the millions dwell that it is practically impossible for any man like me to know what the currents of public opinion in the country are, until perhaps it becomes too late. I gave notice of my intention to substitute a Resolution which your Lordship very kindly disallowed, because in the solitude of Simla and with such support as I could find here, I thought it was best in the circumstances of the situation to substitute the Resolution which I intended to substitute for the one which is on the paper. But from the communications which I have now received from my friends in the country and from the comments which have been published in the press, I find that had I done so I should have exposed myself to their condemnation, because, my Lord, there is one strong chorus of disapproval of the constitution of the proposed Committee, and there is one strong desire that not a Committee, but a Commission, should be appointed to inquire into the occurrences in the Punjab. When a gentleman of the position, the weight and experience of Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, once a Chief Justice of Bombay and of Indore, a gentleman known for his moderate views, also says that a Royal Commission should be appointed, when he too expresses dissatisfaction with the constitution of the Committee which has been announced, I submit, my Lord, that a strong case is made out for a re-consideration of the matter. The press, the Indian press, is almost unanimous in expressing its disapproval of the constitution of the Committee. I do not wish to take up the time of the Council by reading many opinions, because I have to say much. I would invite your Lordship's attention, and the attention of the Government, to what the 'Tribune,' the 'Bengalee,' the 'Bombay Chronicle,' 'the Hindu,' the 'Independent,' the 'Leader' and several other papers have said. That being so, my Lord, I find that I was mistaken in trying to substitute the Resolution which I wanted to substitute for the one before the Council. I am thankful also to find that I was mistaken, because the Hon'ble the Home Member said in one of his answers yesterday that the Government of India is going to appoint a Committee, and I take it therefore that the Committee has not yet been appointed, and that this is just the time when my Resolution should come up before your Excellency's Government for reconsideration.

"Now, my Lord, before proceeding further, I wish to say that the subject-matter of my Resolution requires calm consideration, and I wish every one will approach it in a solemn spirit of responsibility. The matter is too sacred, far too serious, to permit of any party or racial considerations to be brought in. And here I may say once more that there is no man living who can feel more deeply sorry than I do for the loss of Mr. Stewart of the National Bank at Amritsar and of other Europeans who were killed there. In talking about the unhappy incidents of Amritsar to friends in Bombay, Poona and Calcutta, I have everywhere expressed deep sorrow that a gentleman so popular as Mr. Stewart was in Amritsar should have been laid low by the hand of some person in a fit of wickedness. My Lord, six other Europeans lost their lives in these disturbances, and I grieve for every one of them I should be ashamed, I should not be worthy of my religion, if I made any distinction between a European and an Indian where human life was concerned. When the Hon'ble the Home Member referred to the case of Miss Sherwood, he forgot that there were many of us Indians who felt the same grief at the ill-treatment offered to her as we would have felt if similar ill-treatment had been offered to our own dear sister or mother. But that should not lead any one of us to overlook or minimise the wrongs done to Indians. I ask every Anglo-Indian friend, I ask every Anglo-Indian brother and sister, to approach the question in a solemn spirit, and I am sure that when the facts are known, there will not be a single Anglo-Indian man or woman in India, may I go further and say, there will not be a man or woman in the British Empire, who will not feel sorry for the things which have happened and who would not be in sympathy with the object of my Resolution and the proposals which I lay before Government. My Lord, I had no wish to enter here into the details of the harrowing tale of what has happened. I little expected that the Hon'ble the Home Member, himself a previous Judge of the High Court, would import into the discussion of my Resolution irrelevant matters of detail which I had clearly stated ought to be kept out of it.

"I had said that I would not go into details because the Government of India recognised the need and importance of an inquiry. But the speech which the Home Member has made compels me, in order that nobody should be under a misapprehension, to tell your Lordship and this Council, and through this Council the country and the Empire, that at least 300 and odd human lives were destroyed in the Jallianwala Bagh under circumstances which will not bear examination when the facts are known. I hold in my hand letters telling me of the deaths of numerous boys who had gone to the Jallianwala Bagh. One of these boys was Abdul Karim, aged 16 years, who passed the last matriculation examination in the first division, the result of which was published after the boy died. He was shot in three places, on his thigh, his chest and his head and expired instantaneously there. I hold in my hand a photograph of another boy named Madan Mohan, aged 13, son of Dr. Mani Ram, Dentist, who was shot in the head and died instantaneously. My Lord, let me read this letter from the bereaved father which he addressed to the Health Officer, Amritsar. He says :—

> ' As desired in the official notification, I give below a brief account of the tragic death of my son Madan Mohan which occurred in Jallianwala Bagh on 13th April last. The delay in submitting this information is due to my absence from Amritsar to Mussoorie hills.
> ' Jallianwala Bagh is at a distance of about 3 minute's walk and is the only open place near my house which is opposite to Clock Tower. My son Madan Mohan, aged about 13 years (born on 27th Baisakh 1962), along with his playmates used to visit this open square for play almost daily. On 13th April last he went there as usual and met his tragic end, having been shot on the head which fractured his skull, he bled and died instantaneously. I with eight or nine others had to search for about half an hour till I could pick up his corpse as it was mixed up with hundreds of dead bodies lying in heaps there, who met their respective ends under circumstances well known. This is how my innocent child of innocent age was murdered by those who allege they acted in the name of Justice, Law and Order, but behaved in a grossly un-British manner.'

" My Lord, I could mention many other equally distressing cases. I have been twice to the Jallianwala Bagh. The walls around it still speak of the murders that were committed there, of the volleys of service bullets that were fired at the people who were assembled at a meeting, who had no arms, who were not making any protest against anything, but were sitting down to hear a lecture. According to the official statement made yesterday, 300 of such men were massacred there. Perhaps when the inquiry proceeds further, it will be found that the popular estimate that over 1,000 were killed is nearer the truth.

" Now, my Lord, I want the Government to realise the intensity of the feelings of Indians, and I should say they should be the feelings of every human man and woman, in regard to the circumstances. I impute no blame here to any individual. I have avoided trying to apportion blame. I deplore the event. Whether it was a British officer who was guilty of this massacre of innocents or an Indian, it is to me a matter of equal sadness and sorrow. It can give me no pleasure to think that any British fellow subject of mine should have been led by those who were in power, or by his own ignorance or error, to commit any such foul deeds as the people say have been committed. But I do think, my Lord, that the facts which have been stated are grave enough to call for a most impartial and most searching inquiry on the part of His Majesty's Government. I do not know of any event, since the advent of British rule in India, more melancholy, more calculated to distress man than these events of Amritsar, and I therefore say that it is the duty of Government to institute an independent inquiry which will bring out all the real facts. When the facts have been found, I have no doubt that my British fellow subjects, like any other decent people, will call for justice, not with any desire for vengeance, but with the desire that the calls of humanity should be met, the calls of justice should be satisfied. I regret to say that in his attempt to minimise the value of the proposal I have put forward that the inquiry should be by a Royal Commission, the Home Member understated the facts. He showed that he does not yet realise the enormity of the evil that has been wrought ; that he does not yet feel that, holding the office of the Home Member, he ought to stand forward to plead for justice in the case of every single subject of His Majesty who met with death in these tragic times in the Punjab.

" My Lord, if we ask for a Royal Commission, it is not out of any disrespect to your Excellency or to any member of your Excellency's Government. I shall be sorry if any word which I utter should indicate the smallest disrespect to any member of the Government. But, my Lord, what are the facts ? I ask the Government to look at them in a calm dispassionate manner. Mr. Sinha has referred to some of them. You have to deal with public opinion, and the public feel, by reason of the acts committed during the last few months, that the Government of India having been closely identified with the policy pursued in the Punjab, it ought not, in fairness, in propriety, to deal with the report which will be submitted by the Committee of Inquiry into Punjab affairs. My Lord, if the Government of India will appoint this Committee, that fact will no doubt lead naturally to the conclusion that the report should come to the Government of India. I quite agree with the Home Member there. But it is exactly because it is desired that the report should not be dealt with by the Government of India, that it is urged that the Government of India should not appoint the Committee. I quite agree with the Hon'ble the Home Member that if the Government of India does appoint the Committee, the report should come to it. That is why, holding the view I hold, I have urged in my Resolution that the Governor General in Council should request His Majesty's Government to appoint a Commission. I did not use the word 'Royal' before 'Commission,' because I thought it would be understood by everybody familiar with the work of the Government here and in England that, when I said that His Majesty's Government should appoint a Commission, it meant a Royal Commission. Now, my Lord, Commissions and Committees are appointed with a certain purpose. When there was a great outcry about nationalisation in England in March 1919 and a Commission was to be appointed, the 'New Statesman' speaking of its Report, said :—

> 'And, human nature being as it is, the character of that Report depends, almost entirely, on the way in which the Commission is constituted, on which Mr. Lloyd George's final decision will not be known until this article is in the press. The Prime Minister has, therefore, in this matter, during these very days, the gravest of responsibilities. He can appoint members, whom the public will accept as quite a good choice, from whom he can confidently expect one report; or he may choose other members, equally acceptable to the public, from whom he will expect another report. What is vital is to get a report that will prevent the strike. Which Report is Mr. Lloyd George selecting the members for ? "

" It is vital here to get a report which will state the truth in regard to the occurrences in the Punjab.

" Now, my Lord, if the Government of India are going to appoint the Committee, naturally the public ask what has the Committee to inquire into ? Obviously it has to begin with inquiring into the truth or otherwise of the declaration of open rebellion in Lahore. That was not an act of the Local Government, that was an act of your Excellency's Government and all that followed thereafter—the establishment of martial law and its maintenance in spite of the protests of the press and the public,—is all what the Government of India are responsible for, with which they have been closely, sadly too closely, identified. My Lord, your Lordship has desired that a reference should not be made to the reason for the resignation of Sir Sankaran Nair; but when I referred to it the other day, I mentioned that the reason for it had got into the papers ; and to-day I have got in my hand the Debates of the House of Commons which show that a question was put about it by Colonel Wedgewood, in answer to which Mr. Montagu said—'I have no official information, but understand that Sir Sankaran Nair resigned because he differed from his colleagues n the question of continuing martial law in the Punjab.' Now, my Lord, it is no good running away from facts.

'Our acts our angels are, or good or ill,
Our fatal shadows that work by us still.'

"If the Government of India or the Governor General in Council declared that there was open rebellion in Lahore and Amritsar, if the Governor General in Council gave his authority for the establishment of martial law in Lahore, Amritsar and other places, if the Governor General in Council maintained martial law when there were protests from all quarters that it should be ended, if the Governor General in Council, on the protest of a colleague that martial law should cease in the Punjab, accepted his resignation and allowed martial law to continue in the Punjab, then, my Lord, you ought to pardon those who think and say that the Government of India is too closely identified with the policy pursued in the Punjab to take an impartial view of the matters with which the Committee will have to deal, though their bias may be, will be unconscious.

"Lastly, my Lord, there is your Excellency's speech of the 3rd of September. I speak with great respect, but I beg your Lordship and the Government to practise a little introspection on a solemn occasion like this and to reflect whether those who are urging, respectfully urging, that the Committee should not report to your Excellency's Government, are wrong when they find that even in that speech your Lordship showed a very firm attitude in support of what has been done. These are the reasons, my Lord, which have led the public to ask that the Government of India should not appoint the Committee of Inquiry; these are the reasons which justify my Resolution in asking your Excellency's Government to ask His Majesty's Government to appoint a Commission. The Hon'ble the Home Member tries to meet me by saying that the Secretary of State has been consulted. 'It is in consultation with him,' said he, that 'the Committee is going to be appointed'. My Lord, I do not want the Committee to be appointed in consultation with the Secretary of State. I want the Committee to be appointed by him, in order that the report should go to him and therefore be laid at His Majesty's feet.

"My Lord, I will now come to the question of the constitution of the Committee. I beg your Excellency to consider whether public opinion is not justified in expressing disapproval of its constitution. I fear, my Lord, I am exceeding my time. If your Lordship will, in view of the peculiar circumstances permit me to go on, I will. . . . .

The President:—"I have no wish to stop the Hon'ble Member, but I think that five minutes ought to see the end of his speech. He has already exceeded his time."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Thank you, my Lord. The constitution of the Committee is open to exception. As I said on the first occasion, I do not make the smallest insinuation against the impartiality of any member of the Committee, but not knowing some of the gentlemen who have been nominated, the public are sceptical about them. And I am bound to place the public view before this Council and the Government. My Lord, I hope the Hon'ble Mr. Rice will absolutely excuse me if I refer to him by name. The objection is that an additional Secretary to the Government of India in the Home Department should be appointed by the Government of India to a Committee of Inquiry which is to enquire into matters with which the Government of India is identified. I refer to it to show that the Government themselves are to blame for the criticism which is being hurled at the constitution of the Committee

"Now, my Lord, I will, make ~~our~~ suggestion, the Commission which I would suggest should be one consisting of, say, Lord Haldane, Viscount Esher and Sir Lawrence Jenkins, or I should like to have a Commission consisting of Mr. Austen Chamberlain, an ex-Secretary of State for India, and Lord Hardinge and Lord Curzon, ex-Governors General of India. My Lord, I suggest such a Commission as it will command confidence all round.

Speaking of Lord Hardinge I am reminded as one speaker has already said that he passed through more strenuous times in India than any predecessor of his had known, and let us hope any successor will know. He very narrowly escaped death at the hands of a villain, and yet, my Lord, the first thing he uttered to Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson—when he saw him after the bomb had struck him—and I heard it from Sir Guy's own lips, was 'No change of policy, Wilson;' and Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson replied 'No change of policy, your Excellency.' Martial law was not then declared and people were not subjected to any of the troubles they have had to suffer in the Punjab. Lord Hardinge knew the people, he loved them, and I could not suggest a better name for the Commission. Then, I suggest Mr. Austen Chamberlain. We have not had the honour of welcoming him in India, but we have faith in him as an English gentleman that he will do the right thing if he presided over the Commission. And I name Lord Curzon, because I have confidence that, if Lord Curzon came out and inquired into all that happened, he would not spare the wrong doers and the public would be satisfied with his verdict. I place before the Government the option of one of these two Committees. I do not ask for the inclusion of a single Indian name, and I am sure that, if it were necessary, a hundred platforms would support my view and make it clear that the public will be quite satisfied if we had a Commission of the kind I have suggested.

"But, my Lord, if you will not have a Commission of that kind, then you must recognise the justice of putting on the proposed Committee at least one more Indian, not a safe man whose views will not come into conflict with the views of the Government, but a gentleman who enjoys the confidence of the public, and who may be supposed to represent the opposition. 'Ditcher,' writing in 'Capital' has done me the honour of suggesting that I should be placed on the Committee. My Lord, I suggest a better name. I know many facts about the occurrences in the Punjab. I venture to think that I know more facts about these distressing events than probably any member of the Government, either the Government of India or the Government of the Punjab, does; but there is one gentleman who knows more about them, and that is my esteemed friend the Hon'ble Pandit Moti Lal Nehru, Advocate of the Allahabad High Court. He has, my Lord, at the sacrifice of a fee of a thousand rupees a day, laboured for many days in the Punjab sifting out facts, and gathering evidence. He is in possession of a volume of facts which will be of great help to the Committee. I suggest that as Mr. Montagu appointed Lord Sydenham to the Joint Committee, so your Excellency's Government may appoint Pandit Moti Lal Nehru, a clear-headed advocate and a sound lawyer, as a member of the Committee. If he is not acceptable, then I would suggest that Justice Sir Abdur Rahim may be so appointed. My Lord, these are suggestions which, I hope, the Government will consider.

"I will now deal with the remarks..............

The President:—"The Hon'ble Member has been speaking already five minutes over the allotted time, and I think that he ought to observe the rules."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"May I have a few minutes more?"

The President:—"I gave the Hon'ble Member five minutes, and those five minutes are already up."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Would your Lordship kindly allow me a few minutes more."

The President:—" How many minutes more ? "

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" Five, if you please, my Lord."

The President:—" I will give you five minutes."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya.—" Thank you, my Lord. I just want to advert to a few other remarks which have fallen from some Hon'ble Members in the course of the debate. I will first refer to what Sir Umar Hayat Khan said. He expressed almost a resentment that some of us from outside the Punjab should have gone to that province. I think he will not find anybody in the Punjab to support that view. If he went there, my Lord, I think, he would find that the work of the Seva Samiti, and the work of Pandit Moti Lal Nehru and myself has met with the hearty appreciation of a vast body of our fellowmen; he would find that three hundred and odd families of those who had either been killed or had otherwise suffered; or been deprived of liberty were being relieved by the agency of the Seva Samiti, of which I have the honour to be the President and Pandit Moti Lal Nehru, the Vice-President. He would also find that we have helped many persons to have their appeals filed before the Privy Council. I should not have referred to these matters were it not for the fact that, while he himself was not able to render any assistance to the people of the Punjab in their distress, he should yet make it a grievance that some people from outside the province went there to render such assistance. We do not regard ourselves as outsiders. We consider every countryman of ours, wherever he may be, as a countryman.

" Then, my Lord, with regard to the remarks of the Hon'ble Mr. Crum, I would say this that we have absolutely no racial feeling in this matter. I desire and expect that Anglo-Indians and Indians should co-operate in this matter to find out the truth, and I support the suggestion he made that it should be an instruction to the Committee that they should recommend what reparation should be made to those or their relations who suffered during these tragic disturbances. As regards his suggestion that there should be an Anglo-Indian member added to the Committee, I have not the least objection to it either. But, my Lord, I do take exception to what he said regarding an assurance being given to the scattered European community that it shall be safeguarded in future. My Lord, the community as a whole, Indian and European, has to be safeguarded in future. The reason why these five Europeans met with their untimely end, will probably be known when the Committee of Inquiry will report. It will probably be found that the Indians were not to blame, but that provocation had been given to them which led to the unfortunate, deplorable, detestable crimes which some of them committed. Before these crimes were committed, some Indian lives had been destroyed by the firing that took place at the railway bridge at Amritsar. The Deputy Commissioner of Amritsar deposed in one of the cases which was tried by one of the Martial Law Commissions, that he had found no evidence to show that any excesses had been committed by the mob before the firing took place.

" Lastly, my Lord, I wish to say a few words about some of the remarks of His Honour Sir Edward Maclagan. I need hardly again protest my deep respect for His Honour. But, while I feel grateful that he has shown consideration in many respects to those who are at present locked up in His Majesty's jails, I regret to think that he fails to realise that no reduction of sentences, that no such amelioration of the hard conditions of jail life as he has been good enough to bring about, can relieve those who are unjustly suffering imprisonment of the poignant grief which they feel every moment of their existence in the jail.

I would ask His Honour seriously to think whether any mitigation of sentence or relief given in the manner indicated above, can obliterate the sorrow, the indescribable grief of those who are at present unjustly locked up and are undergoing imprisonment in the jails of the Punjab. My Lord, I think His Honour said that he would not disturb the findings of the Commissions. Probably he felt that he could not. But, my Lord, most of the 1,500 men who are locked up in the jails ought to be as free as we sitting here to-day are. I request, therefore, that whether the Committee of Inquiry comes four weeks hence or earlier, your Excellency's Government and His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab should seriously consider whether, on such security or securities, personal or pecuniary or both as may seem to him adequate, those men who have not been concerned in arson, or murder or pillage should not be released, both in order that pending the result of the inquiry, they may not suffer further unnecessary imprisonment, and in order that they should be able to give evidence before the Committee and have their case properly put before it, I earnestly hope the Government will be pleased to consider this suggestion."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, the Hon'ble Mover has complained that by reason of his solitude in Simla and of his inability to consult his colleagues he was not able to modify his Resolution earlier. If that is so, my Lord, the Hon'ble Member has been much maligned. The general impression is that he has been having daily consultation with non-official Members, that he has interviewed them one after another. Hon'ble Members will know if this is correct or not, and also whether he has not taken every opportunity of ascertaining what their views are. I have been told in fact that there is no legitimate measure for winning support for his Resolution which he has not taken and his complaint that the Resolution was not amended because of his being unable to consult his colleagues is not one therefore......... 12 52 P.M.

The President:—"Order, order, the Hon'ble Member has already taken up the time of the Council."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"I only want to correct a statement of fact. I did consult some Members and it was only after consulting them that I sent in notice of the amendment."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I find it a little difficult to proceed if I am subjected to these constant interruptions. I have allowed a great many statements of the Hon'ble Member, even some which I considered to be misstatements, to go unchallenged, and I ask for some consideration from the Hon'ble Member.

"There is another point in the Hon'ble Mover's reply to which I wish to draw attention, and that is, the question of minimizing the character of the disorders and outrage. I again ask the Hon'ble Member how the attacks on these unfortunate non-officials can possibly be justified. There may be questions as to the propriety of the action taken by the troops and police on particular occasions, but I have never yet heard any suggestion that these attacks on these private individuals were not absolutely unprovoked attacks on perfectly harmless people not connected with the Government at all; attacks on the conduct of officials are another matter, but these bank managers who were murdered were not officials of any kind, and I think that it is unfair even to insinuate in this Council that there was any justification for the murders of these unfortunate men—murders which the Hon'ble Member regrets so greatly and at the same time attempts in a manner to justify—perhaps 'justify' is too hard a word, I ought not to use it, but murders at any rate in regard to which he pleads extenuating circumstances when he says that after the inquiry is made it will be found that the victims were also a good deal in fault. I suggest that this is prejudicing the inquiry in an eminently unfair manner.

"Similarly, I refer to his observations about the Jallianwala Bagh. That is a matter which will come up before the Committee. If it is found that there was no justification for the firing, then will be the time to decide what action should be taken; but I ask this Council now not to prejudge any individual or any officer of Government in this matter. The Hon'ble Mr. Chanda, if I may say so, took up very nearly the same line as the Hon'ble Mover, and in my humble judgment, there were other Members of this Council including Mr. Ayyangar who spoke, not as if they wanted an inquiry, but as if they really wanted this Council to prejudge the case to create an atmosphere against the Government, to induce a feeling of prejudice and bias in the minds of Hon'ble Members, and in fact to condemn in advance those into whose conduct they were professing to ask for an inquiry. That is an attitude which, I think, is unfair to those whose conduct is impugned.

"There is only one other remark that I have to make. It was said that there were great protests at the time against the imposition of martial law. My Lord, the position is really this: there is now a tendency to minimise the disturbances, to make out that they were much less serious than they actually were. The gravity of the situation in April last is now forgotten. At this time there was a general feeling of great apprehension throughout the whole of India; there was no word of protest at all; it was some time afterwards that we first heard of these protests. When the disorder was at its height we were asked to suppress it firmly. When this was done, men, in some case those very men who asked us to deal with it at the time, turned round on the authorities. A few years ago when there were disturbances in Bihar and the Government failed to take sufficiently drastic action to meet with the approval of certain papers, and they were blamed for not doing more, for not having taken sufficiently severe measures. In the present case there was a crisis of the first magnitude, our officers were called upon to arrive at important decisions at a moment's notice, very momentous decisions on which the peace of the country depended; at the time they were acclaimed and applauded by many for having saved the country. Now, my Lord, that the danger is past, there is an attempt to turn on them and to protest that their conduct was cruel and unreasonably severe.

"My Lord, there is only one final point that I wish to mention with regard to a remark of the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha. He said that the Hon'ble the Home Member had maintained a non-possumus attitude, I think that this was the expression that was used, in regard to certain modifications which have been proposed. My Lord, if that was the impression which I created, I can only regret it. What I wished to convey was that a number of new suggestions had been pressed on Government, in regard to which it was impossible for any individual member of this Government to express an opinion, and that therefore I could make no statement on these suggestions. If that, my Lord, is taking up a non-possumus attitude, then I must plead guilty. But I think a fairer and broader interpretation might well be placed upon my words."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha:—"May I make a suggestion, my Lord, that the Resolution be divided into two and put separately?"

The President:—"I think we have discussed the Resolution as a whole, and I shall put it as a whole."

The Resolution was put and negatived.

[12TH SEPTEMBER, 1919.] [Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda.]

RESOLUTION re APPOINTMENT OF MIXED COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE CAUSES OF RECENT DISORDERS IN DELHI.

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—" My Lord, the Resolution which stands in my name, runs as follows :—

> 'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council the appointment of a mixed committee of officials and non-officials to investigate the causes and nature of the recent outbreaks of disorder in Delhi and the circumstances of the firing upon the crowds there.'

" My Lord, the matter which I am asking leave of the Council to place before it now is a small matter compared with the discussion we have just been listening to. It will not be anything as exciting, compared with the tragic events in the Punjab it almost dwindles into insignificance, but, my Lord, as it relates to the killing of a number of His Majesty's subjects the matter requires some consideration. My Lord, I must ask the indulgence of the Council not to judge me as one who makes reckless assertions in using the term 'killing' of people. I shall show that to the Council by quoting the evidence of the Police Officers concerned. I shall place the matter very briefly before the Council and read out the very statements of the officials concerned. My Lord, the Rowlatt Act was passed on the 18th March in the teeth of the unanimous protest of the whole body of Indian Members in this Council and backed practically by the whole country. As a result Mr. Gandhi proclaimed Satyagraha or passive resistance. I do not propose to go into the ethics of that question ; it is well known that even among many Indian public men opinion is divided as to the wisdom of that measure. A number of Members of this Council simultaneously with the announcement by Mr. Gandhi published a joint condemnation of it. If it is relevant—if there is no impropriety or presumption—in mentioning it, I would tell the Council that I did not take the vow and as the Delhi correspondent of the 'Bengalee', who is no other than the editor, wired to the paper I was opposed to Satyagraha. However to proceed, the 30th March was appointed for observing Satyagraha at Delhi, as a day of humiliation and prayer and to do no business. I now place before the Council the statement of Mr. Marshall, the Senior Superintendent of Police, who was the chief actor, if I may say so without disrespect to him. This is what he says in his report, dated the 31st March:—'We received authentic information that Sunday, March 30th, would be observed as a day of mourning in the city and that all shops would be shut.' Further, my Lord, in his statement he makes this significant assertion :—' The passing of what are known as the Rowlatt Bills in the middle of March had resulted in agitation of a particularly violent nature in the local press of Delhi. I was so impressed by it that I informed my superior officers that I could not conceive that it could result in anything but trouble and assaults on Europeans and officials.' I find in the marginal note of my copy that Col. Beadon says that that was not quite correct, but it shows the feeling with which he was obsessed. We have a telegram from the Associated Press dated the 31st March which gave an account of the occurrences at Delhi. It says: 'At about midday some strikers made their way to the railway station and insisted on the vendors in the 3rd class waiting hall closing their shops. The latter objected as they were under a contract with the railway authorities. An altercation ensued and the railway police interfered. The strikers attempted to force their way to the station-platform, and it is reported that they tried to force open the iron gates. At this two strikers were arrested. This gave the signal for a general outburst. Excitement ran high and a crowd about 5,000 collected and demanded the release of the two men, brick-bats being thrown in all directions. The military with a machine gun arrived on the scene, as also Mr. Currie, the District Magistrate. The 1 P.M.

police, it is said, assured the mob that the arrested men had been released, but the former demanded their presence. They were told that the men could not be produced as they had already been released and had got mixed up with the crowd. Nothing however seemed to satisfy the mob, which grew dangerous. The Magistrate ordered them to disperse but they showed no signs of obeying, thereon the military were ordered to fire. After a few volleys of buckshot in which some of the rioters were killed the crowd dispersed into the Queen's Gardens and the adjacent streets, after that to the Clock Tower and made a rush, towards the Town Hall which was defended by the military. A volley was again fired and the rioters dispersed. They then assembled at the People's Park and held a meeting condemning the Rowlatt Bill.' Portions of this account were at once contradicted by the Satyagrahis whose President Swami Sradhananda sent a message to the Secretary of State and other portions are at variance with the official account. The outstanding fact is that about which all accounts are at one that some six men were shot dead and a much larger number seriously wounded some of whom died later. Well, what is the origin of these occurrences? There is a conflicting version, the official account says that the sweetmeat seller was forced to close his stall. Assuming that the account of the authorities was correct, let us see what followed. The official account is that the mob was told that the men had been let off, the people wanted them produced. Mr. Marshall says in his statement . . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"Perhaps it would save the time of the Council if I explained that there will be an inquiry by the Committee into these disorders."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda:—"Of course if there is to be an inquiry I do not think I am justified in taking up the time of the Council."

The President:—"The Committee which I announced is going to inquire into the occurrences at Delhi. That is quite clear. I think it is hardly worthwhile for the Hon'ble Member to take up the time of the Council."

1-10 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda:—"I beg to withdraw the Resolution."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"The Hon'ble Member first makes his speech and then withdraws his Resolution. He has thus deprived me of any opportunity of answering various points he has raised."

The Resolution was, by leave of the Council, withdrawn.

RESOLUTION re APPOINTMENT OF MIXED COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE CIRCUMSTANCES OF FIRING UPON CROWDS IN CALCUTTA.

1-11 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda:—"My Lord, I beg to move the following Resolution:—

> 'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council the appointment of a mixed committee of officials and non-officials to investigate the circumstances of the firing upon the crowds in Calcutta in April last.'

"My Lord, the Council will have seen that the point I raise in this Resolution is a short one and I will not detain the Council by a long speech. It is a question of shooting, and I shall deal with the matter in a very few words. We know Mr. Gandhi proclaimed Satyagraha as a protest against the passing of the Rowlatt Act, and the 6th of April was appointed as the Satyagraha day throughout the country when the people were to fast and pray and suspend all business. Calcutta also observed a Satyagraha demonstration on that day when the Indian portion of the town was practically on strike, all business being stopped. In the evening a huge gathering met on the maidan which on all accounts was the biggest meeting ever held in Calcutta, when over a lakh of people are believed to have attended that afternoon. I shall place before the Council the testimony of an Anglo-Indian paper, the Capital of Calcutta, which wrote as follows :—

> 'Quite the most creditable work of Lord Ronaldshay in the season now over illumined the fag end. He refused to interfere with the public demonstration on the Maidan on Sunday last in protest against the passing of the Rowlatt Bill. He was supremely justified of his confidence in the people. The meeting round the Ochterlony Monument was the greatest I have seen in Calcutta, and there was less disorder than at an ordinary foot-ball match. It seemed to be a point of honour with every one in that vast crowd to refrain from extravagance that would discredit the solemnity of the ceremony.'

This was on the 6th. On the 10th of April by an 'act of blazing indiscretion' to quote from the charge on which Mr. Kali Nath Roy was convicted, Sir Michael O'Dwyer prohibited the entry into the Punjab of Mr. Gandhi who was then on his way to Delhi on a peaceful mission. The result was that Mr. Gandhi was obstructed at a small station on the night of the 10th by the police and escorted by them back to Bombay. This was telegraphed throughout the country as the arrest of Mr. Gandhi. In Calcutta this news was received on the 11th, and as elsewhere it created the most profound sensation, and the Indian portion of the city immediately went on spontaneous strike, all business being brought to a standstill. All vehicular traffic was stopped and all shops closed. There were big demonstrations in several parts of the town, but it is not alleged that anywhere were there any disturbances. On the following morning the strike continued and no carriages or tramcars could ply. It is stated that here and there street mobs went out of hand and used force where people did not agree to come down from any tramcar or carriage they may have been using. There is no doubt that there was some interference with street traffic much to the annoyance of the public. It is idle to deny that people were forced here and there to walk in the summer heat. Nobody can complain that the authorities felt called upon to put a stop to this state of things. Nobody can complain that European sergeants and Indian policemen patrolled the streets dispersing the crowds who were stopping the tramcars. Nobody complains that a few young urchins who obstructed traffic were arrested and brought before the Presidency Magistrate for doing so, who however discharged them with a warning that they should be careful in future, observing at the same time that boys will always be boys. Nobody would object to more police prosecutions for interference with street traffic. There is no discrepancy between the official accounts and the accounts given by the public up to this point, that is up to the noon. In the afternoon machine guns were used, and a number of persons were shot down. It is then the discrepancy creeps in. What happened then ; how did the shooting take place ; who gave the order to fire, and what directions were given? Now about these matters there are two versions. I will first give the Council an account that was published over the signature of Mr. Chakravarti, a leading Calcutta Barrister and a well-known public man in Bengal, and also an account of another Barrister, Mr. S. P. Roy, and then supplement these with the account that is published in the papers. The following is the account of Mr. Chakravarti :—

'Saturday, the 12th April. In the morning and up to about 11 A.M. I had several reports to say that everything was going on well. Then about 11 A.M. a gentleman called on me with a letter from Mr. Clarke, the Commissioner of Police, in which I was requested to see His Excellency the Governor at Government House. As I was getting ready to start for the Government House, I received two telephonic communications from the northern part of the town informing me that European Sergeants armed with fire arms with posse of constables had arrived in several parts of Harrison Road, and friction between the police and the people was very likely. I at once 'phoned to some friends in the northern part of the town to be on the spot immediately and do everything in their power to prevent any collision. I also 'phoned to my friend Mr. H. D. Bose at the Bar Library to the same effect, and he with one or two friends arrived at Harrison Road as he informed me by 1 o'clock. Mr. S. N. Haldar and Mr. B. K. Lahiri accompanied me to Harrison Road in my motor car and we arrived there shortly after 1 P.M. At the junction of Chitpore and Harrison Road I saw one or two Europeans armed with revolvers in the middle of the crossing and a number of policemen in khaki bearing rifles. We got down from the car near the crossing and we met our friends who had already arrived there as also Mr. J. C. Galstaun. I addressed the people to be orderly and peaceful. They complained of the treatment received by them since the arrival of the armed police, and they stated that a crowd was fired upon at the junction of the Strand and Harrison Roads and that one constable had been seriously wounded by a shot from a Sergeant. They also complained that several people had been arrested by the police and taken away for no fault of their own. Then we walked up to the junction of Strand Road and Harrison Road when we saw the wounded constable mentioned above being carried to the hospital by the Marwari volunteers. We noticed the crowd was somewhat excited there on account of the injury caused to the constable. It was stated that the constable was shot by one of the sergeants, thereupon the crowd got excited and beyond control for the time being, attacked one of the sergeants and set fire to one of the taxi-cabs.'

"I may be somewhat long, but I would like to place the whole story before the Council :—

'Throughout our walk on Harrison Road from Chitpore Road corner to Strand Road corner we never saw any pelting or showering of missiles. It is not a fact that bricks, stones or bottles were being showered from any house at the corner of Strand Road and Harrison Road so long as we were there. Then we turned back and motored again to Chitpore corner asking the crowd to restrain itself and get away from the neighbourhood of the disturbance.

'I then motored to the Government House and interviewed His Excellency about 2 P.M. His Excellency told me that he had kept back the police, but on the complaints made by some Indian gentlemen about the inconvenience caused to the members of the public travelling in tramcars and gharries, His Excellency was obliged to resort to force.'

'His Excellency also informed me that two policemen had been injured earlier in the day and consequently His Excellency had directed that measures should be taken and force used where necessary. Thereupon I narrated to His Excellency my experience of that day and the day previous. I pointed out the peaceful celebration on the previous Sunday and the absence of all friction the day before and drew His Excellency's attention to the fact that the satisfactory result was principally due to the policy of police non-interference directed by His Excellency. I further submitted that if the European armed police were removed, the maintenance of order would not be difficult especially when the 'Hartal' was being brought to an end at a meeting to be held that afternoon in Beadon Square consequent upon the release of Mr. Gandhi. I offered to undertake the maintenance of order if the European armed police were either withdrawn or kept at a place not within the view of the public but available at a moment's notice. His Excellency thereupon pointed out the humours of the crowd and did not see his way to accede to my request. I further begged His Excellency either to accompany me or to go by himself in order to get a correct appreciation of the situation ; but His Excellency did not approve of it. The interview ended with a request from His Excellency that I should do the best I could to keep peace and order and I promised I would do so.

'In the meantime as I learnt later the military had been called out and the crowd had been fired upon resulting in several regrettable casualties. I received intimation of this shortly after 4 P.M. and at once started for Harrison Road with a view to prevent further bloodshed and loss of life, if possible. I was accompanied by Messrs. H. D. Bose, Hirendra Nath Datta, S. P. Rai, S. M. Haldar, B. K. Lahiri, Nalini Nath Sett. After we had proceeded for some distance along Chitpore Road, we found that the road was lined across by a number of English soldiers rifle in hand so as to prevent through passage and a number of other soldiers were standing in groups near the line all rifle in hand. The car had to be stopped and it was immediately surrounded by a group of people—some of whom were rather in an excited mood—and they pointed to the dead body of a Bengalee lying on the east footpath and shot through. Some one in the crowd handed up to Mr. B. K. Lahiri, who was in the car, a letter which was found in the pocket of the particular gentleman showing that the gentleman shot down was a mere passer-by. While this was going on, some people brought up on a bamboo stretcher improvised for the occasion the body of a Marwari gentleman with his head hanging down and the body besmeared with blood. The man appeared to have received several wounds and was on the point of death. He was being carried to the hospital. Some of the people who had assembled round us complained to me that although no provocation had been given by the crowd, yet about eight people had been shot down and the military, instead of shooting them in the leg, had lodged their bullets on the upper part of the body : they also complained that whereas most of themselves did not carry even walking sticks, the soldiers fully armed should have shot them down.'

The President :—" Order, order. If it is worth the Hon'ble Member's while to read this, it is worth his while to make Members hear. I cannot hear a word the Hon'ble Member says and I do not think any other Member can."

The Honb'le Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—" I beg your pardon ; there is a little more.

' We then got down from the car and approached the cordon of soldiers. We found that about 200 yards in front of that cordon a crowd had assembled consisting of about 2,000 people who were not in any way disorderly but they were shouting out from time to time ' Mahatama Gandhi ki jai,' ' Hindu Musalman ki jai'. I and my friends then approached the officer-in-charge of the soldiers who told me that we should not attempt to go through the crowd as we might be assaulted. I said that the crowd consisted of my own countrymen and it was not likely that they would misbehave and that in any event we would take the risk. Being asked why the soldiers had fired, the reply was that some brickbats had been thrown at the soldiers by the crowd and thereupon they had fired. I said that no one among the soldiers appeared to have been hurt in any way and there seemed to have been no justification for firing. We then went ahead through the cordon. While we had advanced about 30 yards we were told to get back or be shot as there would be firing in two minutes or so. We protested against this and pointed out that the crowd was well behaved and we should be able to take them with us to the Beadon Square if we were given the opportunity to explain the position to the crowd which the soldiers were not able to do on account of their ignorance of the vernacular and their inability to make themselves understood by the people. We were thereupon allowed by the officer-in-charge to approach the people in front of them. The crowd was not at all troublesome and not even in an angry mood. They only said that if soldiers were to fire at them what was their remedy.'

This was the account published over the signature of Mr. B. Chakravarti. What was the Government account ? The Government published a Communiqué regarding this likewise. It was as follows :—

' With reference to the rumours regarding the shooting of a constable by a sergeant during the disturbances on Saturday, it has been ascertained on medical examination that the constable was stabbed and not shot. The man is still in hospital and as soon as he recovers an inquiry will be held into the matter.'

Not only this, my Lord, but an Hon'ble Member of the Bengal Council, Babu Akhil Chandra Datta, put a question about this matter on the 3rd of July, and he asked whether any inquiry was initiated by the Government to ascertain that the military transgressed the law and exceeded the limits of their power during the recent disturbances in Calcutta. The answer was :—

' Government have received full reports on the disturbances and are satisfied that the police and the troops behaved with forbearance, and that there is no ground for the suggestion that they used greater force than was warranted by the situation or by the law. Government do not propose to lay any papers on the table or to institute further inquiries.'

That was the position. The crowd was fired upon by machine guns and a number of casualties caused, 6 persons killed and 30 wounded. Under what circumstances was this order to fire given? We do not know; no inquiry was held by the Government. The public version is the statement of Mr. Chakravarti that the firing was absolutely without any justification. The account that was published in the papers was that in the evening there was a big crowd going towards the meeting. Of course they were shouting out 'Mahatma Gandhi ki jai', 'Hindu Musalman ki jai,' and the soldiers there posted, without being able to understand what that implied, took it to be a war cry and fired. That is what happened, and, my Lord, the firing that took place was in the vital parts of the body and the people were wounded in their heads and chests, and a number of persons were killed, among them undoubtedly persons who were innocent. This also appears in the account of the Associated Press telegram that was sent to the papers, that persons absolutely unconnected with the disturbance who were going legitimately on business in that direction were shot by the soldiers. The question arises whether, whenever there is a riot, whenever there is a big assembly, assuming even that brickbats are thrown, the authorities are justified in giving the order to fire upon the mob, and then if they are to fire, my Lord, at what part of the body they are to fire. I did not proceed with my Resolution on the Delhi disturbances, but there the Superintendent of Police, Mr. Jeffries, stated that the rules required them to kill if they were to fire. 'You must fire to kill if you are to fire.' If that is so, my Lord, it is a very serious matter. We have seen at Delhi, Calcutta and other places that whenever there was a riot the military were called in and apparently without any order being given by a Magistrate, firing was ordered and a number of people were killed on the spot. In this case, my Lord, of Calcutta, it cannot be contended that there was no Magistrate near at hand. Why was not an attempt made to have a Magistrate on the spot to give directions when this order to fire would be necessary? The law requires, my Lord, in the first place, that you are to use civil force; the Criminal Procedure Code requires that. Why in this case did the policemen not use their batons, or their bayonets, if necessary, before the firing was done? That is a point I submit to this Council. Assuming the assembly was riotous, assuming it did intend to provoke the police or the soldiers, why should not civil force have been resorted to in the first instance? Why should not the police have used their batons as was done in Bombay and other places? Of course, if it was attempted and the attempt failed, then it might be necessary to fire, and even then, my Lord, why should they fire in the vital parts of the body, why not fire at the lower limbs as is done in other places? Here we find persons who were killed had bullets in their chests and heads. This is a serious question, my Lord. I submit there ought to be an inquiry into this and of course if the firing was justified by the circumstances, still the question would be why did they fire at vital parts?

"With these words I submit this Resolution to the Council."

1-30 P.M. The Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan :—" My Lord, up to a certain extent I will support the Hon'ble gentleman on my left and the case is this. I think, wherever these disturbances took place, whether in Calcutta, in Delhi or in the Punjab, the origin of all of them was the same, and if the same Committee were to make inquiries they would find that all these disturbances were connected. This, I think, would help the inquiry to a very great extent, and if inquiries were made in Calcutta by the same Committee, it would be much better. I am very glad that the Hon'ble gentleman read through all those papers, by which I have been able to find out that exactly what was happening in Calcutta happened, I believe, in Delhi as well as in the Punjab. That also shows, that as the origin of these disturbances is one, the same Committee should investigate into them. There have been differences between what happened in the Punjab and in Calcutta and Delhi, but this is due to the fact that there are certain peculiarities in the Punjab. It is the home of soldiers, it is the home of brave men, and when they are excited naturally they do certain things which other people do not, and if there were any difference between the happenings in the Punjab and elsewhere, it is due to this fact. Then many other things have been said by my Hon'ble friend such as the words used, namely, 'Gandhi ji ki jai'. Well, the same words were used everywhere which again shows that the origin was one and the same. As he said, the boys were taught first to begin because it was considered that nobody would fire on them. That was the kind of thing which was done everywhere, so that it looks as if the people who started this were at one place and they planned these things and then sent out orders all round, so as to be obeyed. In the same way the time which was chosen synchronised. It was a very bad time and it was chosen when big fairs were being held not only in one part of the country but all over the country, where not only people from the cities but people from outside attended. It was considered that if such a propaganda was started in the cities, these men would go into the country and induce the country people to join. It would have been a very serious thing for the Punjab if this had happened, because the country is the place from where the soldiers are recruited. It was thought that the soldiers would join, but these men had been in France and elsewhere and they knew what our Government was and how strong it was. That was why they did not join. But if this plot had been properly planned out and the soldiers had been fools enough to join in it, there would have been very great difficulty, because, being the hot weather, the only troops available would have been the English and the Gurkhas, who cannot fight so well at that time of the year. Again, it is known that Kabul only joined because men were sent there. If anything had happened to the soldiers and, if the enemy from outside had come into India, I do not know how difficult would have been the situation thus created; nothing could have been worse . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"May I rise to a point of order? Is my friend the Hon'ble Member in order in talking of these things on this Resolution?"

The President:—"I presume he is leading up to some point."

The Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan:—"I am referring to these things simply to show that there were differences in the Punjab. The differences were due to the peculiar circumstances of the Punjab. I want to show that the origin of the disturbances in Calcutta, Delhi, Hyderabad and all these places was the same; there were these differences in the Punjab, while in other places, the people being more learned adopted a different course. I only want to show that, as the circumstances were one, the same Committee ought to be asked to investigate into the happenings in Calcutta.

"Then again, it is said that the people were not shot in the legs but in their chests, etc. Well, I do not think that the bullets are so tame or that the people who fire are so accurate that they can hit in exactly the place they desire to hit. If one tried to hit them in the legs and they sat down they would be hit in the chest . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"Am I to take it that this is relevant to the Resolution ?"

The President :—" This matter was brought up by the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda who pointed out that in Calcutta the troops or police should not have fired at the vital parts but should have fired low. The Hon'ble Sir Umar Hayat Khan, as a soldier, is trying to explain in what circumstances these bullets may have struck persons in vital parts, and I think it is quite relevant."

The Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan :—" That is so, my Lord, and it is because I know something how bullets are fired and their effect that I thought it would be better to put that forward also.

" With these few remarks, my Lord, though I do not support the Resolution, yet I think the same Committee should be asked to investigate into these disturbances wherever these have taken place in the country, and they will find that the origin was one, that all had been planned beforehand very minutely, and that it was only through God's goodness that the whole thing was averted by Sir Michael O'Dwyer coming in at the right time and stopping it. If the thing had not been stopped, in about two or three days the whole countryside would have been up, perhaps the other provinces would have joined, and I do not know what would have happened."

1-38 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Abdur Raheem :—" My Lord, this is a matter which concerns the province which I have the honour to represent, and I think I should not give a silent vote. My Lord, I do not see my way to support the Resolution moved by my Hon'ble friend, and the reason for my opposing this Resolution is that the disturbance in Calcutta in April last was not of such a nature as to need an inquiry by such a Committee as is suggested by my Hon'ble friend. On the other hand, the way in which the matter was managed by the Bengal Government was very wise indeed, resulting in things being brought to an end without taking a more serious turn, and the Calcutta Police, in my opinion, really deserve credit for the excellent way they handled the situation. I hope my information is correct that the police had very strict orders not to fire at the mob and that they did not really fire till they felt a real necessity to defend themselves after they had received serious injuries from the stones thrown at them.

" Besides this, my Lord, it is a matter which concerns Bengal. If it is to be taken up at all, I think this matter should be taken up by the Bengal Council. I, as a representative of the province of Bengal, do not see any necessity for the appointment of such a Committee, and I hope that other representatives from Bengal will agree with me."

1-40 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, I support the Resolution to this extent that what happened in Calcutta should also be brought within the scope of the Committee or Commission which is to inquire into the events in the Punjab, Delhi and Bombay, and for this reason, my Lord, that whether anybody was to blame or not, I hope, after the Committee has reported, the Government will take some steps, it may even undertake legislation, in order to ensure that in dealing with mobs in future more discretion and more restraint shall be exercised than has been exercised on some occasions in the past, and to lay down definite rules which will be a guide to all concerned.

" For instance, my Lord, the Government may be advised to enact the provisions of the Riot Act of 1714, by which a certain amount of time—I think one hour—was allowed to the mob to disperse before they were to be fired upon and similar other provisions which exist in certain other enactments, so that the police, those who are the custodians of law and order, should proceed on occasions of trouble on certain definite and well-understood lines. For this reason I support the substance of the Resolution which has been put forward by my friend, not that a new Committee should be appointed, but that what happened in Calcutta should be included within the scope of the inquiry which has been ordered in the case of the Punjab, Delhi and Bombay. My friend, Mr. Chanda, might very well content himself with that. As regards the opinion expressed by the Hon'ble Member who spoke last, that this was a matter which should be taken up in the Bengal Council, I do not agree with him. Certain lives were lost in Calcutta. Whether the police were right or not in firing when they did fire, it is not for us to say ; that is a matter which ought to be left to the Committee of Inquiry, and I suggest, my Lord, that as the events which took place in four places had some aspects in common, and as the Government have considered it advisable to appoint a Committee which shall inquire into what happened in three places, into somewhat more or less connected events, the Government ought to accept the substance of the Resolution and promise the inclusion of the unfortunate events in Calcutta within the scope of the inquiry which has been ordered."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—" My Lord, I beg to oppose this Resolution, and I would like to say that I entirely agree with the remarks which fell from Mr. Abdur Raheem. I do not think that any Members from Bengal present to-day want an inquiry into the circumstances of firing in Calcutta, and such being the case I hope the Council will vote unanimously against it." 1-41 P.M.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" My Lord, I think it is a little significant and I hope Hon'ble Members of this Council will bear it in mind that not one single Member from the province in which these disturbances occurred has supported this Resolution in any way. In fact we have been led to believe from what the Hon'ble Mr. Crum said that they are unanimously opposed to the inquiry which has been suggested by the Hon'ble Member. It has apparently therefore been left to a Member coming from another province to force on the province of Bengal an inquiry which no one from there wants. I may also mention, my Lord, that since these riots occurred, there have been meetings of the Bengal Provincial Council, or at least one meeting. So far as I am aware no demand for any inquiry of this character was made in that Council. That is another fact which, I think, Hon'ble Members of this Council would do well to note. 1-42 P.M.

" Turning to the merits of the Resolution the character of the disturbances in Calcutta was, if I may say so, differing from one or two Hon'ble Members who have spoken, entirely different from that of the disturbances which took place in the Punjab and in Bombay. There were no outrages of the same character in Calcutta, the disorder lasted only a few hours, there was no necessity for the introduction of martial law, there were no summary trials, and with the exception, I think, of this letter from Mr. Chakravarti, no allegations have been made against the conduct of the police or the military. We have consulted the Bengal Government as to their views in regard to this inquiry, and they say that it is in every way inadvisable. They give various reasons for this view, among which one is that normal conditions have happily been restored in Calcutta, and to start an inquiry of this kind would be to revive racial feeling and unrest. I cannot help thinking that that may have influenced Hon'ble Members representing Bengal in this Council in their attitude towards this proposal. It is as a matter of fact well known that the Satyagraha movement made little headway in Bengal at all. There is further no reason whatever, I submit, to suspect or think that either the police or the military used unnecessary force or were guilty of unreasonable violence in suppressing the disturbances in Calcutta. If that is so, is it fair to our officers to place them on, as it were, their defence for doing their duty? Does this Council really think that military officers, police officers, or officers of Government generally, will do their duty fearlessly and properly if on every occasion on which they are driven to perform a very unpleasant task they are liable to have their conduct inquired into without any substantial or definite allegations being made against them? I have a report of these disturbances from the Commissioner of Police in Calcutta, which I am quite prepared to lay on the table here. I do not propose to read it; in fact we have had rather an unpleasant example of such a practice to-day; it would be a great unkindness to Council to inflict another long quotation on them; many Members were fortunate in that they could go out when the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda read out nearly the whole of a newspaper article to Council, but I unfortunately had to sit here and listen to one of the longest and most wearisome citations I have heard for some time. My Lord, I will be more considerate and place the report on the table if any one wishes to see it, and I believe that a perusal of the report will itself satisfy any Member of this Council that there is no cause for any further inquiry. The facts are briefly these: On the 6th April there was a slight disorder in Calcutta, but nothing serious, though passengers in tram-cars were interfered with, and there was a little fracas outside the Bristol Hotel; but there was no serious incident. On the 10th crowds collected again, and there was again a little disorder but nothing of a grave character. On the 11th, the tramway services were interrupted; Europeans who were about were abused and hooted; some passengers were dragged out of tram-cars and there was minor rowdyism in some parts of the city if I may so call it. College Street and Bow Baar Street were cleared of disorderly crowds by the police, and that was all on that day. On the 12th, matters got more serious; the police were repeatedly pelted with bricks and loose metal; the Deputy Commissioner of Police remonstrated with the crowd on at least one occasion without any effect; two Assistant Commissioners were, I believe, wounded by the mob and armed police pickets were posted at various points. The police picket on the Howrah Bridge was attacked, and it was there, I believe, that this incident to which the Hon'ble Member referred that of constable Shewpujan Singh happened. This constable was as a matter of fact wounded by one of the rioters, but subsequently being instigated by persons hostile to the Local Government and to the local authorities, put up a false complaint that he had been shot with a revolver by a sergeant of the Calcutta Police. That complaint was taken up, I am sorry to say, by a certain number of legal practitioners in Calcutta. There was a full inquiry made into the incident by a Presidency Magistrate and it was proved—I am prepared to lay the report on the table now—that the whole charge was one tissue of falsehoods. The constable might indeed have been prosecuted for a false charge; I do not know why that action was not taken unless it was thought, as was probably the case, that he was only a dupe in the hands of unscrupulous men. My Lord, in the course of this day, the 12th, the same day on which the constable was wounded, a motor car belonging to the Deputy Commissioner was upset and fired; a fire engine which was not on duty was attacked. Three European and three Indian firemen were injured. A second fire engine proceeding to a fire was again attacked. There were also further attacks with stones on the Deputy Commissioner and the police, all these attacks being totally unprovoked. There was also a meeting at a mosque at which according to our information seditious speeches were made. At 4 P.M. a military picket in Harrison Road was attacked by a mob and five men were injured; the machine gun which was stationed there was actually hit with stones. It was then only after repeated provocation, after several men had been wounded, that the troops fired eight rounds from this machine gun at the mob, besides fourteen rifle shots at houses from which deliberate attacks were being made. If the police and troops are not to fire under circumstances of that character, then I do not know when it is justified. It is admitted and recognised by every one in Calcutta that the military and the police on this occasion behaved with the very greatest forbearance, and if the only reward which they have to receive is to have their conduct questioned in an inquiry of this kind then, as I said before, I believe it will be impossible to get them to do their duty in future. My Lord, the Council will remember what Mrs. Besant said on the recent disturbances in the Punjab :

> 'No one, I presume, will contend that the Government should look on while the mob murdered, wrecked banks, fired railway stations ; do they then think that it is more merciful to give a mob its head after its begins throwing brickbats until, say at Delhi, it had broken into the station, and struck down any resisting railway officials, than to stop it at the very outset of violence at the cost of less than a score of lives ? I say that when a small handful of soldiers and police is face to face with a mob of many thousands, and the mob begins to pelt them with brickbats, it is more merciful to order the soldiers to fire a few volleys of buck-shot than to allow the violence to gather strength until the town must be given up to the mob rule.'

" I will place on the table the reports to which I have referred, and I am sure the Council will agree that there is no real reason either for a separate inquiry or for extending the scope of the inquiry already proposed to the Calcutta disorders. It is obviously desirable to limit the scope of that inquiry, as much as possible, if the Committee is to finish its work within a reasonable time. There is no point whatever in the Resolution proposed by the Hon'ble Member, and I hope it will not receive any support in the Council."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha :—" My Lord my Hon'ble 1-52 P.M. friend Mr. Malaviya suggested that rules should be made for the mob . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" Not for the mob, but for the guidance of those who have to deal with crowds."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha :—" If the leaders of mobocracy were to prescribe the rules themselves for the guidance of the mob, these would be more effectual than Government rules. There will then be no need for the police and the military."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—" My Lord, this is 1-53 P.M. a matter that concerns Bengal particularly. There were two versions, placed before us at the time that the Calcutta occurrences took place, and there was a strong feeling over the matter in the country. There is some doubt as to which of these versions is the correct one. Inasmuch as a number of persons have been killed and wounded and a machine gun was used, one would ordinarily expect that a public inquiry would take place to ascertain the exact circumstances under which the firing took place. But inasmuch as there is no very great demand from Bengal—no member having spoken in its favour and no Resolution moved in the Bengal Council—and in view of the fact that we would desire to see as calm an atmosphere as possible and that an inquiry into the disturbances would provoke acrimonious controversy, I do not think that, on the facts, we would be justified in pressing the Government of India for an inquiry. It would be pertinent and right for the members of the Bengal Council to press the Government for an inquiry into the circumstances under which this firing took place. I do not think that some of the observations of my Hon'ble friend from the Punjab, which seemed to obtain approval in some quarters, are very happily chosen or can be allowed to go without challenge.

The Hon'ble Member seemed to think that the police and soldiers in Calcutta were confronted with a German army just as possibly he was confronted on the field of France, and he evidently forgets that the soldiers and police in Calcutta had to deal with an unarmed mob, possibly a violent mob, throwing brickbats but an unarmed mob which could not fire back and, secondly, that they were very near and differently placed from the soldiers who had to face a hot fire and could not discriminate and choose whether they would fire at the chest, the head or the lower limbs. If some discrimination is not to be made where lives are concerned, if humane considerations are not to be taken into consideration by those in charge of soldiers, if this spirit is to prevail, then Woe unto India! The Hon'ble Member who represents the Punjab, the brave soldiers of the Punjab, has temporarily forgotten the traditions of his race and of India in remarking that officers and soldiers cannot in the circumstances choose where and how they shoot. I think, my Lord, that the circumstances under which ordinarily an inquiry should take place as to whether a mob was facing the soldiers and ready to act violently and whether the force used was needed, exist here, but I think in view of what I have said it may not be in consonance with the public interests to press for an inquiry at the present stage. The position of Hon'ble non-official Members who find a very large majority ordinarily against them would be particularly distressing if in the discharge of their duties they are taunted that the speeches are wearisome. The Hon'ble the Home Member may legitimately take exception to wearisome speeches in ordinary circumstances, but the circumstances under which we sit now are so exceptional, that I should have expected a little more grace in dealing with Members who have to discharge their disagreeable and painful duties."

1-58 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda:—"My Lord, I desire to say a few words. In the first place, it is pointed out that no Hon'ble Member from Bengal has supported me. It is quite true that the Hon'ble Mr. Crum and the Hon'ble Mr. Abdur Rahim have spoken against my Resolution. But I do not know by what process of thought the Hon'ble the Home Member knew that the other Bengal members were opposed to it; they have not spoken it is true, but it does not follow that they are opposed to the Resolution. I was under the impression that I was going to be supported by some of the members from Bengal. It is next said that this is a matter that should have been brought up in the Bengal Council. I say that the matter was brought up before that Council, but they declined to interfere and so I thought I would bring the matter up here as this Council is the appellate authority over all the other Councils. Then, my Lord, my submission is that the speech of the Hon'ble the Home Member itself furnishes ground for an inquiry. I would draw attention to the statement of Mr. Chakravarti, that is not the statement of an anonymous or irresponsible scribe, it is not an unreliable statement. He took the responsibility for making that statement over his signature, I do not think a statement of that kind can be summarily put aside. I ask therefore that an inquiry be made. The Hon'ble the Home Member has made a number of statements which I venture to say are not substantiated. He says there was a meeting at the mosques where speeches were made. It is known that the meeting took place on the previous day while Mr. Chakravarti was on his way to Beadon Square. This riot took place on the following day.

"Then, my Lord, the Hon'ble the Home Member said that before the constable was stabbed the motor car was upset and set fire to. Well, my Lord, there has been an insistent demand in the press in Bengal that there should be an inquiry about this question of firing and why this firing took place. Well, the allegation was that the motor car was upset after the constable was shot at his back by a sergeant, and this statement has not only been made in the press but that is the account that was telegraphed on the very day by the Associated Press, that an Indian constable was shot and was in the hospital. There was an inquiry no doubt, as the Hon'ble the Home Member said, but, my Lord, if you refer to the proceedings you will find that witnesses were not allowed to be cross examined and the Council appearing to watch withdrew. On the other hand, there was a complaint filed in the Court of the Second Presidency Magistrate by the constable in question charging the sergeant, and the constable pointed out in the Court which sergeant had shot him at the back. These are materials I place before the Council on the statement of Mr. Chakravarti, and the Council would not be justified in accepting the statement of the Hon'ble the Home Member, without inquiry. These are matters for inquiry, and that is what I ask for. Let the matter be fully inquired into by any Committee. I do not mind which it is, but let the matter be inquired into and a decision come to. That is all, my Lord, I think I need say to the Council. There seems to be an opinion that in view of the fact that a strong opinion has not been expressed by the Bengal members I should not go on with this matter. I therefore beg leave to withdraw the Resolution."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, there are only one or two small points which I should like to mention in my reply. The Hon'ble Member asked me why I assumed, how it was that I was able to come to the conclusion that the Bengal Members were not in favour of this Resolution. The answer is pretty obvious to this Council. There is not one Member from Bengal who has spoken in support of it, and it is clear from the Hon'ble Mr. Crum's speech that what I stated is correct. The Hon'ble Member has said that there was a question asked in the Bengal Council about these disorders. That may be so, but the point is that, if there is any real feeling on a matter of public interest, the way in which it is brought before the Council is by a Resolution and not by a question, and if I am correct, no Resolution was brought in the local Council about this matter. 2-2 P.M.

"The only other point of importance is the question of the constable having been shot. The Hon'ble Member may make wild statements in Simla about this incident, but it is well known to every one in Bengal, it is well known throughout Calcutta, that the whole story is absolutely blown upon. Not a single person ventured to take up the time of the local Council with this allegation. There has been a full Magisterial inquiry into the matter, and it has been conclusively proved that the story of the constable being shot was utterly and demonstrably false. I doubt if any Member from Bengal would be prepared to deny the correctness of this statement. I doubt if the Hon'ble Member would have had the courage to make a statement of that kind in the Bengal Council. Those indeed who put the constable up to make the charges are themselves ashamed of the whole business. There is nothing in the allegation at all. My Lord, I am surprised it has been brought up here.

"The only other question I should like to reply to, is the point raised by the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma. He said that I complained of the wearisome speech of the Hon'ble Member. That was not my intention. I did not complain of the speech of the Hon'ble Mover. I did, however, complain, and with reason, of the Hon'ble Member's reading out a voluminous extract from a newspaper—a procedure which, I think, every one found most wearisome."

The motion was put and rejected.

The Council adjourned to Monday, the 15th September 1919, at 11 A.M.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

(5 & 6 Geo. V, Ch. 61.)

The Council met at the Council Chamber, Viceregal Lodge, Simla, on Monday, the 15th September, 1919.

PRESENT:

The Hon'ble SIR GEORGE LOWNDES, K.C.S.I., K.C., Vice-President, presiding, and 53 Members, of whom 46 were Additional Members.

OATH OF OFFICE.

The following Additional Member made the prescribed oath or affirmation of allegiance to the Crown:—

The Hon'ble Mr. Henry Robert Conway Dobbs, C.S.I., C.I.E.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur asked:— 11-5 A.M.

Adoption of contract system in the Cash and Pay Departments of the Eastern Bengal Railway.

1. "(a) Is it a fact that it is proposed to adopt the contract system in the Cash and Pay Departments of the Eastern Bengal Railway?

(b) Will not the adoption of this system be a departure from the usual practice, and result in depriving a large number of employés of the prospects and privileges of the Provident Fund?"

"(a) A proposal to this effect is at present under the consideration of Government.

(b) By the adoption of the system the Eastern Bengal Railway would conform with existing practice on the other State-worked railways. Employés of the contractor, not being railway servants, would not be eligible for Provident Fund benefits. The number of employés in the Cash and Pay Department of the Eastern Bengal Railway is about fifty. If the contract system is introduced in this Department employment in other branches of the railway carrying the benefits of the Provident Fund would be found ultimately for the majority of these if they so desired."

Supply of Wagons to collieries.

2. "(a) Is it a fact that the Railway Board in their letter No. 169-T.-19, dated the 4th August 1919, stated to the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce that figures had been placed before them giving the percentage of wagon supplies under various heads received by collieries belonging to the members of the Indian Mining Federation and the Indian Mining Association, which went to show that under the coal Special Indent system wagon supplies had approximated very fairly to the percentages of the total outputs represented by the two Associations?

(b) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a list of the collieries working in Bengal and in Bihar and Orissa showing their respective raisings during the operation of the coal Special Indent system for the respective periods of its working under the Committee appointed to regulate the supply of coal from January 1917 to October 1917 and under the Coal Controller and the Coal Transportation Officer from November 1917 to July 1919, and also showing the wagons supplied to each colliery under each of the various heads during those periods?"

"(a) The reply is in the affirmative.

(b) The figures asked for cannot be placed on the table as their preparation would involve a large expenditure of time and labour. I may, however, inform the Hon'ble Member that collieries belonging to members of the Indian Mining Association produced approximately 70 per cent. of the total output of coal in 1918, and figures available shew that during May 1919, which may be taken as a typical month, these collieries received 73·51 per cent. of the total wagon supplies."

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur asked :—

Coal Special Indent system.

3. "(a) Is it a fact that the Railway Board on the 14th May last wrote to the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce in reply to their representation for the withdrawal of the Special Indent system for the supply of wagons for coal that the coal Special Indent system was being abolished on and from the 1st of August, 1919, and so further action in this respect was unnecessary?

(b) Is it a fact that the coal Special Indent system was withdrawn and wagons were being supplied for coal on the pre-war basis pro rata according to raisings from the 1st August last?

(c) Is it a fact that a notice was issued under the signature of the Coal Transportation Officer on the 4th August renewing the Special Indent system on and from the 15th August last?

(d) Will Government be pleased to state the special circumstances, if any, which arose between the 14th May 1919 and the 4th August 1919, which led them to alter their decision with regard to the coal Special Indent system?"

"Replies to (a), (b) and (c) are in the affirmative.

As regards (d), Government were advised that railway transportation difficulties and the continued absence of shipping necessitated the continuance of the Special Indent system. They are anxious, however, to put an end to all forms of control at the earliest possible moment, and propose to do so in this case as soon as it is reasonably safe so to do."

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur asked :—

4. "Have Government in contemplation any scheme for the increase of the pay of postal peons?" Increase of pay of postal peons.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"There has been a steady increase in the rates of pay of postmen during recent years. The aggregate monthly cost of the revisions sanctioned by the Director-General, Posts and Telegraphs, and the Postmasters-General during 1917-18 and 1918-19 amounts to Rs. 14,917 a month, and the number of men benefited by these revisions is 9,056. In addition to this various revisions have been, and are being, carried out during the current year.

Besides these revisions of pay, all postmen receive special war allowances, which are calculated at the following rates :—

For men whose pay is Rs. 12 or less, Rs. 2;

For men whose pay exceeds Rs. 12, but does not exceed Rs. 20, Rs. 3;

For men whose pay exceeds Rs. 20, but does not exceed Rs. 35, Rs. 4;

For men whose pay exceeds Rs. 35, but does not exceed Rs. 50, Rs. 5.

In addition to these war allowances, postmen draw grain compensation allowance according to the ordinary rules under Article 72, Civil Account Code. At present prices these allowances amount to Rs. 1-8 for men whose pay (excluding war allowances) is Rs. 16 or less, and Rs. 3 for men whose pay (excluding war allowances) is more than Rs. 16 but not more than Rs. 30.

To illustrate the extent of the improvements effected, the average emoluments in 1914 and 1919 at the four chief offices in India may be compared.

	1914.	1919.
	Rs.	Rs.
(1) Calcutta	16-6	23
(2) Bombay	19-9	27-5
(3) Madras	15	24-7
(4) Lahore	13-7	21-15

Government are now contemplating a general scheme for the permanent increase of the pay of postmen which will absorb the present temporary war allowances."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

5. "Has the attention of Government been drawn to a statement in the Press that the Report of the Medical Services Committee will not be published? Is this statement true? If so, will Government be pleased to state the reasons for not publishing the Report?" Publication of the Report of the Medical Services Committee.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief replied :—

"The reply to the first two parts of the question asked by the Hon'ble Member is in the affirmative. The report of the Medical Services Committee is being considered by the Government of India, and must therefore be treated as confidential at this stage. Moreover, Government consider that no useful purpose would be served by placing it in the hands of the public at present."

Re-organisation of the Medical Services in India.

6. " Will Government lay on the table copies of—

(a) the Report of the Committee on the Re-organisation of the Medical Services in India ; and

(b) the despatch of the Government of India on the above Report to the Secretary of State for India?"

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief replied :—

" (a) and (b) The report of the Medical Services Committee is being considered by the Government of India, and must therefore at this stage be treated as confidential. A despatch to the Secretary of State for India has not yet been prepared on the subject, as the opinions of Local Governments have not all been received. The reply to the questions asked by the Hon'ble Member is therefore in the negative."

Recommendations made in the Report re: the Indian Medical profession.

7. " What recommendations, if any, have been made in the Report on the Re-organisation of the Medical Services in India to satisfy the aspirations of the Indian Medical profession towards a larger share in the Military, Civil, Scientific, Educational and Sanitary Posts in the services and in the War Reserve ? "

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief replied :—

" As the report of the Medical Services Committee must be treated as confidential at this stage, Government are unable to make any public announcement at present as to the recommendations made by that body."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

Appointment of temporary Indian Officers to the permanent cadre of the Indian Medical Service.

8. " (a) Is any augmentation contemplated in the near future in the permanent cadre of the Indian Medical Service ?

(b) Has any provision been made for the recognition and appreciation of Indians holding temporary commissions in the Indian Medical Service, and are any steps being taken for their incorporation in the permanent cadre of the Indian Medical Service ?

(c) Is it a fact that in filling up certain permanent posts in the Indian Medical Service from among the holders of temporary commissions, 33 men out of 146 recruited in England and 17 men out of 900 recruited in India have been appointed by the Secretary of State for India? Were all the 33 men Europeans?

(d) Will Indian Members of the Indian Medical Service holding temporary commissions and who have been on active service in the various theatres of War have a preferential claim to incorporation in the permanent cadre of the Indian Medical Service ?"

"(a) An augmentation of the permanent cadre of the Indian Medical Service is under consideration with reference to military medical requirements.

(b) Indians holding temporary commissions have the same opportunities of earning rewards and decorations as permanent officers of the Indian Medical Service.

Applications for permanent commissions from Indians holding temporary commissions in the Indian Medical Service have been called for, and these applications are now under consideration.

(c) Fifty officers have been given permanent commissions in the Indian Medical Service by nomination since the entrance by competitive examination ceased. Of this number, 33 were Europeans and 17 were Indians.

(d) Active service in the various theatres of war will be taken into consideration by the Selection Committee in recommending Indian members of the Indian Medical Service holding temporary commissions for permanent appointments."

Salary of Indian Probationers on Railways.

9. "Is it true that the salary of Indian probationers in the various higher services on the State and other Railways is lower than that of European probationers for the same service? If so, do Government propose to take any, and, if so, what measures in this matter?"

"On State railways no difference is made in the pay granted to locally recruited probationers, whether European or Indian. Generally speaking, however, officers both European and Indian, appointed on probation in Europe, are given a higher initial rate of pay than locally recruited men.

The practice on Companies' lines is not uniform. In some cases the initial pay is higher than that given on State railways; in others it is lower. Government do not propose to interfere with the discretion of Companies in the matter."

Removal of restrictions on the flow of gold and silver bullion.

10. "When do Government contemplate removing the restrictions on the flow of gold and silver bullion to this country?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

"Government regret that they are not in a position to make any announcement on the subject. They recognise, however, that an integral part of any permanent sound currency policy must be the unrestricted movement of the precious metals. In a recent discussion which I had with the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, a summary of which has appeared in the newspapers, I pointed out the difficulty, in the present abnormal conditions, of removing the present restrictions on the private import of gold and silver immediately, and I can only repeat that Government recognise that their removal is very desirable as soon as circumstances permit."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked:—

Normal annual requirements in food-grains for the population of British India.

11. "(a) What is the normal annual requirement of the population of British India (excluding Burma) as regards food-grains, and how has the same been ascertained? How much of this approximately represents the minimum human need per head of the population, and how much the seed reserve, wastage, etc.?

(b) Is it a fact that during the Viceroyalty of Lord Curzon an inquiry was made as to the normal requirements of the average individual inhabitant of the different provinces?

If so, what briefly were the circumstances of the said inquiry and the findings arrived at thereanent in respect of each province?

(c) Will Government be pleased to publish a detailed memorandum embodying the results of the said inquiry, and any other inquiries that may have been made with a similar object?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied:—

"(a) The Government are not in a position to furnish any reliable estimate of the normal annual requirements of food-grains of the population of British India.

(b) and (c) The Government of India have more than once caused inquiries to be made regarding the production, consumption and surplus of food-grains in India, and such an inquiry was made during the Viceroyalty of Lord Curzon, but it did not include an investigation of the normal requirements of the average individual. The results of these inquiries are not considered sufficiently accurate to justify their publication as an authoritative pronouncement, and the Government of India therefore regret that they do not see their way to giving the information asked for. In this connection I would invite the Hon'ble Member's attention to the Resolution of the Government of India in the Finance Department No. 1614-F., dated 24th October 1914, regarding Mr. Datta's Report on the inquiry into the rise of Prices in India."

Foodstuffs supplied by India during the war.

12. "Will Government be pleased to state (a) the total quantities and values of foodstuffs, and (b) the total value of other materials and goods supplied by India (i) to the United Kingdom, (ii) to the Allies during the period of the war at controlled prices (lower than the prices prevailing in the importing countries), and (c) the aggregate values thereof as per market prices in the importing countries?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied:—

"The information for which the Hon'ble Member asks is not at hand, nor is it in most cases obtainable. Prices of some materials were controlled, but they were in many cases equally controlled in the importing countries. It is obviously impossible to compare values at controlled prices with purely hypothetical values calculated to represent what would have been the position if prices had not been controlled. An endeavour will, however, be made to supply information, so far as it is obtainable, of quantities and values of materials supplied at controlled prices, and a statement will be laid on the table when it is ready. Besides materials supplied at controlled prices, there were of course numerous articles supplied from India not on controlled, but on contract rates, which in many cases compared very favourably with open market rates. I presume the Hon'ble Member does not refer to these, but it would of course be a serious mistake to assume that it was necessarily to the disadvantage of the seller to meet a large and steady demand from Government, over and above the ordinary trade requirements, at considerably reduced rates."

Provincial Civil Services.

13. "(a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a letter that appeared in the 'Leader' of the 13th August, 1919, under the heading 'Provincial Services and the Public Services Commission'?

(b) In respect of what Departments of the Imperial Services have the recommendations of the Public Services Commission so far been given effect to?

(c) Have any proposals been received from Local Governments with regard to the Provincial Civil Services?

(d) If the answer to part (c) be in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to state whether they have submitted any recommendations to the Secretary of State to give effect to those proposals?

(e) If the answer to parts (c) or (d) be in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to place on the table the correspondence that passed between them and the Local Governments on the one hand and between them and the Secretary of State on the other?"

"(a) The answer is in the affirmative.

(b) So far the orders of the Secretary of State have been received only on the recommendations regarding the Mint and Assay and the Indian Finance Departments. In a few other cases, such as the Police Service, the Forest Service, Public Works Department, and the Indian Medical Service, orders have been received from the Secretary of State to our references regarding pay, but the proposals regarding the constitution of, and other changes in, the departments still remain for decision.

(c), (d) and (e) Proposals have been received from some of the Local Governments and Administrations, but until the Government of India are in possession of the views of nearly all of them, they are unable to address the Secretary of State. They will, however, do so as soon as possible."

The Hon'ble Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia :—"May I ask, Sir, whether it would not be more convenient to take Mr. Chanda's Resolution after Mr. Sarma's Resolution has been discussed?" 11-17 A.M.

The Vice-President :—"I think we must keep to the order of the Resolutions on the paper."

RESOLUTION re: REMOVAL OF THE PUNJAB GOVERNMENT FROM SIMLA.

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—"Sir, I beg to move the Resolution that stands in my name and runs as follows :— 11-18 A.M.

> 'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that Simla should cease to be the summer headquarters of the Punjab Government.'

"Sir, I am fully aware, I do not desire to, and shall not, disguise the fact that there seems to be some feeling in the matter of this Resolution of mine among my Punjab friends not only in this Council, but outside it, a feeling that one like me, coming from the further east, the other end of the country, should take it upon himself to move a Resolution affecting the Punjab which is so very well represented in this Council. Sir, if the Punjab alone was affected by this matter, certainly I would plead guilty to the charge of impertinent interference in other people's affairs. But, Sir, I submit that we, coming from other provinces, are as much interested in this matter as my Hon'ble friends from the Punjab, and I trust the Council will agree with me. Sir, before 1912, the Government of India was associated for three months in the year with a Provincial Government, namely, the Government of Bengal in the city of Calcutta in accordance with a practice which was hoary with age, dating back to the earliest days, of the British connection with this country. But, in spite of that, in spite of the fact that it was only for a very short time that the two Governments were together, the practice was condemned, and one of the reasons given in the Durbar Despatch of 1911, which was assented to by the Secretary of State for India for the transfer of the Capital from Calcutta, was this connection. In the words of the Government of India at that time 'the connection was bad for the Government of India, the connec- was bad for the Government of Bengal, and unfair to other provinces.' Sir, if this criticism was applicable to Calcutta, where the two Governments were together for only three months, very much more is it applicable in the case of Simla where the Government of India is associated with the Government of the Punjab for more than half the year, besides the fact that, comparatively speaking, it is in accordance with a very recent practice. Is it necessary, Sir, that I should labour this point in view of this authority of the Government of India and of the Secretary of State in regard to this matter? There is another matter, Sir. As a result of this the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab is the only Member of this Council among the provincial rulers. Surely, that is a matter which the other provinces could certainly take exception to. While I am on this point, I may as well mention an incident which took place in this Council Chamber two years ago. When speaking on a Resolution that was moved by my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Shafi, in 1917, Sir Michael O'Dwyer, forgetting that he was not addressing his own Council, and usurping the functions that pertain to His Excellency the Viceroy, as was pointed out at the time by my Hon'ble friend, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, delivered a most inflammable speech and made an attack upon the prominent men of other provinces on the ground that he was reviewing the situation of the country. Sir, that speech caused very deep resentment among the other provinces, and it was fortunately through the kind intervention of the Viceroy that Sir Michael O'Dwyer had to express his regret openly in this Council for his speech. Sir, that spectacle was hardly edifying and to put a stop to any repetition of this, if for nothing else, this practice must be put an end to. The Council may be aware, Sir, that Murree used to be the summer residence of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab. About 1877 or 1878, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab was invited to come to Simla. In those days the Council may remember that the Punjab was the North-West Frontier Province, and the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab was adviser to the Viceroy in regard to frontier affairs. At that time there was the Kabul trouble and shortly the second Afghan War broke out. It was in reference to this that the Lieutenant-Governor was invited to come to Simla to advise the Viceroy. Then His Honour proposed to purchase Barnes Court as his official residence; but the Government of India objected, on the ground that even then Simla was very overcrowded and it was only in view of the political and administrative considerations necessitating the constant presence of the Lieutenant-Governor in Simla to advise the Viceroy, that the objection was waived and that is how the Punjab obtained a footing in Simla. But, Sir, those considerations have ceased to exist now. In the words of the Government of India (Lord Curzon's Government) (I am reading a portion of the despatch which they submitted on this point)—'The situation has now been entirely changed; the frontier has been severed from the Punjab and has been equipped with an administration of its own. The solitary reason for the summer location of the Punjab Government at the seat of the Imperial Government has, therefore, ceased to apply. If there were still validity in it, it would furnish an argument not for retaining the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab in Simla but the Chief Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province in his place.' And the same despatch proceeds that 'even after experience of the new system there were officers of the highest authority who strongly deprecated the change and did their best to get it reversed. Prominent among these was Sir Charles Aitchison, who was Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab from 1882 to 1887.' 'Apart from any question relating to the frontier it appears to us on general administrative grounds to be undesirable that the seats of the two Governments should be identical for so long a period of the year.' That despatch also quoted the authority of Lord Dufferin who condemned the practice of the Imperial Government and any Provincial Government being associated together for any time. Taking this view, Lord Curzon's Government took this matter up after the formation of the new North-West Frontier Province, and suggested a reversion to the state of things that prevailed before 1878, by the withdrawal of the Punjab Government to some place more suitable than Simla. The Punjab Government was accordingly addressed on 28th June 1901, and it was pointed out to the Lieutenant-Governor that, as the chief reason for the location of the Punjab Government at Simla had ceased to exist, its continued residence there involved the following disadvantages: firstly, that it tended to detract from the position of the Lieutenant-Governor as the head of the province; secondly, that where there was any separation of antagonism of interests it was not unlikely to produce friction rather than despatch in the transaction of business; and thirdly, that it added to the growing difficulties connected with the population of Simla and prospective congestion of the station. The then Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, Sir Mackworth Young, opposed this proposal strongly, but his successor Sir Charles Rivaz entirely differed from him and supported this proposal. The result was that a Joint Committee of the two Governments, the Government of India and the Punjab Government, was formed to report on this matter and to select a site for the location of the Punjab Government in the summer. The Committee selected Dalhousie which was much nearer to Lahore than Simla and estimated the cost of removal to be 24 lakhs 25 thousand rupees. The Government of India thought that the estimate erred on the side of excessiveness, but they forwarded the report which had been accepted by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab to the Secretary of State urging strongly that the recommendation should be accepted. Lord George Hamilton was then Secretary of State, but was soon succeeded by Lord Middleton (then Mr. Brodrick), and it was he who dealt with the despatch. He did not see his way to accept the recommendations of that Committee that the congested state of Simla was a strong ground for the transfer of the Punjab Government. The Government of Lord Curzon replied to this by their despatch, No. 14 of 1905, dated the 30th March, and strongly re-urged the acceptance of their proposal; but Mr. Brodrick would not yield, and without rejecting the proposal deferred the solution of the question to a more convenient season, to quote his own words. That is, Sir, how the question came to be shelved. It is a matter for speculation what would have been the fate of this proposal if Mr. Brodrick had not been Secretary of State or if the relations between him and Lord Curzon were otherwise than what they are known to have been. However, that apart, I believe, Sir, that there are very imperative grounds on which the question should be re-examined now. In the first place, in spite of everything that has taken place since the publication of the Joint Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms, one would not be surprised if the ruler of the Punjab in future is not drawn, is not recruited, from the distinguished service of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, but recruited in England. It is obvious then, as was mentioned in the Coronation Durbar Despatch, that it would not be desirable that two noblemen from England, the Viceroy and the Governor of the Punjab should be residing at the same place as every now and again delicate social questions were likely to arise which would not be easy of solution. Then it would hardly be consistent with the dignity of the ruler of the Punjab that in his own province, for Simla is part of the province, he would not be the premier nobleman but only a 'chota lat.' But the real objection arises from the fact of the congested state of Simla. You have seen that even in its very inception the Government of India objected to Simla being the permanent residence of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab on the ground of congestion. In the time of Lord Curzon this difficulty was further accentuated. Can anybody say the position is better to-day? Can anybody say that there is accommodation enough to meet the requirements? We have the Army Head Quarters, and is it not a fact that they require more room? There are very many new offices in that Department that are going to be started and we must very soon have room for them. Then there is the Munitions Board, and we shall have very probably a Development Board. Where is the accommodation to come from? Then take the case of the Government of India. This Legislature will be more than doubled in a short time. We shall have a Council of State of 50 members, this will require accommodation. In the Legislative Assembly the number of elected members will be more than three times what it is now, they will require accommodation. Then, again, the sitting of the two Chambers, the Assembly and the Council of State will be much longer than it is now. Where is the accommodation to come from? Then take the question of the Punjab. It is going to have an executive Council, the members of the executive Council will require accommodation for residences. There will be more than one or more Ministers, and they with their respective staffs will require residences. With the introduction of responsible government in this country the sittings of the Punjab Legislative Council will not be confined to the cold weather sittings when the Government goes to Lahore. This question of accommodation cannot be solved if the Punjab Government is to continue in Simla. I am afraid a good deal of discontent has been caused by certain whole-sale land acquisition proceedings. The other day the Hon'ble Mr. Mant told us that the Government of India was not aware that there was any general feeling of indignation on the part of householders all over the country. I have read a different story in the newspapers and I have heard that the action of the Government of India has been compared to that of a highwayman with a pistol. I asked Mr. Mant about the case of a gentleman who offered to pay Rs. 15,000 to the Government if he were allowed to retain his property, or in the alternative, he asked the Government to put it up to auction. Neither proposal was agreed to by the Government of India. If, Sir, the Punjab Government is to remain in Simla, these difficulties will become far more aggravated. I am surprised that the Hon'ble Mr. Mant said that there was no discontent on the part of the public. Knowing human nature, I say that when people see high officials of the Government of India occupying palatial residences at a trifling rent, it is hardly likely that they will look with indifference at this prospect. I submit that the position is one which is serious enough to call for attention. I will quote a passage from Lord Curzon's Despatch in which he says:—

'The officers in the Punjab Service will regret the loss of the advantage which they at present enjoy in being brought directly under the notice of the Supreme Government.' It goes on to say: 'There are many Punjab officers who will regret the loss of the superior social amenities and amusements which they enjoy at Simla, and the wider opportunities that it offers for cultured existence, as compared with the necessarily more restricted range of thought, interest and entertainment that is provided by a provincial hill station of the ordinary type.' This may be freely conceded, but it is a case in which, as Sir Charles Rivaz has observed, 'personal must give way to the public interests.'

"Finally, one word as to the financial aspect of the matter. I say in the long run there will be no financial loss involved to the Government if the Punjab Government is transferred from Simla. The Government of India has embarked on a policy of building operations which will involve a heavy sum of money. This might be profitably diverted. All the money could be devoted towards starting a new hill station; this would not only relieve Simla of the expenditure in further expansion, but prevent a costly experiment and it will avoid land acquisition proceedings, present and future.

"I do not think I need detain the Council any further, for in my humble capacity I associate myself with the weighty arguments of the Government of India. If this Council sees fit to reject my Resolution, it will be demolishing the case of the Government of India, not mine."

The Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan :—" Sir, Simla is a District of the Punjab and thus under the Punjab Government. The Punjab Government has made its home on its own territory. 11-37 A.M.

"The Government of India has encroached upon the Punjab Territory to visit the place and are now welcomed in their home.

"The Punjab Government are not in Simla but are in Chhota Simla. They are in a remote corner from which our Hon'ble Mover wants to throw them down the precipice. I do not know how he would like if I walked to his home and told him to shift, leaving the house and property. If there be a question of Simla being over-crowded, there are miles and miles of uninhabited hills round Simla where extension could be effected and railway and water-supply extended. If it is meant that the Punjab Government should shift because it is the Punjab Government, then I hope the Government of India will not forget the services the Province has just performed in the World War and at the Frontier. The Punjabis will feel very much offended if anything was contemplated in this direction.

"Our Province has given the chance to many speakers from other parts of India to be able to say that 'we have made sacrifices and we have shed our blood for the Empire' though they have not got much connection with the Soldiers of martial classes which have borne the brunt of the struggle, and they should not be so unthankful as to ask us to leave our home in return.

"I will now touch another aspect and that is the expenditure. Apart from the expenditure incurred in the war and recent troubles, the country has gone through hard times as mentioned by His Excellency the other day. No proposal should be entertained which will impose on the Punjab the fresh burden of building on another hill station, because that would have to come from the pockets of the Punjabis and not from those of the other Provinces. It might be said, why should the Government go to the hills at all? I now and then come across criticism of a handful of men in England not knowing the climatic conditions of India, who say that no Government should go to the hills. I wish they could come and work one year in the plains and the following year on the hills, and they would soon find the difference in the outturn of work. All public servants are paid out of Indian revenues and in return naturally India wants the maximum work out of them.

"The Englishman cannot be expected to do his best when the temperature runs from 120° to 126° in the plains. I wish the Hon'ble Mover had been with me this hot weather at the Peshawar Front. He would have seen that even people of the country were suffering very severely ; and his output would not have come up to what it is now; which is about three-fourths that of the whole of the Council business.

"Sir, as the bulk of the Indian Army is recruited from the Punjab, it is absolutely necessary that its Government ought to be always in close touch with the Army Headquarters. When there was a great demand for the recruits and the Provincial Recruiting Board used to convene its meetings at Simla many distinguished officers from Army Headquarters could attend and help us without any hitch in carrying on their ordinary routine work.

"When question after question is being hurled at the Punjab Government's head its Headquarters at Simla for supplying information would have been of great value.

"Then, Sir, there has been a criticism on His Honour Sir Michael O'Dwyer's last speech. That was the time when we tried to get as many men as we could and tried to buck them up for fighting. It was to please the Punjabis who were shedding their blood that Sir Michael O'Dwyer delivered that speech, so that the other provinces may also come up to their pitch, and I think if during the war such a speech was made, it was for the good of the Government as well as for the good of the war which was then being carried on.

"Then, again, it has been said that the Punjab Government was called here on account of the troubles at Kabul. Well, when there was trouble this time in the Punjab it also caused troubles in Kabul on account of certain people, and if these troubles occur in future on account of the political propaganda which is carried on by certain people, then, I think, it is all the more necessary that the Punjab Government should remain where the Government of India remains. With these few remarks I hope the Council would vote against the Resolution."

11-43 A.M. The Hon'ble Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia:—"Sir, I am sorry I have to oppose my Hon'ble friend's motion. He thinks that the connection of the Government of the Punjab with the Government of India is unfair to other provinces. I would not say anything, but I hope he is not jealous of us and wishes to take the Government of India to his own province. If he were, I am sure the Government of India would not like to go into the heavy rains that his province gives.

"Then he said further on, that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, as head of a Provincial Government, was the only Member on this Council. I think he forgets that when the Government of India goes down to Delhi, the Chief Commissioner of Delhi is also a member on this Council.

"Then he said that Murree used to be the headquarters of the Government of the Punjab when my Province was called the North-West Frontier Province. Does he think that now that the Punjab is not so styled, it has lost its claim of a place in a part of its own Province and should not be near the Government of India so as always to be at hand, as my Hon'ble friend Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan said, to give the necessary information and assistance to that Government ?

"One thing more. My friend Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan said that Simla being in the Punjab we are in our own homes. I would remind my friend of the story about the old woman and the camel in Æsop's Fables. I hope with due respect to the Government of India, I do not mean to say that the Government of India is going to act like the camel towards us in the Punjab, but my friend does wish the Government of India to so act and turn us out from our home. That is not the way in which we Punjabis would like to be treated.

"He said further that the Secretary of State threw out this proposal and he gave the reason that perhaps it was due to a difference of opinion between the Secretary of State and the then Viceroy of India. I do not know what the real facts of the case are. Perhaps he has got more information on this point than I claim to have.

"Then he referred to delicate social questions. I am afraid I cannot understand what he means by this. Does he mean that the Punjab Government or the Head of the Punjab Government has not given the chances of enjoying the delicate social associations in their own homes? I hope that is not his meaning. But if he means something else, I am afraid he has not explained his point.

"He further said that after all the Head of the Punjab Government is called in Simla as the Chota Lord Saheb. Surely, as Head of the Punjab Government, he is the Chota Lord Saheb, and if to-day he asks the Chota Lord Saheb to go out of Simla I hope he will not ask the Jangi Lord Saheb to go out next. Perhaps that may not be convenient. But if to-day he asks the Chota Lord Saheb to go out of Simla, his next move would, perhaps, be to ask His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief to leave Simla on account of congestion and to find some convenient quarters somewhere else. My friend's suggestion might perhaps come later though I am not a prophet in this respect.

"Further, my Hon'ble friend said that on account of congestion many offices have to be built. My friend forgets that there is a scheme of extension which has been under the consideration of the Government of India. With the room that is available round about, I hope it will be possible for the Government of India to provide accommodation for all and every sort of offices that may be created. With regard to the additional members in the Punjab Executive Council, I do not think we will have more than one, and surely the accommodation required for the Executive Member and the Minister,—only two officers—should not be grudged, and I hope my friend would not grudge it.

"Again, he referred to the financial circumstances. In his opening speech I think he said something about the estimates prepared in Lord Curzon's time amounting to something like 24 lakhs and 25 thousand, but beyond quoting that figure he has not given us any other idea as to what he thinks the cost would be under the changed circumstances. Everybody who knows the circumstances in the country knows full well that the cost of building has more than quadrupled compared with what it was in the olden times, and perhaps if I take the figures as he gave them from the statement 24 lakhs and 25 thousand, it will considerably be much more than what the finances of the Punjab would be able to bear after this war.

"I therefore hope, Sir, that the Council would not see their way to accept the suggestion which has been made by my friend."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"Sir, the Hon'ble Mover has not been very fortunate in securing support from the province of the Punjab which is directly interested in the Resolution, but, at the same time, I do quite recognise that this is not entirely a provincial matter, but a matter of Imperial importance in a certain sense. But, in this connection, I should like in the first place to draw the attention of the Council to the wording of the Resolution:—'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that Simla should cease to be the summer headquarters of the Punjab Government.' There is no suggestion anywhere that an inquiry should be made, that local opinion should be ascertained or the matter locally investigated. This Council without having an opportunity of examining the facts with any care is asked to arrive at a summary decision on a change which is one of very great moment. 11-50 A.M.

Such a course will not, I think, readily commend itself to Hon'ble Members. The Council has been told that this question was examined at great length in 1903, and it is correct to say that Lord Curzon's Government, both then, and I think, in 1905, recommended that the Punjab Government should be moved from Simla, and that Simla should be made, as it were, an Imperial enclave. That proposal was carefully considered by, I think, two successive Secretaries of State, or by one Secretary of State on two separate occasions, and it was deliberately rejected for reasons which are known to the Mover. The Hon'ble Member asked me some time ago to place at his disposal the correspondence between the Government of India and the Secretary of State on this matter and I did so, but he has not, I think, mentioned the reasons which led the Secretary of State to reject the proposal, and if any other Members of this Council wish to have the papers, I shall be pleased to place them at their disposal. Briefly stated, the reasons were (I put them very briefly) that there were certain political advantages in having the headquarters of the Local Government and that of the Imperial Government in the same place; that the disadvantages arising out of such an arrangement were much over-estimated; that any form of administration by the Central Government of a small territory was inadvisable and very expensive, and that the population of Simla was then about 30,000—I will correct the figures if I find I am wrong—and that it would be reduced by 2,000 only if the headquarters were removed, so that any relief afforded to the congestion of Simla would be temporary and the expenditure would be far greater than the advantages to be derived, justified. Well, the question was again examined incidentally in 1917 by a Committee up here, and then again, I think, the Committee decided not to make any specific recommendations on the point, although they left the question open for discussion should necessity arise, and that is, I think, the present state of the case. I think the Council would do well if they left it there. Should necessity arise for reconsidering this question, then it can be re-opened at any time. But if it is proposed to make Simla, as it were an Imperial enclave, I should warn the Council that the recurring expenditure would be very considerable. We know from our experience of Delhi that the arrangements there are perhaps more expensive than in any administration in the whole of India. I think also that the Council will agree that, before a Local Government is prohibited from having its headquarters at any place it chooses within its own territories, and at a place particularly where it has been firmly established for many years, very cogent reasons should be given.

"I now turn to examine the reasons given by the Hon'ble Member for this change. Some of them were of considerable value, but others were clearly not of that character. His first argument is that because the Durbar Despatch discusses the question of the headquarters of the Local Government and the Imperial Government being in the same place, and finally decides that such a state of affairs is open to objection, therefore it must be bad. Well, Sir, I am afraid that if the Durbar Despatch, the despatch of 1911, were exposed to public criticism, it would be found that many of the arguments in that despatch would not be accepted by persons of authority in the country. I am not referring to Government officials, but to the non-official community, although it is possible that some Government officials, even if they were allowed an opportunity of expressing their personal opinion, would have doubts on the benefits which were claimed for the move. The second argument for the proposal was that it was said His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor was a member of this Council and that this was open to objection. I venture to suggest that we derive great assistance from the presence of His Honour, and I think there are few Members of this Council who do not welcome the presence of Sir Edward Maclagan here now. A reference was then made to a speech by Sir Michael O'Dwyer some years ago. Sir, I cannot but think that that was a most unfortunate reference. An incident which has been closed now for some years is dragged in without any reason in this Council on the pretext that it would justify the removal of the Punjab Government from Simla. If, Sir, that is the only reason for the removal of the Local Government that the Hon'ble Member can give, I think the case is a very weak one. It is true that there may be a difficulty in future with an officer of the status of a Governor in this Province, and that will be a matter for consideration, but I ask the Council not to urge the Government to come to an immediate decision on a question of this magnitude and importance on the information now available.

"The most cogent reason for moving the Punjab Government from Simla is, however, really the question of congestion, but when I came to inquire into details of this congestion, I found exactly what, I think, was said by one of the Hon'ble Members from the Punjab, that the number of houses occupied by officials from that Province is so small, that really it would make little difference if they were moved. The total number of officers employed by the Punjab Government, from the figures I have been able to collect, is 137, including 82 Indians, and they occupy 14 houses only. The congestion in Simla is mainly due to the occupation of houses by non-officials, who as a matter of fact occupied 72 houses here in 1917. This congestion is, however, now being removed and has been partly removed already by the erection of new residences. I do not want to weary the Council by a long list of figures, but they may take it from me that new accommodation is being provided both for Government of India officers at 'Craig Dhu,' 'Bemloe,' Summer Hill and at Dhar, and also for Punjab officers at the other end of Simla. That there has been congestion in the past is certainly true, and our attention was very strongly drawn to it last year when there was this outbreak of Influenza. From that time and before that time, but particularly from that time, the process of removing that congestion has been steadily pursued, and I would invite the Hon'ble Member to go down to the places I have mentioned, where he can see for himself the additional accommodation that is being provided both for Europeans and Indians.

"There is one other point to which I ought to refer and that is, the question of expense, because that is a very pertinent question for this Council to consider. The Hon'ble Member has not made any suggestion, as far as I was aware, of any definite place to which the Punjab Government is to be removed. He did say that it was proposed in one of the older despatches that they should go to Dalhousie, but he did not, as I understand, endorse that proposal in this Council himself. In fact his proposals are of a very vague nature and were described by the Hon'ble Malik Major Sir Umar Hayat Khan as proposals to push the Punjab Government down the khud without telling them where they were to go.

"Returning to the question of expense, the cost of moving the Government of the Punjab from this place has been estimated. The estimate then was in 1917 35 lakhs without any railway to the new headquarters; the price of materials has probably gone up since then. And we know that, when buildings are made, they always cost considerably more than the estimates. I think therefore that the Council would not be wrong in saying that the cost would be at least 50 lakhs, without any railway communication. Further, if the Local Government of a province, of this importance, is to be in touch with the rest of the province, I think it will be admitted that railway communication to its summer headquarters is an absolute necessity. If railway communication is given to a site even close to Simla, the estimated cost is Rs. 124 lakhs. That is a figure which, I think, will give Hon'ble Members of this Council to think before they lightly decide summarily to evict the Government of the Punjab from Simla. The view of the Government of India is that this question should be left open. Should it be necessary to reconsider it at any moment, they would be prepared to do so, but they must quite definitely and firmly oppose the specific Resolution proposed by the Hon'ble Member."

12 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—" Sir, we are glad to recognise that the Hon'ble the Home Member is conscious of the fact that this question is really one of Imperial importance, and, I think, the suggestion that he has made, namely, that it should be left open, is worthy of commendation. But may I also say, Sir, that my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Chanda, was right in bringing up this proposition at this stage, because something will have to be done definitely before large expenditure is incurred by way of building Council Chambers, residences for new officials and so on, if the Reform Scheme should come into operation. I believe that the general expectation is that the Reform Scheme would come into operation somewhere next year, and, if the Councils are to meet then, it stands to reason that some definite solution must be found at an early date. So that the question as to whether the Punjab Government should go on building for their officers and for their Councils along with the Government of India, or that the Government of India should think of going somewhere else is a question which, I think, should be settled soon once for all. That is the reason why I think my Hon'ble friend Mr. Chanda was right in bringing to the notice of the Government and the Council this important question at an early stage. Then, Sir, we have another reason, because this proposition has got some bearing upon another Resolution standing against my name, namely, that it would be desirable in the public interests that the Government of India should choose some permanent headquarters where they could stay throughout the year. Well, I am not going to anticipate what may be said on that Resolution, but it is arguable that, if the Government of India were to be permanently located at one place, it may be that the decision would be in favour of Simla then only; and if the decision should be that the permanent headquarters of the Government should be at Simla almost throughout the year—although it is hardly likely that that would be the decision—in that event, in that contingency, I think my Hon'ble friend's remarks would have additional weight, because I think, if the Government of India should choose Simla for residence for the greater part of the year, or throughout there is no room for the residence of two Governments here. But I think it is as well that we should assume that the present conditions of things will continue. Assuming that the present state of things will continue, and that Simla happens to be the summer headquarters of the Government of India, then the real point, Sir, is as to whether, from the administrative point of view as well as from the point of view of convenience, it is desirable that the Punjab Government should have the same headquarters as the Government of India. I think, from the administrative point of view, the decision arrived at in 1911 has much to be said in its favour. Recent events have, I think, only emphasised the wisdom of the decision that was come to in 1911. My Hon'ble friend, Major Sir Umar Hayat Khan, says that the Punjab consists of very inflammable material. Well, let us take it that that is so. If that is so, I think it is all the greater reason that the Government of India should be at a distance so as not to be associated so closely with the doings of the Punjab Government, and I think in the interests of the rest of India it is desirable that it should be so. May I point out also, Sir, that it would be extremely convenient to have an Imperial enclave as at Delhi, for the simple reason that the people of the other provinces would have a greater chance of coming to the Imperial headquarters without any interference, without such interference, as was the result of recent troubles and panic. Recent events have emphasised the importance, from the administrative point of view, of the decision of 1911, and I think much can be said in favour of the Resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda on that ground.

" Then again, Sir, could it be contended really that it is desirable to have two Council Chambers here and that place can be found in Simla for 50 or 60 non-official members of the Punjab Council and 100 or 125 non-official and official members of the Imperial Council, let alone the extension of the offices and so on which would have to be provided under the new scheme? It seems to me absolutely impossible to locate conveniently so many members in this place, and the Councillors would necessarily have to come here. Well, Sir, the question will have to be faced immediately, and I think the cost mentioned, 125 lakhs, will pale into insignificance when future interests have to be taken into consideration.

"Sir, may I say one word with regard to the constant introduction into this Council of the quality of the Punjab citizens and the quality of the rest of the citizens of India? We are all proud of the bravery of the martial races inhabiting the Punjab. We feel that we are one with them, and we hope that that feeling is reciprocated by the Punjabis, although it does not seem to find any acceptance at the hands of my Hon'ble Colleague, the Hon'ble Sir Umar Hayat Khan. I make bold to say that we from other Provinces of India have conquered the Punjab and have established British sovereignty in India, and there are as brave men, as bold men, as courageous men, as strong men physically in the rest of India as can be boasted of by the Punjab. And, Sir, I hope, therefore, that these pretensions will not be very often made because they are hardly in good taste, let alone being provocative.

"Then it was said that if there is to be propaganda of the character that has been indulged in recently, it is as well that the Punjab Government should be near the headquarters of the Government of India. That is just the trouble, and the Government of India has unfortunately been gravely misunderstood by its being so closely connected with the recent doings in the Punjab. I dare say, if the two Governments were at a distance and communications between them had to be carried on by correspondence and not by private conversations, better control might be exercised by the Government of India. Therefore, for that reason also, I think it is desirable that the headquarters of the two Governments should not be the same. I do not see any reason why there should be an importation of so much feeling by the representative of the Punjab or on the part of the representative of any other province.

"The question is one of a purely business-like nature. It is not a question of anybody asking the Punjab Government to shift from Simla which is legitimately their own. It is a question as to which place should be the headquarters of the Punjab Government for the convenience of the people in general. It would be intolerable if under the regime of the new Councils the headquarters of the Punjab Government were not in a place where the Government would be in touch with public opinion with the greatest commercial men and with the best elements of society, but far away from them for six months in the year."

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant:—"Sir, I only rise to answer a question put to me by the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda regarding the purchase of certain houses in Simla. I do not quite know what the incident has to do with this Resolution; but in case his remarks may give rise to any misconception I think it is well to state the facts. The facts are simply these. The houses referred to were the joint property of two owners. One of these owners authorised the other to treat with Government. The Government made to him what they considered to be a fair offer and he accepted it on behalf of both owners after consulting his partner . . . . . 12-10 P.M.

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda:—"May I rise to a point of order, Sir? Is it relevant to go into the details of the transaction when speaking with reference to this Resolution?"

The Vice-President:—"Certainly. It is in answer to the Hon'ble Member's question."

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant :—"It is only because the Hon'ble Member asked the question, Sir, that I wished to give him the facts. Well, the partner then came forward and offered to buy the houses back from Government at a higher price. The Government did not accept this offer because they had bought the houses for a public purpose and not as a speculation The Government were also asked to put the houses up to auction in order to ascertain their true value. Surely the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda does not contend that an auction in such circumstances would result in genuine bidding. If the owners in this or any other case are unwilling to accept the offer made by Government, it is open to them to get a regular award under the Land Acquisition Act."

12-13 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"Sir, it is rather surprising to see the attitude taken up by the Hon'ble the Home Member. He suggested that the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda should be content and advised the Council to be content not to press the question to a decision now and leave it open for consideration by the Government at such time as they may think fit He then went on to remark that he was very definitely and firmly opposed to the Resolution. Now, Sir, that I think leaves the question in a rather awkward position. Are members to understand that the Home Member speaking on behalf of the Government of India has made an informal pledge that this question shall be reconsidered by the Government of India ? Or does his stout opposition mean that the question will be shelved indefinitely ? I want an answer. If the Government of India will say, as the Hon'ble Member's remarks indicated, that they recognise the importance of the question raised by Mr. Chanda, that they recognise that the arguments, the reasons are on the side of Mr. Chanda, and that light, criticism and what, I shall not say more, is on the side of Sir Umar Hayat Khan and other members, then if he does recognise it, he should say to the Council that the matter is going to be considered by the Government of India at an early date. If that is not to be, then, I think, the Council ought to press the Government of India to take up this question for consideration at an early date, because from all that the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda has said it is obvious that the question needs reconsideration. In 1903, as the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda pointed out, Lord Curzon's Government in a very able despatch dated the 24th September, 1903, gave many reasons why the Punjab Government should be transferred from Simla to Dalhousie. In concluding that despatch the Government said :

> 'In conclusion we desire to press upon your Lordship's consideration the desirability of finally settling the question that we have submitted to you at the present time. It may confidently be predicted that if this occasion be lost, it will never again recur' (There they were wrong). 'The special justification afforded on the one hand by the removal of the Frontier from the administrative charge of the Punjab Government, and on the other by the impending opening of the railway will not again arise. and public opinion will not, therefore, be so generally favourable to the change ; while the cost of removal will tend to become greater, if not insurmountable, since the Punjab Government is constantly adding to the expenditure for which it would, as now, demand an equivalent in the event of transfer. Moreover, as Simla grows larger and the congestion becomes more serious, we shall incur the reproach of having thrown away the one great opportunity presented to us of reducing the dimensions and therewith the gravity of the population problem with which we are already confronted. We accordingly commend our proposals to your Lordship as politically opportune and administratively advantageous, while in their financial aspect they are not only as economical as it has been possible to make them, but also most moderate in relation to the public benefits which they may be expected to confer.'

That was in 1903. Now, it is unfortunate that the Secretary of State who had to deal with this matter could not recognise the wisdom of the recommendations, and the matter was shelved. But, Sir, many events have happened since then. Calcutta has ceased to be the capital of the Government of India. Delhi has become the nominal capital and Simla has become in a larger sense the capital of India. The Government of India spend more time in Simla now than they used to do before, and Delhi is really the winter camp of the Government of India; they go there as they would go to any other place for a few months' stay. Now that is one important consideration which has arisen. In addition to what my friends, the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda and the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma have said, there is the fact that these reforms are certain to come. Some men may not like it, but they are certain to come, and with the reforms will come a very great expansion of the requirements of Government for the purposes of carrying on the administration of Council. Secondly, there is the need for letting people live a little more freely here and not being compelled every year to undergo much inconvenience in finding house accommodation when they come to Simla, not for the sake of pleasure, but to serve their King and country. Many people are being put to much inconvenience, and it would be intolerable if this inconvenience is allowed to grow and suitable steps not taken to remedy it. Those are the aspects of the question so far as the transfer of the Punjab Government's summer headquarters is concerned. There is one other matter which I may mention. It is undoubtedly a fact, without referring to any individual, it is undoubtedly a fact, that the very close association of the Government of India and the Government of the Punjab is sometimes a great disadvantage to the people of the Punjab. The people of the Punjab do not get that justice that they might otherwise get in certain circumstances if the Government of India and the Punjab Government were not in the same place together; and recent events have confirmed the apprehension of these people on this point. Next, the advantage which the people of the Punjab may derive from the headquarters of the Punjab Government being at a hill station are denied to them. Go to any other provincial hill station and you will find a number of gentlemen of the province spending a fair portion of their time at the summer headquarters of the Government. I do not know that the people of the Punjab enjoy the same benefit to the same extent that people of other provinces do. The Government of India elbow out the Punjab Government to a certain extent.

"For these reasons I think, Sir, that it is eminently desirable that at this opportunity which is another very favourable opportunity for reconsideration of the question the whole matter should be reconsidered. That was one opportunity when Lord Curzon urged the settlement of this question. It was unfortunately lost. Here is another opportunity arisen on the eve of the introduction of constitutional reforms and changes which will affect both the Government of India and the Punjab Government. Even if these changes were not in sight the problem would press for consideration and solution; but with these changes almost certain to come—not almost, but quite certain to come—it is time that the matter were taken up and considered in a judicial spirit. Of course the opinions of some people may have to be dealt with rather lightly; but no real reasons, considerations of any weight should be ignored by the Government in weighing the question, and I have no doubt that when the question has been weighed, it will be recognised that the recommendation made by the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda has a great deal more weight on its side than can be urged against it. It may not be a pleasant thing to contemplate for some of our friends who are very closely attached to Simla, that the Punjab Government should cease to have its headquarters here. It may be that there will be disadvantages in that respect. On the other hand, the Punjab Government and the Punjab people may find that they are better off than now if they have a summer headquarters of their own. The matter ought to be considered, as I say, in a calm and judicial spirit, and when it is so considered, I have no doubt that the conclusion which will be arrived at will, speaking personally—it may be venturesome to predict—but I venture to think that the conclusion which will be arrived at will be in support of the proposition moved by Mr. Chanda rather than against it I, therefore, ask the Hon'ble the Home Member to say definitely whether the Government of India agree that this matter shall be taken up and considered at a suitable time. If he says it will, then the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda will be right in not pressing his Resolution. If the Hon'ble the Home Member tells us that the attitude of the Government is one of opposition to the Resolution, then I think the Council will be better advised to vote in favour of it."

12-23 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"Sir, when I came to the Council this morning, I came with a perfectly open mind. I came to listen to the debate on this Resolution and to profit by it and then to form my conclusions on the subject. Personally I should be sorry if the headquarters of the Punjab Government are removed from Simla, for I have often enjoyed the hospitality of Barnes Court, and being rather partial to the good things of life, I should be very sorry to lose that prospect. But this is not a matter which can be discussed from the personal standpoint, whether of a particular individual, or of a particular Lieutenant-Governor, or anybody else. It is, as the Hon'ble the Home Member has said, an imperial problem and it should be judged from that standpoint. Having heard the debate carefully and the past history of this matter, as unfolded by the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda from the despatches of the Government of India, it appears to me that there is a good deal to be said in favour of the proposal. But here, Sir, may I be permitted to say that I desire to protest against the spirit which the Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan, Tiwana, imports into the discussions in this Council, when any matter that concerns the Punjab comes up. He says to us: 'Oh, you are nobodies, we Punjabis are the only people concerned, we shall say what we like, you are outsiders' and so forth. He said the same thing when the last debate on the Punjab Committee was on. But Sir, I desire to point out that in this Council when we are discussing Imperial problems, every member, no matter from what province he comes, has an equal right with the Hon'ble Major Sahib to express his opinions . . . . . .

The Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan:—"Sir, I desire to ask if these personal matters are relevant to the Resolution that is being discussed?"

The Vice President:—"The Hon'ble Member must not be thin-skinned. He has provoked the retort."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"Sir, I think we all have an equal right to express our opinions. It is not a question—as the Major Sahib said—of throwing the Punjab Government down a precipice. He referred also to certain things which Sir Michael O'Dwyer had done to 'buck up' the soldiers. I do not want to say a word against Sir Michael O'Dwyer, for so long as we have here in our friend the understudy of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, the late Lieutenant-Governor, it is not necessary.

"I have given very careful attention to the remarks of the Hon'ble the Home Member and, I think, he conceded that this matter deserves very careful attention. As regards the question of expense, this is a point on which the Government of India are most ingenious. The Government of our country easily find a thousand excuses for carrying out what they like, and they as easily find a thousand excuses for not doing what they do not like. When they wanted to remove the capital to Delhi and to spend crores of rupees on that project, they found good excuses in the famous Despatch of 1911. I was surprised to hear Sir William Vincent say that many of the premises and conclusions of that Despatch would not be accepted by non-officials and even by several officials . . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"I said if officials were allowed to express their personal opinions many would not take the view that the reasons given for the transfer were convincing. I am not suggesting that this is my opinion."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—" Sir, it seems to me that the question of expense is not of such great importance. The sum of 35 lakhs is, it is true, a large one, but the Government of India have vast resources at their disposal, and if this scheme is to be carried out they could easily find this money. Therefore, I am not deterred by the prospect of the financial liability that will be incurred in carrying out the scheme. The question is this—is it or is it not desirable that the Punjab Government should be kept at Simla ? If it is undesirable that the head of a Provincial Government should be kept at the headquarters of the Government of India, then, I think, the question of 35 lakhs should not matter at all. I have no desire to traverse the ground covered in the previous speakers' speeches, but I will only mention one small matter. I was talking to a friend the other day and I said ' His Excellency '. He said :—' His Excellency ! why which of the two do you mean ?' Now, if there is going to be a third ' His Excellency ' in Simla, this will, I fear, cause much confusion in various matters—if not confusion worse confounded. We have asked the Government to declare their opinion on this Resolution unhesitatingly, and I hope the Hon'ble the Home Member will, in view of our expression of opinion, be pleased to give us a more suave answer than he did on the occasion of the debate on the Punjab Committee. The replies given by Sir William Vincent show that he takes up generally a very unbending and unrelenting attitude. I do not say that he does so wilfully or perversely, but I do say that the impression left on our minds by his attitude on previous occasions, is one of non-possumus. The other day, when I said that his attitude on the Punjab Commission was one of non-possumus, he seemed to resent the language and protested against it, but we cannot help characterising it as such. I hope the Hon'ble the Home Member will give us a more sympathetic answer to-day, and we may then ask Mr. Chanda to withdraw his Resolution."

The Hon'ble Sir Zulfikar Ali Khan :—" Sir, as a Punjabi and as one who has some vested interests in Simla I feel I cannot refrain from taking part in the debate on this Resolution. My Hon'ble friend the Mover has no such idea as that he will derive any good from this Resolution. I think it is rather a spirit of peevish discontent characteristic of the times that is responsible for the pulsating upheaval of his physical forces. 12-29 P.M.

" Now, Sir, in determining the merits of such a Resolution as this, the foremost consideration is the financial one. Although I believe that he cherishes the best ideas, yet the best ideas are poisoned by considerations of financial stringency. Previous speakers have alluded clearly to this difficulty but have not, as far as I am aware, shown any way out of it. I think the removal of the Punjab Government from here to some other hill station will involve prodigious expenditure. It may approximately come to something like a crore and a half.

" Now, Sir, in view of all sorts of schemes for education, for sanitation and the like, is it possible for us non-official members to propose such fanciful schemes which involve a crore and a half on account of the move from Simla of the Punjab Government to some other station ? I must say that this shows a lack of perspective on our part. If we have to request the Imperial Government for grants for education, for sanitation and the like, we must keep in view that the resources of the Imperial Government are not unlimited, and for this purpose I do not think the Hon'ble Mover has shown any source from which this expenditure could be derived.

" Sir, when the Imperial Government moved from Calcutta to Delhi, we all remember that public opinion practically all over India was opposed to it, and the sentiments of the people were confirmed by frequent and persistent rumours which were floated as to the return of the Imperial Government to Calcutta. This is a fair indication of the sentiments of the people. I know that the Government of India are anxious to create an atmosphere for themselves, but I do not think that even they want to be exclusive. The Hon'ble Mover would create a sort of solitude for them where they can certainly have some sort of spiritual rest and peace, but does he mean to put them in an air-tight compartment where no provincial voice could reach them? When the Viceroy's Executive Councillors sent that despatch of 1911 regarding the Durbar, they scrupulously abstained from making any mention of the Punjab in their despatch, although, I believe, they were aware all the time that they had to live for about half the year with the Punjab Government at Simla. Now, Sir, if they had realised any inconvenience on account of our presence here, I think they might even then have solved that question, but as they did not feel any such inconvenience, I daresay they did not want the Government to leave the Punjab.

"Now, Sir, apart from other æsthetic reasons, we Punjabis feel that when we come to Simla we have opportunities of meeting such cultured and refined people as come from other provinces, and it has a great civilizing influence on us, and although, according to them, the dusty wisdom of the Punjab is rather questionable, we feel that the breath which comes from them shall shake off that dust from us. It is here that we meet and know about politics which guide the sentiments and interests in their provinces, and it is here that we have opportunities of mixing and talking with them, and would these people, for whom we have the greatest respect, deprive us of that advantage? Sir, on account of this Resolution there is already a good deal of speculation going on at present at Dalhousie with regard to house properties. I wonder if the Hon'ble Mover has any hand—I fear to mention it, Sir,—I wonder if he has any hand in that.

"My friend the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma said that when the Punjab was conquered it was conquered by people from other provinces. I think he ought to study history a little more and know the facts more clearly. The facts are these, that the Punjab was conquered by its own people . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"May I rise to a point of order? I submit we are straying very far from the subject-matter of this Resolution."

The Vice-President:—"I hope the Hon'ble Member will come back from history to practical politics."

The Hon'ble Sir Zulfikar Ali Khan:—"Well, Sir, I am only replying to the argoments alluded to by the previous speakers, and if I am allowed to reply to them I will proceed further . . . . .

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I agree that the Punjab was conquered by the Punjabis helping the others."

The Vice-President:—"We will leave the question at that."

The Hon'ble Sir Zulfikar Ali Khan:—"Now as regards accommodation at Simla, it is quite clear to everybody that there are so many sites round about Simla which could be utilised for this purpose, and this argument, therefore, according to my opinion, does not hold good. You go in any direction, and you will find so many desirable sites that accommodation for further expansion could be provided. I would not detain the Council any more, but I would say that my friend the Hon'ble Mover does certainly feel actuated by such sentiments as 'do good and throw it into the sea; if the fishes do not see it, God will.'"

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda:—"Sir, I cannot say that I am at all surprised at the reception, shall I say the warm reception, which this simple Resolution of mine has met with at the hands of my friends from the Punjab. As my Hon'ble friend Nawab Sir Zulfikar Ali Khan said, that in going into this matter I may be mistaken in the view I have taken of it, but I have no personal interest at all in the matter. But I do not understand why my Hon'ble friend should think that my Resolution involves or rather deprives members from other provinces the pleasure of mixing with us. Sir, I may say that wherever the Punjab Government might be situated, those members of this Council, whether from the Punjab or from the Far East, will always have opportunities of meeting one another. I do not see at all why my friend should be under this misapprehension. 12-39 P.M.

"Now as regards the remarks of my Hon'ble friend on my left* to which reference has already been made by my Hon'ble friends Mr. Sarma and Mr Sinha, I do not think I need do more than associate myself with their remarks.

"Before I had the privilege of my Hon'ble friend's acquaintance I knew, from reading the Proceedings of this Council, of which he was a member before, that on almost every occasion he constituted himself as a sort of non-official ally of the Government and spoke on behalf of the Punjab Government. Well, I am sure every member will agree with me that my Hon'ble friend is quite welcome to that position. Of course after the valiant deeds which he has done on the battle-fields, of which we should be proud, I am sure he has got a renewal of the charter which gives him that right. I am sure I need not say anything more on that point. Several things have been said, I do not know if the time will allow me to refer to them, but I must refer in my humble way to the remarks of the Hon'ble the Home Member. In the first place, he has taken exception to the manner of the framing of my Resolution, and has raised the point as to why I did not ask for an inquiry. The reason was this. I think he will pardon me for saying that he was not correct in saying that the proposal of the Government of Lord Curzon was rejected by the Secretary of State. That is not so. What the Secretary of State said was this. In his despatch No. 91, dated 28th July 1905, he said:—

> 'These demands' (the demands to which he had referred) 'will continue to be a burden on your resources for several years to come: and, until they are satisfied, I think that the consideration of the question of creating a new summer head-quarters for the Punjab Government, the cost of which I still think must largely exceed your estimates, should be deferred to a more convenient season.'

"He did not reject, he simply postponed the consideration of the matter, and I simply ask the Council to take it up. It was not necessary, in view of this, that there should be a further inquiry. But I hope the Hon'ble the Home Member, as my friend the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya suggested, would give us an assurance that this matter would now be re-investigated in view of the present situation. It was not necessary for me to ask for a further inquiry; all the materials are there. The despatches of Lord Curzon's Government and the two despatches of the Secretary of State contain all the materials which are necessary for a decision on this question, and if further materials were needed, I hoped the Hon'ble the Home Member himself would see that the matter was investigated and these things inquired into.

"Sir, with regard to the proposition that the Government of India and the Provincial Government should not be at the same place, the Hon'ble the Home Member has taken exception to that. I do not know that I am called upon to support that view. At any rate that is the view of four Viceroys. I mentioned in my opening speech that that was the view of Lord Lytton, Lord Curzon, Lord Hardinge. I also referred to Lord Dufferin, but after my recent and disastrous experience in quoting on the 12th I did not venture to attempt to quote, but I will just quote one sentence from that despatch. This is what Lord Dufferin's despatch says ; in paragraph 33 of the despatch of the 15th March 1887:—

* The Hon'ble Sir Umar Hayat Khan.

> 'That the permanent location of the Government at any presidency-town would be adverse to efficient supervision of the Empire as a whole and would establish a disproportionate influence at the seat of the Government inconsistent with impartial and well-balanced rule.'

" Lord Curzon's Government said : 'this argument applies no less to a hill station than to a plains capital, and that it was both in theory and in practice undesirable that the Supreme Government and a Local Government should anywhere be located in the same station for so long a period as between five and six months of the year.' Sir, I always understood that Viceroys might change, Hon'ble Members and Home Members might change, but the policy of the Government of India remained unchanged. The policy advocated in my Resolution is the policy of the Government of India. The Government of India at that time was unanimous in this recommendation, and I thought that, although it is not the same Government here to-day, the same policy would not be discountenanced. I do not know, Sir, whether the theory that has been propounded to-day by the Hon'ble the Home Member will not be rejected to-morrow by another Home Member. I thought under these circumstances that this question at any rate needed re-investigation according to the decision of the Secretary of State.

" The Hon'ble the Home Member has referred to the question of cost. Of course in a matter like this a layman like myself can hardly be expected to give an off-hand answer, but that is a matter that ought to be gone into by a committee and investigated. I know Lord Curzon's Government thought the estimate of 24 lakhs was an over-estimate, and whatever it may be you have to set off against it the value of the buildings of the Punjab Government in Simla which will be acquired. This will be set off and certainly a portion of the cost will be contributed by the Government of India. Then, as my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sarma says, the question of cost cannot be always a determining factor in large questions of policy.

" Then the Hon'ble the Home Member said that it was not right for me to refer to the speech by Sir Michael O'Dwyer. That speech was made without giving notice to us, and who can say that there will not be another speech another day if the practice continues. That was my justification for bringing it up.

" Then as regards the over-crowding, the Hon'ble the Home Member said a number of buildings are being constructed. I think the despatch which I read, the despatch of Lord Curzon's Government and the despatch of the Secretary of State, agreed that it would be dangerous to have further buildings constructed in Simla as it would make the place insanitary. But where will you find room to build residences for the new Members of Council, I mean Ministers and the Members of the Executive Council of the Punjab and the Hon'ble Members of the Council of State, and so on ? Certainly, you must look ahead. It will not do for you to take it up at the last moment when you find the need has come.

" With regard to the story of the camel and the old woman told by the Hon'ble Sardar Sundar Singh, I think it is not the Government of India that is the camel ; it is the Punjab Government. The Punjab Government was asked to come to Simla and having come, it refused to leave. Therefore it is not the Government of India, but the Punjab Government that is the camel in the story.

"My Hon'ble friend Mr. Mant has replied to my question in regard to the gentleman whose house was acquired. I know that this is not the way to acquire property under the Land Acquisition Act, to offer it for public auction, but what I meant was this. The arbitrary way in which valuations are made was challenged by the gentleman. He said 'you either allow me to retain my property or put it up to auction.' That was a challenge to show that the valuation was too low. I believe the Government answered a question of mine to the effect that the matter had already gone to the Government of India about an appeal from these persons. You artificially, by executive order, prevent the house-owners from increasing the rent of their properties, and after that you acquire them, giving only 15 years' purchase as the value. What has happened in the case of the residences occupied by high officials of the Government of India? Take, for instance, 'Peterhoff.' We saw the other day that it had cost 2½ lakhs. What is the rent you get from that house? Rs. 5,500, out of which I believe Rs. 2,500 goes as Municipal taxes. That leaves about Rs. 3,000. What percentage does it represent? If 15 years' rent is to be the purchase price, would not the rent be increased several times? I refer to that simply for this purpose, that because you have the Punjab Government here you require accommodation, and therefore you arbitrarily acquire houses at arbitrary prices.

"If the Punjab Government is removed from here, lots of buildings would be available and lots of spots would be available for building upon, and this evil need not arise.

"I do not think I need detain the Council any longer. If the Hon'ble the Home Member will be pleased to assure me that the matter can be re-investigated, I will be quite prepared to withdraw this Resolution."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"Sir, I am afraid that I hardly expected that any remarks of mine on this Resolution would meet with the approval of the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya; any such approval would be entirely contrary to my experience in the past. I was also asked by him and other Members what exactly I mean by stating that the Government would firmly and definitely oppose this Resolution and I ought to explain this. In replying to the Hon'ble Mover I drew the attention of the Council to the terms in which the Resolution is moved. It binds the Government down immediately to a sudden change of policy of the greatest magnitude, and that is a decision which, I think, this Council cannot ask the Government to take. A new proposition is now put to me that the Government should appoint a Committee or make some inquiry into the subject of this Resolution. I want to make clear to this Council that when new propositions are put to individual Members of Government during the discussion of a Resolution—a similar thing occurred in a debate on a resolution of great importance the other day—and they are asked then offhand to announce the intentions of Government . . . . . . 12-50 P.M.

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"May I rise to a point of order? The Hon'ble the Home Member asked the Council to leave the question as an open question. That was the basis upon which I made the suggestion, which was not a new suggestion."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"What I was complaining of when I was interrupted by the Hon'ble Member was this, that I am not infrequently asked to announce the decision of Government on important new propositions which are launched at me offhand, and I put it to the Members of this Council that they must see that this is neither fair to me nor to my colleagues or even to the Council. Matters of this importance—the question for instance, of re-opening the correspondence with the Secretary of State as to the removal of the Punjab Government from Simla—are not matters on which I individually can express any opinion. I must, in regard to any question of such moment, consult my colleagues and be guided by what a majority of them think. That is the position I want to take up. I am, however, quite prepared to admit—and I did admit in my opening speech—that there were arguments both ways. In fact, no one who knows the marvellous ability of Lord Curzon would suppose that he would put forward a proposal which had not very strong arguments behind it. There are arguments both ways. I am not able to commit Government to any admission as to which are the more cogent, and indeed I am not prepared in any way to admit the validity of many of the specific arguments used by the Hon'ble Member or that they were of any great force.

"Another point has been made on which I must say something in reply, namely, the suggestion that the Punjab Government is in too close touch with the Government of India, and this was argued particularly with reference to the recent disturbances. Now, during those disturbances the Punjab Government was not in Simla at all but in Lahore. Our trouble was not that we were in too close touch with the Punjab Government, but that it was very difficult to communicate with them at all owing to the destruction of telegraph wires and all means of communication. It is said again that by reason of its proximity to the Government of India there is danger of unanimity of view between the Local Government and the Government of India. Sir, if Members of this Council were aware of the various occasions upon which the Local Government and the Government of India have differed, and differed fundamentally, on important questions, I do not think they would have pressed forward that argument as of any weight. I may say also that His Honour Sir Edward Maclagan's views do not carry more weight with me or with any Member of this Government if he is staying in Simla, than if he were staying in Lahore or elsewhere. The policy of the Government of India in this matter, I am then told, must be unchangeable and that because we advised a change in 1903 we must again do so. That is, if I may say so, a little unfair. Sometimes, the Government of India is accused of being too ready to change; at other times, it is accused of never changing, and the decision with reference to this particular case was not the decision of the Government of India but that of the Secretary of State. Whether the question should be re-opened or not, is a matter, as I said, for the collective counsel of the Government.

"The only other point to which I should like to refer is the dispute between two Hon'ble Members as to the comparative merits of the Punjab and of Madras. The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma, I understand, alleges that people of the other provinces were as strong, as brave, as good as those of the Punjab. Might I suggest that Hon'ble Members settle their disputes outside . . . .

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I am sure the Government of India does not encourage that policy."

The Vice-President:—"Order, order."

The motion was put and the Resolution was rejected.

RESOLUTION re HIGH PRICES OF NECESSARY ARTICLES OF FOOD AND CLOTH.

The Vice-President :—" Before the Hon'ble Member begins, may I ask him very earnestly to try and speak so that I can hear what he says."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—" Sir, I beg to move the following Resolution :— 12-57 P.M.

> ' This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that immediate steps be taken for the reduction of the unprecedentedly high prices of necessary articles of food and of cloth which obtain in several provinces, either by further controlling exports or facilitating imports, or both, and by such other means as may be considered fit and proper.'

" Sir, I do not think that I need explain, or apologise for the framing of my Resolution, since I am not suggesting any specific remedy beyond mentioning the control of exports and imports, but have placed the matter in the discretion of the Government. I was urged to ask for the same remedy as was adopted in England, namely, the appointment of a mixed Committee of Inquiry, but after mature consideration I decided to refrain from doing so. In the first place, a Committee of Inquiry would take time and that would mean delay, whereas what is most imperatively necessary is prompt measures, and, I believe, the Government has got all the necessary information at its disposal. In the second place, Sir, I tried to proceed on what I may call the lines of least resistance. I wish that a non-controversial subject like this—and I sincerely trust that the Council will accept this as a non-controversial Resolution—should not lose its character as such by the introduction of any debatable points in it. In the third place, I see that even in England the Labour party, in giving an ultimatum to the Coalition Government to vacate the Treasury Benches unless they can find a solution to high prices, do not make any specific recommendation.

" Well, I find I can do no better than follow their example. Of course I do not mean that I am to give any ultimatum to Government ; that would be crying for the moon, but to leave the matter to the discretion of the Government. What I propose to do is simply to call attention to the state of things now obtaining in the country by reason of high prices, and for this purpose I do not think that I need trouble the Council by any lengthy or elaborate statistics ; nor do I propose to discuss any abstruse proposition of economics. I shall avoid all that, and for the best of reasons, because I do not understand them. Sir, to take the case of Bengal. Owing to a partial failure of the paddy crop in 1918 coupled with other factors, there was a rise in prices towards the end of the year. I ought to say here that the failure was very partial. There have been occasions when there have been greater failures of the crop ; still there has been nothing like the present state of very high prices, and there is an impression in the minds of the public—it may be right or it may be wrong—but there is this impression that this state of things has been brought about by the action of Government in controlling foodstuffs. Sir, I said that there was a rise of prices towards the end of last year. At the beginning of the present year it rose rather higher, so much so as to bring the matter under discussion in the Bengal Legislative Council in February, when a Resolution was moved asking the Government to take steps in connection with the high prices. The Hon'ble Sir Henry Wheeler, who replied on behalf of Government, pointed out that the question of controlling exports of rice from the province, which was suggested as one of the measures, was not in the hands of the Provincial Government, but in that of the Government of India ; and, secondly, he said that although the level of prices was high, it could not be said that it was unusual, so that the Provincial Government would not be justified in moving the Government of India. He said at the same time that the attitude of the Government of Bengal would be one of watching. At that time Sir, the price of rice was Rs. 6 a maund. Sir, after that discussion in Council there was no sign of a falling of prices. On the other hand, it was rising steadily. In June it came up to, I believe, Rs. 8 a maund ; in July it exceeded that and the matter was again discussed in the Bengal Council. At this time the Government, through the Hon'ble Mr. Cumming, thought that the position had so much changed, that they would modify this attitude of watchfulness and thought also that something might be done to remedy this state of things. I believe, Sir, that some measures were adopted by the Government of Bengal including the taking of a census of rice in the province ; but in spite of all that was done by the Government of Bengal there was no falling of prices ; on the other hand, there was a steady rise. In July it was over Rs. 8 a maund and by the time I sent in notice of this Resolution it came nearly to Rs. 10 a maund, a thing unheard of in Bengal. Sir, since I have come, it has gone up further ; and in some places it has now reached even Rs. 15 a maund, an increase of 500 per cent or more. I have been receiving telegrams and communications from various parts of the province, and I have further seen in the newspapers coming from Calcutta, that the position has become one of very great gravity. We find that looting of rice and paddy on an extensive scale has commenced and there are threats of strikes. I believe, Sir, I have seen in the papers that there have been serious lootings of rice and paddy at Serampore, Bhadreswar, Munshiganj, Midnapore, Rishra, Sheoraphuli, Bally, Barisal and Naihati, and in some of these places I find that armed police have had to be called. Well, Sir, as I said, of course when this state of things has been going on, it cannot be supposed by anybody that Government is apathetic or indifferent; but as the Englishman, which as a rule does not see eye to eye with us, described the action of Government as spasmodic and that in the estimation of the public the real cause of this difficulty was the action of Government in controlling foodstuffs. The complaint is not confined to the Indian community, but endorsed by important European bodies like the Darjeeling Planters' Association. The complaint is that rice was allowed to be exported out of the country without any restrictions (I use the term in a non-technical sense) without due regard to the requirements or needs of the country, while at the same time there has been a prohibition of importation of rice into Bengal from Burma. I said, Sir, that the price of rice had gone up to as much as Rs. 15 a maund in many places and nobody can tell that there will be no further rise. In fact you will find things are getting more serious.

" I have been speaking for the province of Bengal, but I want the Council to know that this state of things is not only prevalent in Bengal, but also in my province of Assam, at any rate from the division from which I come. On my arrival here I have received a copy of the proceedings of a meeting of the Indian Tea Association, Surma Valley Branch, at which a leading planter of Cachar, Mr. Cresswell, moved the following resolution :

> 'That the Local Government in spite of continual representations refused to take the necessary steps to curtail the unusually heavy exportation of dhan, which under ordinary circumstances would have been more or less sufficient for local requirements, giving, it is understood, as a reason that the ryot had to meet obligations to the Government. The time has now arrived when, unless Government take immediate measures to arrange for the necessary supplies of rice, the district is face to face with severe famine, when not only will the greatest hardship be brought upon all, but the ryot will be unable to pay to Government the revenue which was evidently so urgently needed, so much so that the interests of the community at large were considered worth sacrificing.'

" Sir, I have also seen in the papers of a serious riot in the Madras presidency for rice. When this was the state of things in Bengal, the British Indian Association, at a conference in their rooms at which, besides members of that body, members of the Bengal Landholders' Association, the Indian Association, the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce, the Central National Mahomedan Association, and the Muslim League were present, the President, Maharaja Bahadur Sir Prodyat Kumar Tagore, made the remark that if he were to choose between martial law, which was able to bring down the price of food-stuffs summarily, and semi-starvation, he would certainly vote for the former. Of course no one will take that seriously as his deliberate opinion. The horrors of martial law are awful but, when they are considered to be trifling in comparison with the state of things in the province, you get an idea how matters stand. In accordance with the deliberations of this Conference the Secretary of the British Indian Association, the Hon'ble Raja Rishi Case Law, addressed the Government of Bengal and submitted the following Resolutions:—(1) Reduction of the export of rice from the province, (2) Increase of transport facilities and a substantial reduction of freights, (3) Prevention of profiteering, (4) Importation of Burma rice, (5) Formation of advisory bodies to advise the Controller of Food Supplies and the Director of Civil Supplies in the matter of the control of foodstuffs. These suggestions have also been submitted to the Bengal Council which considered the matter again. I believe the Indian members in my province of Bengal were also associated which these recommendations. I said at the beginning that I would not quote any elaborate statistics or develop any theories, but that I would simply call attention to the state of things that has arisen in my province and that I would place this before the Council. What are we to do in the face of all this? Are we merely to sit with folded hands and content ourselves with the reflection that people in other countries also are suffering as we do here and that these evils are due to world prices? I submit, Sir, that it will be a very unfortunate state of things if nothing is done. The suggestions made by public bodies which I have placed before the Council deserve, I submit, careful consideration. There is an impression that the difficulty has been created by Government sanctioning heavy exports of rice overseas under the rationing system. We know from a Communiqué published that the exports overseas after the first three months of the year have been considerably reduced, and we are grateful to the Government for that. But it is unfortunate that, as appears from a Communiqué, the amount of rice exported during the three months January to March was nearly double that exported during the two previous years. It appears from the Trade Return of Calcutta for April 1918 to March 1919 published under the authority of the Governor General in Council that whereas in 1917 17,92,055 maunds and in 1918 20,19,392 maunds of rice were exported from Calcutta by sea, within the three months of January, February and March 1919, 53,70,526 maunds of rice were exported oversea, i.e., Bengal exported nearly double the quantity of rice in the first three months of this year of what it did in the first two previous years. There has been a complaint that rice has been exported overseas to Europe for non-food purposes. This has been contradicted by an official Communiqué, but there is some justification for the complaint. In paragraph 279 of the Report of the inquiry into the rise of prices in India, it is stated that 'Indian rice exported to Europe is used for the manufacture of spirits and starch.' Mr. Dutt's inquiry was published in 1914, and there is a publication dated Simla, April 1918, in which the following statement occurs 'Indian rice (including Burma rice) taken by Europe is used more for distillation of spirits and manufacture of starch than for food.' There is another complaint that rice has been exported to countries like Sweden where there is no Indian population. There was also a statement to the effect that rice was being exported to Egypt, but we have seen in a Communiqué that Egypt is a distributing centre and not a consumer and so the objection disappears, but I have seen nowhere a reply to the criticism that rice has been exported to countries like Sweden where there is no Indian population. Then it has been complained (I am quoting from a question put in the Bengal Council) 'that export has often been allowed under military permits for really non-military purposes and to destinations without any military stations.' The answer which the Hon. Mr. McAlpin gave was as follows 'Government are aware that such allegations have been made but are not in a position to state whether they are correct.' That rather confirms the complaint. However, as Government has taken steps to reduce the export overseas let us hope that there will be no occasion for that in future.

"So much as regards the question of export overseas. The next suggestion that has been made both by Europeans and Indians is that Burma rice ought to be more freely imported and that facilities should be granted for easy transport of the same, and it has also been suggested in this connection that Government control should be withdrawn. There are two questions in regard to this matter. What is the object of the control and the second is, how has it been practically effected? As regards the object of the control, frankly, it has not been adopted in the interests of India, but the scheme has been adopted at the instance of the Royal Commission on Wheat Supply for rationing several countries in Europe. This has certainly made the action of Government open to attack. Before exporting rice for countries in Europe were steps taken to see that enough remained in the country for its consumption? I think that the Government should make a clear statement on the subject to remove the uneasy feeling that Government may have been apathetic or indifferent to the interests of the population of this country. If the control is withdrawn then the question will have to be considered from the Indian standpoint, regard being had to the very dangerous situation that has been created. In the next place, the manner in which this control has been given effect to has given rise to complaint.

"Sir, I think it cannot be denied that when the source of supply as regards Burma rice was easily controllable, when it was under the control of Government, they could easily fix not only the wholesale prices but the retail prices also. The system of controlling wholesale prices only as regards Burma rice has not, and would not, have made any difference in the situation. If anything, it has further increased the difficulties, it has opened the door to dishonest profiteering. Sir, I think it is a fact, and it has been found by experience in England, that if you are to have control at all, it will not do to have partial control, but you must have full and effective control. Therefore, when you come to fix wholesale prices for Burma rice, I think it is very desirable that you should go further and fix retail prices also.

"Then there is another point in connection with this control. Well, what is done is, the Director of Civil Supplies grants licenses to certain individuals, but there is no provision made for any supervision to see whether the purposes of the license are carried out, the licenses which are granted in the interests of any particular district. But cases have occurred where the licensees, far from importing rice to the district for which the license was granted, sold that license to other parties for a profit. There is no provision made to put a stop to this kind of thing.

"Then, in the next place, when a license was granted, no time limit was fixed within which the licensee was required to import the quantity for which the license was granted, and the result was that he used his license to tantalize the district as it were importing only small quantities at a time, and as they were insufficient, helping to increase the prices till famine prices were reached. Well, Sir, if these things are provided against, if greater care is taken in the grant of licenses, and provision for supervision is secured, there is no reason why you should not fix the retail prices too, and if retail prices of Burma rice are fixed, it is bound to re-act on the price of local rice, although on account of there being no possibility of controlling the movement of local rice, you cannot control its price, but if you control the retail price of Burma rice, that will re-act on the prices of local rice, and the price of the latter will automatically go down. I submit, Sir, these are things which ought to be considered. In this connection the suggestion that has been made that there ought to be strong Advisory Boards to advise the Director of Civil Supplies is well worth consideration.

" There is another complaint in regard to the import of Burma rice. We find that there has been a reduction in freight of Rs. 2 per ton only as regards Bengal. The freight that now obtains is several times of what it used to be before the war. We are grateful to Government that as regards some of the provinces there has been proportionately a greater reduction in the freight, and I submit, Sir, that there ought to be a further reduction of the freight as regards Bengal too. In this connection an allegation was made in the Bengal Council based on the authority of the 'Capital' of Calcutta which is as follows :—

> ' At present the entire carrying business of Rangoon to India is done by the British India Steam Navigation Company. No other Company is allowed to do the carrying except the Nippon Yusen and Kaisha which is allowed because of its connection with the British India Company. This company alone should not be allowed to make good war losses at the expense of the Indian. If other companies were allowed, it would perhaps effect a lowering of the freight and the price of rice.

" Sir, I go beyond this. I would ask why you should not grant concession rates for Burma rice in view of the present situation ? The railways are under the control of Government, and you can surely arrange to have the freights reduced. It may be argued that that would mean a Government subsidy, because the carrying companies, the steamer companies or the railway companies would look to the Government of India for making up the difference in the freight caused by the concession rates. Well, even so I see no reason why this should not be done under the present state of things. I believe, Sir, that when in 1917 the prices of food stuffs reached famine rates in England, the Government decided that it was necessary to cheapen grain artificially by a subsidy from Government, and I see no reason why this should not be done in this country. I say that the state of things obtaining in Bengal is such that there have been serious riots, to quell which the military had to be called out, and there have also been strikes ; and there was another allegation not only in the Press but also in the Bengal Council, that there have been cases of suicide due to starvation. Of course, the Government denied that. Really speaking, I do not think . . . .

The Vice-President :—" I would draw the attention of the Hon'ble Member to the fact that he has already been speaking for half an hour, and I must ask him to bring his observations to a close. "

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—" The only other point to which I must invite the attention of Government is, the question of profiteering. This profiteering has got a great deal to do with the increase of prices. I have reason to believe, and it is the opinion of the Government of Bengal also, that large quantities of rice are held up by well-known merchants even in Calcutta. I believe, the Bengal Government is of opinion that with the stocks available in the country in July, it is impossible that prices could have gone up so high unless stocks were held up. I think, Sir, the Government of Bengal thinks that it has no legal power to remedy this state of things. But I do trust that the Government of India will see its way to remedy ths matter. Profiteering in food-grains is a crime, it ought to be checked, it is a moral crime ; morally it amounts to murder, and I submit, Sir, that steps ought to be taken to deal with this matter effectively. These are the submissions which have been made by the public, and I commend these to the consideration of the Government. As I said, I was not going to place any theory of mine. I respectfully urge that the Government will see its way to take such steps, if necessary by subsidies, to reduce the prices."

1-30 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant :—"I rise at this early stage of the debate because I think it will be an advantage to other Hon'ble Members who may wish to take part in the discussion if I give some account of the steps that we have taken to deal with the problems of scarcity and high prices. I had hoped to be able to present to the Council a report on the operations of the Foodstuffs Commissioner, but Mr. Innes is so continually occupied with the work of food distribution that he has not had time to write about it. I hope that he will shortly be able to compile a report, and I can undertake to publish it, as the subject is one on which the public is entitled to the fullest information. Meanwhile, I will try to give the Council as much information as I can in the limited time available.

"Before dealing with remedies it is advisable to investigate causes. I understood the Hon'ble Mover deprecated this, but I would remind him that a doctor cannot treat a patient properly until he has diagnosed the cause of the malady. A writer in 'Capital' recently classified the causes of high prices under three heads, firstly, all-world factors, secondly, all-India factors, and, thirdly, local factors. I propose to consider them in that order. The first head need not detain us long. For some years past the principal nations of Europe have devoted their whole energies to the work of destruction instead of production, with the inevitable result that there is a world shortage of the necessaries of life. Together with this contraction of production, which in itself would tend to raise prices, there has been a huge inflation of European currencies, and these two factors combined are quite sufficient to account for the universal rise in prices. These conditions were bound sooner or later to re-act on India, both by increasing the demand for her products abroad and by adding to the cost of the articles that she imports. The restrictions imposed on exports, partly by shortage of tonnage and partly by the deliberate action of Government, have retarded the operation of this factor, but have not removed it altogether, while in the case of imports the shortage and high cost of freight has had the opposite effect, as it has reduced supplies of such articles as cotton cloth and thus raised prices here.

"Turning now to all-India factors, we find similar causes operating, though not to the same extent. The widespread failure of last year's monsoon caused a very serious diminution in the production of foodstuffs. The area under rice and wheat, two of our most important food crops, contracted by 16,000,000 acres, or 13·8 per cent, as compared with the previous year, and the estimated outturn was reduced by nearly 15 million tons. We have also suffered from currency inflation. In normal times the balance of trade in favour of India is adjusted by importing the precious metals which are used partly for hoarding, partly for ornaments, and partly for expanding the currency. During the war, the most important countries in Europe and America placed an embargo on the export of gold, while silver also was difficult to obtain. In order, therefore, to provide funds for our export trade and to finance important items of war expenditure, the Government of India were compelled to issue notes against securities held by the Secretary of State in London, that is, mainly British treasury bills. I think that the issue of these notes caused a more direct and relatively greater expansion of the currency than imports of the precious metals would have done, but this is a very intricate subject which I feel that I ought to leave to the experts of the Finance Department.

"I pass on then to local factors. Sir Claude Hill explained in the statement which he presented to this Council in February last, that the shortage of rolling stock on the railways involved great difficulty in distributing our reduced supplies of foodstuffs. This accentuated the effects of local scarcity and created golden opportunities for the profiteer. I see there is another Resolution on the agenda paper on the subject of profiteering, so I will not go into it now, except to say that I am inclined to agree with the writer in 'Capital' to whom I have already referred that profiteering is only a detail in the problem of high prices. Our experience at any rate has been that, wherever we have been able to push in ample supplies of grain, complaints of profiteering have practically ceased.

"The problem which we had to solve presented three main aspects, firstly, conservation of food-supplies, secondly, distribution, and, thirdly, prices. As regards the quantity of supplies available, we were fortunate in having had a succession of fairly good years and, although it is extremely difficult to estimate the amount of stocks in the hands of the cultivators, there is reason to believe that at this time last year the country was generally well-stocked. Although we did our best to provide food supplies for the Allies during the war, our exports have been considerably below the pre-war standard. In the five years 1909-10 to 1913-14, the net exports of grain, pulse and flour from India proper (i.e., excluding Burma) amounted to 10,192,000 tons, and in the five years, 1914-15 to 1918-19, to 5,212,000 tons. There was thus a total decrease in the latter period of nearly 5 million tons. Corroborative evidence of the existence of large stocks is furnished by the fact referred to in His Excellency's opening speech the other day that the maximum number on famine relief in the current year has been less than 1-10th of the numbers relieved in 1900, although the failure of the monsoon of 1918 was at least as widespread as that of 1899. No doubt the main explanation of this difference is, as His Excellency observed, the increased prosperity of the people ; but the figures also point to the conclusion that there were large stocks of grain in the country when the trouble came upon us. In fact it was increased prosperity that enabled the people to hold larger stocks.

"Still the decrease in production was a very serious matter, and, as explained by Sir Claude Hill in February last, it was decided to restrict exports of foodstuffs and to appoint a Foodstuffs Commissioner to control their distribution. I did not quite catch what the Hon'ble Member said about exports or the figures he gave for exports in the present year, but I can give him the following figures. In the first seven months, January to July 1918, the exports of grain, pulse and flour (other than rice) were 1,123,000 tons. In the first seven months of 1919 they were reduced to under 62,000 tons. As regards rice the exports have been reduced by 70 per cent., i.e., from 1,593,000 tons in the first seven months of 1918 to 478,000 tons in 1919, of which 376,000 tons went from Burma. Part of this was old crop rice belonging to the British Wheat Commission which they had undertaken to supply to the Allies. The Hon'ble Member has suggested that the control of Burma rice was imposed in the interests of the Wheat Commission, I can assure him that quite the contrary was the case, and that the operations of the Wheat Commission in Burma have been of great advantage to the cultivator. Towards the close of 1917, the prospects of the Burma rice market were very gloomy indeed, as the 1917-18 crop was the largest on record and there was no shipping to carry it away. The price of paddy consequently sagged badly, and by the end of September 1917 had fallen to Rs. 78 per hundred baskets, which was lower than it had ever been before at that time of the year. The Local Government appealed to us for assistance, and eventually arrangements were made with the Royal Commission to purchase 100,000 tons of rice a month for Allied and neutral countries in Europe. The Wheat Commission also provided shipping and thus saved the situation in Burma.

"The Hon'ble Member has referred to certain exports to Sweden which are supposed to have been used for the manufacture of spirits or starch. We have no information as to the purposes for which Sweden required rice, but I understand that the Allies undertook to facilitate the importation to Sweden of certain what were called rationed articles on condition that the Swedish Government would prohibit the export of these and similar articles to enemy countries. Under this arrangement the British Government were bound to supply Sweden with 12,000 tons of rice, and the Wheat Commissioner, therefore, instructed the Rice Commissioner to ship 6,000 tons in July 1918 and another 5,000 tons in December 1918. This, as I have said, was old crop rice which the Royal Commission had bought and which India did not want. None of the rice of the present year's crop, over which we exercise control, has been allowed to go to Sweden or any other country in Europe.

"The greater part, however, of our export of rice in the current year has been to Colonies, such as Ceylon, the Straits Settlements and Mauritius, which have a large Indian population. We have also allowed supplies to go to Arabia for the benefit of Indian pilgrims. The fact is there is a general shortage of rice supplies throughout Asia; and we are continually receiving urgent appeals for assistance. We have shut our ears to appeals from foreign countries, such as Japan and Java, which have no particular claim on India, but I hope the Council will agree that we were right in doing what we could for the Indians overseas, who would otherwise have suffered great hardship. In the case of Ceylon, the obligation was practically unavoidable because the starving labourers would probably have returned to Madras in large numbers if we had refused to let them have any rice.

"Besides conserving our supplies we have been able to supplement them by imports of wheat from Australia. Here, again, we are under an obligation to the Wheat Commission who sold us the wheat at cost price and arranged for freight also at cost price, which was considerably below market rates. We could not get as much shipping as we hoped for, but we have actually imported nearly 200,000 tons, and there are more shipments on the way. The effect of these importations has undoubtedly been to check the rise of wheat prices in India which were getting to dangerous heights. The accounts of these transactions have not yet been made up, but I think that our expenditure will be very nearly, if not quite, covered by our receipts from sales.

"As regards distribution our chief difficulty has been in getting shipping to carry rice from Burma to India, but this was surmounted by the efforts of Major Storey, the Shipping Controller, and we succeeded, moreover, in inducing the Shipping Companies to reduce their rates from Rs. 55 per ton, which was the rate prevailing from Rangoon to Bombay in December last, to Rs. 24 per ton, with corresponding reductions for other ports. I did not quite catch what the Hon'ble Mover said about the rate to Calcutta, but I understood him to say that it was only brought down by Rs. 2 a ton. The actual reduction was from Rs. 22 to Rs. 16 a ton. The Hon'ble Mr. Chanda suggested, I understand, that we should control these shipping rates. Well, I can only tell him that if you tried to do that, the ships would go somewhere else and you would get no rice at all. We have got these rates down as low as we could reasonably get the companies to bring them, and I am afraid there is not much prospect of getting them lower at present. Well, having got these ships, we were able to push in supplies to Bombay, where the situation a few months ago was very acute; Bombay now has ample supplies, and we are in a position to provide larger quantities for Bengal, where there has lately been a serious rise in rice prices, while, at the same time, continuing to meet the needs of Madras. I do not wish to belittle the hardships in Bengal and Assam (to which the Hon'ble Member has referred), but I would point out that they are of comparatively recent growth. The Punjab consumer has suffered from the high price of wheat practically from the beginning of the war. In Bengal, on the other hand, rice prices were so low up to the end of last year that they were a cause of serious anxiety. At the Conference of Registrars of Co-operative Societies held here in August last, the Bengal Registrar said that the solvency of many societies was endangered by the low prices of rice and jute, and in this Council, in September, the Hon'ble the Maharaja of Kasimbazar, as I reminded him the other day, called attention to the large surplus stocks of rice in Bengal and asked whether we could not do something to find a market for them. Even up to the 8th of July, i.e., about two months ago, the Director of Civil Supplies, Bengal, reported that there was no demand for Burma rice in Bengal, and that the Burma rice shops opened in Calcutta had definitely proved a failure. Possibly the rise in prices is now being felt more keenly in Bengal, because it has come so suddenly. I hope that the relief will be equally sudden and that the supplies which Mr. Innes is now pouring in from Burma both to Calcutta and Chittagong will effect a rapid change.

" I need not detain the Council with questions of internal distribution. Sir Claude Hill explained how the shortage of railway wagons forced us to exercise close control; how we tried to decentralise by letting Local Governments regulate movements of food-grains, from, to, and within, their own provinces; and how we soon found it necessary to curtail these powers in the interests of co-ordination. Our present aim is to relax internal control as soon as we can. The railway situation is better, and the food situation has been immensely improved by the present monsoon, which has so far been exceptionally good. We hope, therefore, that by the end of the year we shall be in a position to allow the internal trade in foodstuffs to resume its normal channels.

" I come now to prices. Some statistics lately published by Mr. Findlay Shirras show that the average rise in retail food prices at the five chief ports in India from July 1914 to the end of April 1919 was 57 per cent., whereas in Europe it ranged from 86 per cent. in Denmark to 234 per cent. in Sweden. In the United Kingdom notwithstanding food control it was 107 per cent. Now we all know that there has been a still further rise of prices in India since April last, and Mr. Shirras is working out some later figures. Meanwhile, I have had some rough statements prepared, showing by index numbers the course of the retail prices of four of the principal food-grains in all the major provinces excluding Burma. I lay these statements on the table as they may be of interest. They show that, if the figures for July 1919 are compared with those of July 1914, in the case of rice the rise ranged from 26 per cent. in Assam to 73 per cent. in the Central Provinces. In the case of wheat the lowest increase is 38 per cent. in Assam, and the highest 100 per cent. in the Central Provinces. Assam ought to be the most thankful province in this respect. But in the case of millets, which are so largely consumed by the poorer classes, the rise has been still more serious, and the increase in jawar prices ranged from 102 per cent. in the United Provinces to 132 per cent. in Bombay. As a matter of fact, the rise was really greater than this, because there was a poor kharif crop in Northern India in 1913, and the price of millets there, especially in the United Provinces, was above the normal in July 1914. Fortunately, the worst is over; a good kharif harvest in the greater part of India is practically assured, and the prices of jawar and bajra and other kharif grains are beginning to fall.

" As regards the measures by which we have attempted to check the rise in prices, it will be clear from what I have already said that we relied mainly on the policy of conserving supplies and increasing them where possible. We have also endeavoured to utilise our system of control for the purpose of reducing middlemen's profits, and Directors of Civil Supplies are authorised to make it a condition of importer's licenses that they shall sell at reasonable prices. For the rest, we have left it to Local Governments to see that the supplies that we have provided reach the consumer without undue intermediate profits. In most provinces, Local Governments have arranged for the opening of cheap grain shops with good results. I have more faith in these measures than in the plan, which has often been suggested, of fixing prices by Government order.

In the few cases where this has been tried in India, it has not, I believe, been successful. It is true that the populace of Lahore enjoyed a brief millenium under martial law, but I understand that the order fixing food prices there had the effect, which was to be expected, of preventing further supplies from coming in. It seems almost a pity that martial law was removed before we could see the results of this interesting experiment.

"In Burma, we have been able to enforce price control over the current year's rice crop by means of restrictions on export. No export of rice is allowed except under license, and it is a condition of all licenses that the rice must have been purchased at or below the control price. Subject to this condition and to strict rationing of exports, the trade has been left free—at least it was free until a short time ago—when stocks began to be held up, apparently by speculators who anticipated that, on the conclusion of peace, control would be relaxed. The Local Government was then compelled to exercise its powers under the Defence of India Rules. The control price was first fixed on a basis of Rs. 125 per 100 baskets of paddy, and was raised in May last to Rs. 150. These prices were above the average rates prevailing in previous years, and were calculated to give the producer a fair rate of profit. At the same time, they were considerably below the prices prevailing outside India. I have not been able to get complete statistics of prices in foreign markets, but I have obtained the following figures from the Rice Commissioner at Rangoon. He quotes the Rangoon prices for various qualities at from Rs. 6-12 to Rs. 8 a cwt., while the prices for similar qualities at Colombo range from Rs. 13 to 15. Small Mills Specials, which are Rs. 6-12 at Rangoon, are quoted at Rs. 14 in Java and at Saigon, at Rs. 15 in Siam, and at Rs. 18 a cwt. in Japan. The latest information furnished by Mr. Shirras is that the price at Tokyo is Rs. 21 a cwt. I understand that prices are controlled in some of these places or they would be still higher. For instance, I have heard that Ceylon recently had to pay £ 60 a ton c. i. f. for rice from Siam, i.e., at the present rate of exchange nearly Rs. 33 a cwt., an almost incredible price. It is clear then, as I have said, that our rice prices are considerably below world prices, and when we consider that India has imported 1,309,000 tons of rice and 64,000 tons of paddy from Burma from 1st January to the end of August 1919, it is evident that the scheme of rice control has been of enormous benefit to India. I should like to take this opportunity of paying a tribute to Mr. Gubbay, who conceived the scheme, and to Mr. Innes who has done so much to make it a success.

"We have now arrived at a rather curious position. In restricting exports we have adopted a policy which our predecessors always rejected as economically unsound. We were driven to this course by abnormal circumstances, but we recognise that, if we were to follow it as a permanent policy, the results which our predecessors feared would inevitably ensue. There are many other crops, of which it is sufficient to mention cotton, jute, and oilseeds, that compete with food-grains, and if India ceased to export those grains, the cultivators would cease to grow more than is required for home consumption. The one thing that has saved India from disaster in the present year is the fact that she normally exports food-grains. In this connection the statements which I have just laid on the table are significant as showing that the rise in the price of rice and wheat, of which we generally produce a surplus, has been distinctly less than in the case of bajra and jawar, of which there are hardly any exports. It is the surplus produced for export that provides India with a margin on which she can fall back in periods of scarcity. Without it, millions of human beings would periodically die of starvation. Our aim therefore must be sooner or later to bridge the gap between internal and external prices. It is possible that this object might be effected by raising still further the exchange value of the rupee. Although exporters complain of these changes as hampering foreign trade, there can be no doubt that raising exchange tends to lower internal prices. I do not think, however, we can usefully discuss this subject at present, as it is under consideration by an expert committee in London. I only mention it as a reason why we cannot immediately formulate our future policy.

"There are other reasons for circumspection. It is possible that world prices will come down to our levels, in which case we have only to sit tight. But, if they do not, and if we eventually have to rise to meet them, we must do all we can to graduate the process and let wages and salaries adjust themselves to the changed conditions before we settle down at a permanently higher level. If, therefore, speculators are holding on to stocks in the hope that our control of exports will shortly be removed, and that they will then scoop large profits, I would warn them that they are indulging in a vain dream. We know that there are stocks of rice in Burma and of wheat in the Punjab. It has already been announced that the rice control in Burma will be maintained till the next crop comes on to the market, and I take this opportunity of stating, for the benefit of holders of wheat, that we shall not withdraw the embargo on exports before the next harvest is reaped unless in the meantime there is a considerable drop in prices. In both cases, restrictions on exports will be maintained for a still further period, for a longer period if this proves necessary to keep down prices in India.

"I am afraid I have taken so long to deal with the question of foodstuffs that I have no time left to refer to any other commodities, and I must leave it to my Hon'ble Colleague in the Commerce and Industry Department to explain what has been done to reduce the price of cloth.

"It remains to indicate the attitude of the Government towards the Resolution. The terms in which it is couched rather suggest that we have done nothing to cope with the problem of high prices and ought to make an immediate move, whereas, I think, I have shown that we have done a good deal. I do not claim that we have worked any miracles. I do not say that we have not made mistakes. But I do claim that we have distributed the available food supplies equitably among the different provinces. We have brought down prices in one province, namely, Bombay, and have at least steadied them in many other provinces. I think that the Directors of Civil Supplies in the provinces will acknowledge that our system of food control has done much to mitigate the widespread distress. We cannot therefore accept the Resolution in its present form, but, if the Hon'ble Member will amend it so as to substitute for the words 'that immediate steps be taken' the words 'that the Government should consider whether any further steps can be taken', I shall be very pleased to accept it. We are fully alive to the hardships and dangers involved by high prices, and are only too glad to avail ourselves of non-official advice as to possible remedies.

"Before I sit down I would ask the Council to consider this subject in its broadest aspect, i.e., the effect of high prices on India as a whole. Consumers naturally dislike them and they cause much misery to thousands of people on small fixed incomes. But, from the point of view of the national balance sheet the question is simply one of profit and loss. If the rise is greater in the case of articles of which we produce a surplus than in the case of articles which we have to import, there will be a balance of gain to the country as a whole. There are indications that Indian trade has so far derived considerable benefit from the war. I lay on the table a statement showing her imports of bullion, absorption of rupees and net exports during the last ten years. This statement shows that in the five years, 1909-10 to 1913-14, the average annual absorption of rupees was 8·78 crores, while in the five years ending with 1918-19, the annual average was 22·08 crores. The balance of trade, as deduced from the excess of exports of merchandise over imports minus private imports of treasure and council bills, was against India in the first five-year period to the extent of 23 lakhs per annum, whereas in the five war years the balance in India's favour averaged 20·90 crores per annum. These figures were of course affected by some other factors: for instance, the absorption of rupees was stimulated by the shortage of imports of gold, while the balance of trade may be disturbed by the transfer of funds from India to London or vice versa. But the figures raise at any rate a strong presumption that India has been enriched by the war.

"If these results continue, if there is a permanent rise in the value of India's products, which are mostly derived from the soil, without a corresponding increase in the cost of her imports, the future may be regarded as hopeful. In the process of transition to a different standard of values there is bound to be hardship to many individuals; but as soon as adjustment has been effected between wages and prices, these troubles will be more than counterbalanced by the increased margin of profit to the cultivator. In the past the poverty of the agricultural classes has been the chief obstacle to the spread of education and the introduction of improved methods of cultivation. If the profits of the cultivator are increased, he will be able to afford better education and better methods, and these in turn will still further raise his income and his standard of living. I do not say that these results will ensue. It is impossible to predict the future course of prices, but from the figures that I have just quoted, it seems at least permissible to hope that some good may come to India out of the cataclysm which has brought so much suffering on the world."

The Council then adjourned to Tuesday, the 16th September, 1919, at 11 A.M.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

(5 & 6 Geo. V, Ch. 61.)

The Council met at the Council Chamber, Viceregal Lodge, Simla, on Tuesday, the 16th September, 1919.

PRESENT :

The Hon'ble SIR GEORGE LOWNDES, K.C.S.I., K.C., Vice-President, presiding, and 50 Members, of whom 44 were Additional Members.

RESOLUTION re HIGH PRICES OF NECESSARY ARTICLES OF FOOD AND CLOTH—(Contd).

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"The Council will proceed with the discussion of the Resolution from yesterday."

The Hon'ble Nawab Saiyed Nawab Ali Chaudhri:—"Sir, I beg to associate myself with the Resolution which has been moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda. In doing so, I am impelled by a strong sense of duty. The distress of the people has really been appalling, and Eastern Bengal has perhaps been the worst sufferer. All the articles of food, as well as those other things, which nobody can do without, have been selling at famine prices. Sir, it will be no exaggeration to say that many people are going with only one meal a day. Indeed instances are not rare in which people are reported to have died of starvation or to have committed suicide through pangs of hunger. The prices are rising, as it were, by leaps and bounds. If nothing is done to check their rising tendency immediately, the situation will undoubtedly become worse. Already we have heard of several cases of hât-looting in the Barrackpore and Serampore Sub-divisions of Bengal. The Englishman newspaper to hand reports many cases of paddy looting in the districts of Midnapur, Howrah and Hooghly. The said paper also publishes reports of similar occurrences in such well-known villages near about Calcutta as Naihati, Jagatdal, Champdany, Gourhati, Rishra, Bally and Sheoraphuly.

"A number of hungry people, according to an Associated Press report, recently raided the Kanaksar Post Office in the Dacca District. The man frankly said that they wanted money as they had been starving for four days. Fortunately the assailants were arrested before they could get hold of the money in the iron safe. The Government cannot but put down such acts of lawlessness with a firm hand, but true statesmanship demands that the root causes of these disorders, which are purely economic, should be removed before it is too late. In some cases offenders have openly admitted that they preferred jail life to starvation at home. This, Sir, is a serious state of things in all conscience. I can quite understand that the problem is beset with difficulties and cannot be solved as easily as we might desire; but the Government should leave no stone unturned to ease the situation. By controlling exports, facilitating imports, reducing freights, regulating prices and putting an immediate stop to profiteering, matters may considerably be improved. I am convinced, Sir, that profiteering has been the worst feature of the situation. It is intolerable that a number of unscrupulous traders should take advantage of the present helplessness of the people and make phenomenal profits at their cost.

"I was gratified to learn from the speech delivered in Council yesterday by the Hon'ble Mr. Mant that Government have taken steps in the matter. I welcome the assurance that the problem is engaging their serious attention. But the fact remains that the distress is becoming more acute and wide-spread every day. I do not say that Government have done nothing, but the question is, whether the steps taken so far have been sufficient. The supply of Burma rice in the Bengal districts has not been either adequate or prompt. This view is supported by statements that have appeared in the Press. The Dacca 'Herald' points out in a recent issue that, while the average daily consumption in the city of Dacca alone is nearly 1,500 maunds, the total supply of Burma rice during a week has been only about 5,500 maunds. So the supply is not sufficient to last the city more than four days, and there is nothing for the rest of the district. Almost the same story is repeated from Mymensingh and Barisal. If ample allotments are made for each particular district, on the basis of a liberal calculation of the requirements of every sub-division, thana or village, and if these allotments are promptly imported into the locality, scarcity will be relieved and the upward course of prices checked. Government should, if necessary, commandeer steamers and other transport for speedy carriage of Burma rice.

"The Hon'ble Mr. Mant has referred to a question asked by the Hon'ble Maharaja of Kasimbazar last year, in which it was assumed that Bengal had a large exportable surplus. I doubt very much whether this optimistic assumption on the Maharaja's part is in accord with facts. I desire to know if it is a fact that upon an average calculation of the last few years, Bengal had to import more rice than she exported, which would go to show that she cannot depend upon her own produce for her internal requirements. If this is so, how can Bengal be stated to have an exportable surplus in any of these years? At any rate, the low prices of rice last year cannot justify export on such a large scale as has been made.

"The Hon'ble Mr. Chanda's Resolution deals only with articles of food and cloth, but there is at least one thing which he apparently forgets to mention and which is no less in demand by all sections of the people. I refer to Kerosine oil. I have ascertained on inquiry that the price of this indispensable commodity has so long been kept up only through sheer profiteering. It is needless for me to multiply instances. The whole matter is too well known to His Excellency's Government to be dilated upon.

"I feel no hesitation in asserting that the serious economic crisis with which we are faced to-day, should have precedence over all other matters engaging the attention of Government and the leaders of public opinion. We should have no rest or peace of mind until we have arrived at a satisactory solution of the economic difficulties which beset us to-day. I hope and trust that your Excellency's Government will rise to the height of the occasion and save His Majesty's Indian subjects by all manner of means. Before I resume my seat I would request my friend the Hon'ble Mover of the Resolution to accept the suggestions made by the Hon'ble Mr. Mant."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi:— 11-10 A.M. "Sir, I come from a Province whose smiling fields and ample granary were almost proverbial at one time, but which is now enveloped by the dark shadow of famine. There has not been such acute and widespread distress in Bengal within living memory. Apart from the suffering which we see about us everywhere, one cannot open the newspapers without coming across doleful accounts of the distress, all of which cannot certainly be exaggerated. Privation has led to disease and death, and cases of suicide and even of abandonment of children by mothers are reported. Driven to desperation by hunger, people have already begun to break the bounds of law. They are courting imprisonment which saves them from starvation. Sir, the situation is getting more and more grave in Bengal, and Government should take immediate steps to grapple with it.

"The high prices are, no doubt, to a certain extent, one of the unwelcome legacies left by the war, and are a world problem. As pointed out by the Hon'ble Mr. Mant yesterday, the unprecedented destruction and waste, coupled with an unusual inflation of currency, must be recognised to be among the factors making for a rise in prices. But we cannot refer to these world factors, without being reminded, at the same time, of the enormous efforts which the different countries of the world are putting forth for bringing down prices and easing the situation. A very complete system of control over food-supplies was introduced by the allied Nations in Europe and America during the war, and we have recently seen drastic legislation passed, after the termination of the war, to prevent profiteering. But what has been the case in India? I shall let the 'Pioneer' answer this question. In an editorial note, it wrote thus on the 11th July last:—

> 'There has been far too much observable hitherto of a tendency to keep within the limits of so-called sound economic dogma, and too little of the propensity to meet the demands of an unparalleled situation with measures of an equally novel character. Britain during the war has tried many strange experiments in rationing and fixing prices which in normal times would never have had a chance of being tried; and it is to the success of these experiments that Britain has owed the power of endurance she displayed in the latter stages of the struggle with the Central Empires. In India, authority has been chary about embarking on any policy of 'thorough,' and so while there has been nominally food control and 'direction' of supplies, prices have continued to soar upwards and profiteering has flourished.'

"This, Sir, is the considered opinion of a very sober and responsible Journal to which Government are expected to attach some weight. The essential objects of food control in England, as stated by a writer in the 'Edinburgh Review,' of January 1918, have been these:—

(1) to stimulate home production and maintain imports,
(2) to prevent the exploitation of war conditions by private greed, and
(3) to secure for each member of the community equal opportunities of obtaining the available supplies.

These were the objects for which Lord Rhondda strove with a large amount of success in England.

"The whole business of importing and of wholesale distribution was taken over by the State, the firms engaged in the business were made agents of Government at fixed rates of remuneration, maximum retail prices were fixed, the profits of the middlemen were reduced to a minimum. Consumption was also controlled, economies in food consumption effected on scientific principles, and national kitchens set up for cheap supply of food. Bread was artificially cheapened, with the result that the one pound loaf which would cost one shilling one penny, was made available at 9½ pence, and this entailed on the State an annual burden varying between 4 and 5 crore pounds sterling by way of subsidy to the Millers. While this was the case in England, the United States of America, under Mr. Hoover's supervision, laboured, as stated in the 'Times,' 'to increase production and to promote conservation,' and succeeded in stabilizing the price of wheat; all speculation either in wheat or flour was eliminated and the margin of profit to Millers was reduced to the minimum commensurate with maintaining the plants in a state of efficiency and perpetuating the industry. By these means was America enabled not only to avert food trouble at home, but also to feed the Allied Nations in Europe to a great extent.

"Can it be said, Sir, that the present system of control in India has attempted even a fraction of what was accomplished in England and America? In the first place, we find on a reference to the published statistics that there has not been any appreciable increase in the home production of foodgrains during these few years; yet we had, as a matter of solemn duty, to supply a considerable quantity of food grains to Europe and Africa during the war. Perhaps we have exported food beyond our means, and this, coupled with a partial failure of crops last year, has been certainly responsible to some extent for the prevailing scarcity and high prices. The Burma rice crop, which is our only hope now, was not also normal last year, and there are heavy demands for it from overseas. There are not, moreover, adequate arrangements ensuring a sufficient supply of Burma rice everywhere in the country.

"Next, as to prevention of profiteering, I am constrained to observe that Government have done very little, so far as Bengal at least is concerned. From my little experience, I can say that the prices of rice could not have gone up so much if the authorities had interfered in time. Then, as regards the securing of bare necessaries of life to every member of the community, there does not appear to have been any serious attempt in this direction except in respect of areas where famine has been formally declared to prevail, and there also in regard only to those in receipt of direct relief. No provision has been made, in Bengal at least, for relieving the middle classes and persons having fixed low incomes, who are in the greatest misery and are yet loth to seek charity. But for the supply of Burma rice under license, which again has been very much belated in the case of Bengal, Government could not claim to have taken definite action by way of affording general relief against the high prices of foodstuffs in my province. And in this matter also, only half measures have so far been adopted in Bengal. As I have said, it was not till comparatively recently that Bengal was allowed to import Burma rice under license for her own domestic consumption. When these supplies arrived, Government fixed only the wholesale rates at which certain licensed importers would be allowed to sell the rice in Calcutta. There has been no dependable arrangement under which this rice would be available in sufficient quantities and at regulated prices everywhere in the Muffasil where the distress is the acutest. From a statement made by the Local Government in the Bengal Legislative Council on the 3rd September last, it would appear that Burma rice is available only in seven districts of Bengal. In some of these places, again, there is not an adequate or continuous supply. I myself had recently to obtain a consignment of Burma rice for free distribution among my tenants. It arrived after a month of my ordering it and after a good deal of difficulty.

"A leading citizen of Bengal, writing from the Muffasil on the 4th September, says as follows :—

> 'The District Board have been trying to supply Burma rice at cost price. The other day they bought 9,500 maunds in Calcutta but only 900 (nine hundred) maunds have reached here, meanwhile the clamour is deafening.'

"The Muffasil newspapers also make similar complaints, showing that the arrangements for the supply and carriage of Burma rice leave very much to be desired. In one instance, it is pointed out that the only supply during the week, which was not sufficient, came in steamers owned by an Indian Company, there being apparently no priority given to it by the European Steamer Companies.

"Sir, I understand that a good deal more has been done by way of relieving the distress in Bombay, Madras, Bihar and Orissa and certain other areas, than in Bengal. In several Native States, rice has been artificially cheapened at the cost of the Durbars. I fail to see why Government should not provide, on their own responsibility, for the retail sale of Burma rice throughout the interior of the country at fixed prices. I quite appreciate their difficulty in regard to fixing prices of indigenous rice over whose source of supply they have no control. But if the authorities were to import Burma rice in sufficient quantities, make arrangements for its sale in every town and every important village, and fix its price at every stage, it will have a stabilizing effect on the rice market generally and tend to lower prices of the indigenous stuffs as well. Greater transport facilities should also be secured for Burma rice, the freight from Rangoon to India further reduced, and local consignments permitted to be carried by rail and inland steamers at concession rates. And if, as a condition of reduction of freight Government have to pay subsidies to the carrying firms, I trust Government will ungrudgingly bear the burden.

"Sir, so far we have suffered many of the disadvantages of a system of control, without benefiting by its merits. The evils of partial control have been described by Mr. Clynes, then Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Food, who made the following statement in the House of Commons on the 16th August, 1917 :—

> 'We are but now erecting machinery for carrying out very big schemes relating to food supply and food control. The schemes involve, in regard to many important foods, the fixing of prices at every stage. It has been found that failure, so far as failure can be discovered, in the case of Germany and other countries, has arisen largely from partial control, and from not having fixed prices at every stage for commodities handled and sold by those who are in the business.'

"I hope, Sir, the warning given by Mr. Clynes against partial control will not be lost upon Government, in connection with their schemes for the supply of Burma rice.

"To add to the difficulties brought about by the rice situation there is the intense suffering caused by the abnormally high prices of cloth. I beseech Government to take immediate and effective steps for making Burma rice and standardised cloth available to every man, woman, and child at reasonable prices. If Government fail to rise to the occasion, I shudder to think of the consequences.

"With these remarks, I support the Resolution which has been moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda."

11-25 A.M. The Hon'ble Mr. A. H. Ley:—"Sir, I have been asked to say a few words on the subject of cloth, which figures prominently in the text of the Hon'ble Member's Resolution. I listened very carefully to his speech when he introduced the Resolution, but I am bound to say I did not even hear the word mentioned the whole time he was speaking. It may be said then, that it is superfluous for me to mention the subject. But I do think it is a matter of some importance, and that the question ought to be ventilated and ought not to be passed over entirely in silence. That, Sir, is my only apology for addressing the Council.

"I confess that I came to the Council yesterday with a sense of anxious expectation, hoping that, from the words of wisdom which I expected to fall from the Hon'ble Mover's lips, some constructive proposals, some concrete suggestions, might be gleaned. But I had not listened for more than two minutes when I realised that my hopes were going to be dashed to the ground. I think the Hon'ble Member started by saying . . . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Will the Hon'ble Member kindly speak up."

The Hon'ble Mr. A. H. Ley:—"I think the Hon'ble Member started by saying that he did not propose to go into details, he was not going to make any definite suggestions, and, in fact, I think he said he did not know anything about the economic side of the question, but that his intention was merely to draw attention to the height of prices. I certainly sympathise with him. The question is an extremely difficult one, but I think its main features can be expressed fairly simply and fairly shortly. The case of cloth is, to my mind, exactly the opposite, in one aspect at any rate, to the case of foodstuffs, with which the Hon'ble Mr. Mant has dealt. In the case of foodstuffs India is an exporting country, that is to say, she produces normally speaking more than she consumes; the opposite is the case with cloth. Her production of cloth, although considerable, is only about half her requirements. It is quite true that she does export a certain amount of piece-goods to Persia, Arabia and neighbouring markets, but the proportion of her exports to her total production is so small that, even if you did restrict the export of piece-goods, I think it is extremely doubtful whether such a measure would have the smallest effect upon internal prices. Possibly the only result would be that you would lose an opportunity of developing what is after all a promising market without any compensation at all. However, to return from that point to my main point, I think the mere fact that India is an importing country in the matter of cloth renders any Government attempt at interference with the normal laws which govern prices more difficult and more dangerous than it would be in the case of a commodity which India exports in large quantities It is to my mind obvious that it is impossible to maintain for any length of time internal prices in India out of all their normal relations with external prices, that is to say, with world's prices, without checking the flow of imports,—that is to say, without doing precisely what it should be your object to avoid, increasing and accentuating the shortage of supplies. It is the shortage of supplies which is the crux of the whole situation; it is the shortage of supplies, which is the profiteers' opportunity. Well, I think in circumstances of this kind, Government can hardly take measures other than purely temporary and partial palliatives. And this they have done, or have attempted to do, by the passing of the Cotton Cloth Act in this Council last year, and by the manufacture of standard cloth. As long as the Cotton Cloth Act is on the Statute-book,—and, as far as I know, there is no intention at present of repealing it,—Government can compel manufacturers in this country to manufacture and sell to Government a certain proportion of the product of their looms at prices which preclude profiteering; and they can, with greater or less success, effect the distribution of that cloth among the classes which they wish to reach. But my point is that this can only be done, and is only intended to be done, on a very limited scale and to a very limited extent. If you widen the scale or if you increase the extent, you run up against the danger which I have endeavoured to explain, namely, of ultimately merely accentuating the shortage of supplies.

"Well, I need not go into what has been actually done under the Cloth Act; it will be unnecessary to take up the time of the Council by mentioning these details. But I think that, broadly speaking, it can fairly be said that the mere passing of the Act and the exercise of control which the Act conveyed was one of the factors,—not by any means the sole or principal factor, but it was one of the factors,—which brought down the price of cloth from over Rs. 3 a pound last year to Rs. 1-5 a pound. It is quite true that after the slump prices began to stiffen a bit, they rose again somewhat, I think, about the end of April or the beginning of May last; after that they remained fairly steady, but for the last two or three weeks there has been a well-marked and welcome falling off in prices. The downward movement may have been largely caused, or if not largely caused, at any rate largely assisted by the rise in exchange. I will not go into the exchange question at present, but I think it can fairly be said now that the present wholesale prices of Indian cloth are not unreasonable, when the price of cotton is taken into consideration; and as a matter of fact the margin between the price of standard cloth manufactured under the Cotton Cloth Act and the price of ordinary cloth is now so narrow, and has been so narrow for some time past, that the manufacture of standard cloth is at present in abeyance. I think also it can be said that the operations of Mr. Noyce, the Controller of Cotton Cloth, and of the various provincial Controllers in those provinces which indented for standard cloth, have on the whole been very successful. In fact, in two provinces their operations were so successful in reducing prices of cloth in the districts that the Local Governments concerned experienced considerable embarrassment and difficulty in retailing their stocks, and at the present moment they hold large stocks of standard cloth sufficient to last them several months. As far as the Hon'ble Mover's own province, Assam, is concerned, all I can say is that all the indents that Assam has made for standard cloth have been complied with up to date, and arrangements have been made to meet future indents from the surplus stocks which at present exist in the province of Bihar and Orissa.

"My only object in making these remarks, Sir, is to try and show that the Government have not been sitting idly doing nothing; they have tried to tackle what everybody admits to be an extremely difficult question. But they are not like a surgeon who can cut out the root of the disease with the knife; all that they can do is, to administer temporary palliatives till the fever subsides in the normal course. History repeats itself in this matter. It is always the case that wages are slow to respond to prices; they do respond, and they will respond, in the long run, but the interval is always a period of distress and suffering. I do not want my remarks to be taken as in any sense in opposition to the Hon'ble Mover's Resolution, or to the object which he seeks to attain. Far from it. I am only trying to point out that there are difficulties, and I am quite sure that any suggestions which the Hon'ble Member or anybody else has to make which can be reasonably expected to mitigate the evil without involving a remedy worse than the disease, will be unreservedly welcomed by every member of this Council."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"May I ask, Sir, if Government has made any efforts to stimulate the production of cotton in this country and, if so, what?"

The Hon'ble Mr. A. H. Ley :—"I think that is a question, Sir, for the Revenue and Agriculture Department, the question of cotton cultivation. But I believe it has been done."

11-38 A.M. The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur :—"Sir, I have every sympathy with the spirit of the Resolution. My heart goes out in deep sympathy to my distressed countrymen in their present sufferings due to the abnormally high prices of foodstuffs. Whoever heard of such unprecedentedly-high prices of rice as Rs. 13 or Rs. 14 a maund, as were prevailing in the districts of Dacca and Mymensing only a short time ago? When in 1897 and 1898 prices of rice went up to 6 or 7 rupees a maund, it was called the greatest famine of the century, and numerous meetings—large and small—were held throughout the country to raise money for relieving the distress of the people. But when to-day the prices are more than double, we are still apathetic and indifferent to the sufferings of our countrymen and have hitherto done very little, nay nothing, to relieve their sufferings! But that is another story. What we are now really concerned with is, whether we should approach the Government and ask them to artificially reduce prices of foodstuffs. Is this possible or is this desirable? I must state at the very outset that I have every sympathy with the Resolution that the price of foodstuffs should be reduced. But is this possible? Is this desirable? There can be no question that it would be a great blessing if something could be done which would have the effect of bringing down the prices of foodstuffs. Admitting for the sake of argument that it could be done, would it have the desired effect? Would it not have a contrary effect? I may here point out that the policy to control the price of rice has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. In two districts of Bengal, namely, Dacca and Mymensing, an attempt was made by Government to control the price of rice with the result that Mahajans refused to import rice and the market price went further up.

"A policy of interference with the free movement of food grains and an attempt to control their price might have disastrous effects on the consumers. A policy of non-interference hitherto pursued has led traders to freely move rice and other foodstuffs from one place to another as necessity demanded. A contrary policy would surely prevent Mahajans from exporting or importing foodgrains from one place to another according to the exigencies of the times. Once the policy of artificially controlling prices of articles of commerce were followed and adopted, it would be difficult to define to what articles alone such artificial reduction of prices should be confined: In my humble opinion it would be laying a very dangerous precedent. Jute is a monopoly of the Bengal rayots. It is their chief income—it is the chief means of living of the cultivating classes in many districts of Bengal. Even in this present difficulty with the high prices of jute continuing, the jute cultivators did not fare so badly, i.e., did not feel the effect of the high prices so much as the other classes of people. Now if the price of jute were to go above rupees 20, as it actually did only a short time ago, what would prevent my esteemed friend the Hon'ble Mr. Crum and other jute-mill owners from approaching His Excellency the Governor of Bengal and asking him to reduce the price of jute from Rs. 20 to Rs. 8 or Rs. 10? If such a course were followed would not a hue-and-cry be raised against the Government that they are going to sacrifice the rayots in the interest of the mill-owners? Even without artificially controlling the prices of rice the present high tension could be eased in different other ways and by different other means. In my opinion if the export of rice from Bengal had been prohibited earlier, or if the import of rice from Burma had not been restricted or even if so many restrictions had not been imposed, i.e., if there had been a free import of rice from Burma or if facilities had been given by way of tonnage or shipping for transport of rice from Burma then, I take the liberty to assert that the prices of rice could not have risen so much. From my little experience I can say that at the present moment there is not a sufficient stock of rice in Bengal. The only factors which can reduce the prices of rice are to do away with all artificial restrictions, to abolish the post of Controller of Civil Supplies—though I have nothing to complain against the present holder of the post,— to allow a free import of rice from Burma into India and to provide facilities for transport of Rangoon rice. Why, the market has already eased down to some extent as soon as it has become known that large imports of rice are coming from Burma? I could cite several concrete cases to show how unnecessary restrictions have prevented generous minded people from buying Burma rice for relieving the sufferings of the distressed people. However, without dilating further on the subject, if all unnecessary restrictions imposed were immediately removed and the several posts created for controlling the movement of foodstuffs were abolished, and if free import of rice from Burma were allowed and the import not confined to four firms in Calcutta—three European and one Indian—I say the market would automatically go down as it has already done to some extent.

"We are thankful to Government for what they have done. But, unless further measures are adopted to bring down prices, the sufferings of the people will be more terrible and may lead to more food riots and serious loss of life. Already there are dark clouds gathering on the horizon and my Hon'ble friend Mr. Chanda has referred to several cases of looting in Bengal. I, therefore, urge the necessity of adopting further measures to relieve the distress due to abnormally high prices."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"Sir, we are indebted to the Hon'ble Mr. Mant for the admirable exposition of the Government case on this very important question, which has been engaging the attention of the Government and the people so seriously of late. It has been rightly said that this question is of far more importance to India than even the question of reform, than the question of currency, than in fact any other question that can engage the attention of the Government of India, and this, I can assert, is the case from my personal experience of what is going on in my province and from what may be adduced from the figures supplied by the Government themselves. The Hon'ble Member very rightly commented on the world causes which have brought about the present situation; I quite appreciate the object with which he has done so. I shall also imitate him for this purpose that we are not so much concerned with the past, but with what has to be done in the immediate present and in the immediate future. The question is not whether we shall be able to improve industries in the remote future, but whether the Agricultural Department will be able to increase the food production, whether we can reduce prices, whether we can bring sufficient food within the reach and ability of the people to buy so as to ease the situation. The question is what is the Government to do in order to improve the condition of the vast masses of the people of India? Now the currency situation in foreign countries was alluded to and the growth of prices in foreign countries. If I refer to this it is only for the purpose of showing that there is no chance of any mitigation of the situation in the near future. We find that last year it was stated that currency in belligerent countries was increased five-fold; it rose from 935 millions to 5,438 millions. The gold at the back of this currency has dropped from 63 per cent. to 37 and 20 per cent and even lower. It might take ten years or more to enable the gold production to supply the needs, to go back to the normal conditions. The inflation of prices due to the currency will continue for 11-45 A.M.

some time, although the effect would be mitigated by increased production of foodstuffs throughout the world. We in India fortunately are better situated from the currency point of view than other countries. We have a rupee to back up every rupee note issued, we have a metallic backing. The problem for the Government is how to prevent an increase in prices in India proportionately to what obtains elsewhere without a corresponding increase in wages in India. That is the real situation. The Hon'ble Mr. Mant has alluded to the increase in prices in foreign countries, but we see clearly that it is largely due to this artificial inflation of currency. People have got this artificial money and consequently the percentage of increases is not greater than the increased wages in England, for instance. There has been issued a parliamentary return last August, this shows that there has been an increase of nearly 100 per cent. in some, more in other industries in wages and 100 per cent. in food prices approximately. Therefore, the British workman has not been so hard hit as the Indian workman, because I venture to say that wages here have not gone up in proportion to the increase in prices. My first proposition is that at the lowest estimate there are at least 50 million people in India who are able to procure only one meal or half rations and some are actually starving. On what data do I make that statement? Taking the figures furnished by the Department I find turning to page 15 of the Appendix A of the Foodstuffs Committee, it has been computed that there is an average annual consumption per head of 4·9 maunds in rice-using areas and 5·6 on other diet, i.e., it is one and one-tenth and 1$\frac{3}{10}$ pound per day per head. We find on page 19 that the actual estimates for Calcutta, Bombay, Madras and Karachi are much higher, for Calcutta they are 1·83, Bombay 1·4, for Karachi 1·35 and for Madras 1·48. I shall take the lower estimate for the purpose of my calculations and will take a family at five persons; we have 48 million households with a total population of 244 millions. As non-wage earners we may take children below 10 and some from 10 to 15 and men over 60. According to this we find that a family of five would require to pay at least 12½ annas for rice alone, at 3½ seers per rupee which obtains in some districts and 10 annas at 4½ seers, on other diet, 8 annas 8 pies at 6 seers. Well, the wages are not more than 4, 3 and 2 annas and 1½ annas in many places, and these are stated to be for unskilled labour. If we look at the figures given for the year 1916 wages have risen after 1916, but by no means can the rise be said to bear any proportion to the rise in prices. We find there that even if the whole family members were to work, they cannot make more than 10 or 11 annas in many parts of the country, and we have to reduce that figure by at least 1-6th or 1-7th for the non-working days. If we do that, then their income does not average more than 8 annas for the whole household, whereas they have to pay at least 8½ annas to 12½ annas for foodstuffs alone, to keep body and soul together, let alone their expense for fuel, oil, housing, clothing and other things. If we deduct the latter expenditure, and even without doing so, in many cases, the earnings are insufficient to procure a full meal. Therefore, Sir, I think that would substantiate my statement that a very large number of unskilled labourers and poorer agriculturists and so on, have only one meal a day or live only on half rations. I estimate that about 40 to 50 millions drag on a miserable existence or are on semi-starvation. I include under this head of about 40 to 50 millions the following classes :—

Farm servants and field labourers	32·4
Domestic servants	3 4
Insufficiently described	6·5
Industries connected with refuse	1·1
Beggars	2·2
Shepherds	2·7
Fishing and hunting	1·5
Rice fields	1·8

"Now these would come to more than 50 millions, and I think we shall have to include the smaller pattedars who also practically come under labourers. Well, if we take all these classes into account, the figures will swell enormously, and there is the growth, however small, of the population since 1911.

"I think, therefore, Sir, that my statement that about 40 to 50 millions of people are on semi-starvation rations cannot be challenged. In view of the figures that I have quoted, can you say that the average income of a family is more than Rs. 180 or Rs. 200 ? and according to these figures you would require at least that much, if not Rs. 360 for foodstuffs alone, let alone ghee, pulses and other things. Therefore, Sir, I hope that the Government will inquire into this question as to whether concomitantly with the large growth of wealth in presidency-towns and elsewhere of particular classes including the industrial classes, concomitantly with such growth, there is not a vast body of people in this country who are on the verge of starvation to-day. I had to verify this when I had gone to one or two districts of my own presidency, and what did I find ? I found a large concourse of people gathered about the riceshops, fishermen and coolies, people from all classes, some very much emaciated, and I was asked by a fisherman at one gathering 'why not shoot us, why make us lead this lingering death.' I went to another village, a suburb of a town, and there I heard a story of a family, of which two died of semi-starvation because they could not get sufficient rice or food to eat, and they ate some rotten vegetables that grow in the swampy soil and rotten fish, crabs. The same was the case in the mofussil; to my surprise, I found that we could get women labourers for 1½ annas a day, and rice was selling at prices ranging from 3½ seers to 5 and a young woman belonging to the agriculturist class in somewhat affluent circumstances not long ago came to me and said 'Oh, I had no food at all for two or three days' and begged for food for her little child. I therefore submit, Sir, that the position is very critical not merely in Bengal but in other districts of India also. I was therefore sorry to find in His Excellency the Viceroy's opening speech as well as in the statement made by the Hon'ble Mr. Mant an optimistic tone running through it. I do not say that the Government should lose heart, but I think they should realise the full situation and also tell the plain facts to the people so that they may realise what the situation is.

"Then allusion has been made to the fact that the number of men on Famine Works is small, but I would ask whether the wages that are paid to them according to the Famine Code are a living wage. I do not complain very much about these men not being able to find sufficient work for themselves, for there is generally work to be found especially after the immense mortality of last year, but it need not be surprising if there is no readiness to go to the famine camp, where the wages are no better if not lower than elsewhere. The point is that though the prices of foodstuffs have increased enormously, the wages of labourers have not increased proportionately, and millions of people cannot earn a living wage. If that is the situation, what has to be done immediately ? I have alluded to the fact that the Hon'ble Mr. Mant was perfectly right in saying that we cannot cease to control to a certain extent the movement of these foodstuffs unless we see what the relation of prices of various articles in this country is with reference to those in foreign countries. I admit that in ordinary circumstances it would be wrong to control foodstuffs, the export of foodstuffs, especially as such a rule would affect prejudicially Burma. But I would ask the Burmese people to remember that we in the past have helped them considerably, that Indian labour goes largely to improve the Burmese conditions, and therefore they should not grudge a little sacrifice even if that were necessary.

"But, Sir, I would respectfully submit that the internal distribution of the foodstuffs as between India and Burma and as between the several provinces should, as far as possible, be allowed to run free. More than one Hon'ble Member has alluded to his own presidency. In these days when we are talking of a United India, of a Federal India, I think we should rise above these petty considerations of province, district and town, and I do not think any Hon'ble Member of this Council would be justified in pleading the cause of his own presidency to the exclusion of other provinces and districts. Therefore, we shall have to see the interests of India as a whole, and I would advocate most earnestly the free movement of foodstuffs throughout India and the removal of restrictions on the conveyance of foodstuffs, and of placing additional facilities by the Railway Department at the hands of the distributors of foodstuffs. I know that it is a bitter complaint everywhere that it is the Railway Department that is partly responsible for this unequal distribution of foodstuffs especially when freights are so high. The department may have had very good excuses during the war that wagons were urgently needed for the carriage of coal and so on, but there is no doubt that the Railway Department is responsible to a certain extent, or at any rate they have not discharged their responsibilities to the extent desirable.

"In one place it is 6 seers, in another place 4½, in another place 3½, not far from one another . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"Will the Hon'ble Member give any instances of these delinquencies on the part of railways? Will he give me a definite instance?"

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I cannot charge particular officers with corruption or delay. I know as a matter of fact that high officers of Government (I do not wish to allude to it here because I do not know whether the officers authorise me) have said that they find considerable difficulty in getting railway wagons. Latterly the position has been considerably eased because the Railway Department has been in communication with the Directors of Supplies and tried to do what it could. Sir, I would submit that I am not impeaching the conduct of the highest officers of the country, but I would ask the Hon'ble Member to remember that he has a number of subordinate officers who have virtually in their hands the distribution of these wagons, Station Masters and others, who, according to public report, have been making immense sums of money in recent years . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"Can the Hon'ble Member give one single instance of the imputation he has made?"

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I can mention it to the Hon'ble Member in private and I cannot disclose the names unless I have the authority of the officers concerned. But I think inasmuch as the Hon'ble Member has asked me, I shall try to meet him at the earliest possible date on this question . . . .

The Vice-President:—"I would suggest to the Hon'ble Member that he has already exceeded his 15 minutes and ask him to bring his remarks to a close."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I would ask therefore for these proposals to be taken into consideration. I would beg, I would implore, the Government to consider whether they cannot increase their irrigational activity and public works activity, and increase the wages they allow to unskilled labour so as to set an example to the provinces and raise wages throughout the country. I would ask them to give their employees as well as others a living wage notwithstanding that it may cause additional taxation. I would ask that special facilities may be placed by the Agricultural Department for the provision of capital for the improvement of land. I would ask that no provincial restrictions be continued, though control as between India, Burma and other countries would have to be kept for some time longer, and I would ask that there should be no further inflation of the currency unless it is necessary in order to bring this country up to a level with other countries. With regard to cloth, I would ask that, if the agriculturist is reaping large profits by exporting his cotton instead of the cotton going to manufacturers in India at a reasonable price, so as to enable them to supply cloth at reasonable rates, it may be desirable to impose an export duty, not otherwise. And I would ask that special facilities be given to manufacturers to enable them to improve their mills and to get machinery, and possibly import duties may be removed in respect of the machinery. I do not think there is any other way of improving the situation in regard to cloth."

The Hon'ble Chaudhri Muhammad Ismail Khan :—" Sir, yesterday the Hon'ble Mr. Mant discussed the causes of the high prices at some length and referred to certain world factors. I do not think these have more than an academic interest now, and may be safely left to the economists to deal with. Whatever the reasons may be, there is an abnormal rise in the prices of necessaries, and means must be found to bring them down. Government claim that they are doing a good deal in this matter. So far as can be seen, beyond arranging for a supply of Burma rice they have done little in Bengal. In Bihar and Orissa, however, Government have all along been anxiously striving to alleviate distress in various ways. But in Bengal, the authorities are mainly concerned with the manufacture of excuses for inaction. They have so long followed a policy of drift. Though I represent the Muhammadans of Bihar and Orissa in this Council, I happen to be the Chairman of the District Board of Backerganj in Bengal. And I may say that we could have made satisfactory and early arrangements for the cheap supply of food-grains throughout the jurisdiction of the District Board, if Government gave us financial aid in time and granted other facilities. Now that much precious time has been lost, the District Board have been permitted in Barisal to import Burma rice 5,500 maunds for sale at cost price. But we have not as yet succeeded in getting more than a small fraction of the quantity which has been allotted to us. So the control system must be improved. It seems to be assumed by Government that cultivators derive some benefit from the rise in prices. From an intimate knowledge of at least one district of Bengal, I can say that this is far from truth. The cultivators have long parted with their old stocks, and it is the speculator who is getting rich. In the district of Backerganj, which was reputed to be the granary of Bengal, the Aus crop has been disappointing, and we are now looking forward to Burma for rescue. Whatever rice there is in the district is being exported, with the result that most people are on the verge of starvation. It is an irony of fate that in Backerganj, which has been known to be the land of plenty, people have died of starvation. Instances of looting of rice are becoming common, and those arrested on such charges are confessing their guilt, and going to jail with a smiling face. All these are indications of the gravest situation that can be imagined. And if there is any spark of humanity and statesmanship in Government, they should step in and prevent disaster that is staring us in the face." 12-4 P.M.

The Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan :—"Sir, I cordially support the Resolution of my friend on the left.* From it will be seen that when in my opinion he brings a reasonable Resolution, I am always with him, though not as the Resolution stands now, but in the form in which it is going to be amended as suggested yesterday by my Hon'ble friend Mr. Mant. Our Hon'ble friend Mr. Mant made a very good speech yesterday, and we Punjabis are proud of him because he is a Punjabi. I think by that speech of his those in the Council as well as people outside will be able to 12-7 P.M.

* The Hon'ble Mr. Chanda.

know how much Government has already done and is doing in this direction. In the same way as regards the Hon'ble Member who has spoken to-day about cloth, the people will know that Government is doing its best. But unfortunately, neither can the speech of Mr. Mant be eaten by those who are very hungry, nor the speech of the other gentleman be worn as clothes. What is wanted is, that something should be done immediately to relieve the trouble which people are experiencing in various provinces, so that they should not starve and should not go naked; and that can only be done if immediate steps are taken. My province has been suffering throughout the time of the war, and, I think, the other provinces have just begun to suffer, and they have already come forward and spoken on their own behalf, while we have kept quiet up till now. Of course one cannot keep quiet for ever, and now we ask the Government to do something in the matter. It has been said that we do not suggest any particular way out of the difficulty, but simply ask for the thing. Well, some time back when foodstuffs were not sent so much out of the country, I mean exported, prices used to be very low and the people used to be content.. I think when this has been once seen to be the case we may ask why it should not be done again. If you put a stop for a time to the wholesale exporting of foodstuffs, I think the prices are sure to come down and the situation will be improved. The same way about cloth. I think all the places where cloth is made should be controlled by the Government, and they should make very cheap stuff for the people and not only give it to the baniyas to keep in their shops and sell, but I think that Government officials like tahsildars would be doing far better work than they are doing now if they were sent sufficient cloth for the poor and if they were to distribute it themselves as was done when there was a difficulty in this direction during the war. There are Government shops in the districts and also cheap grain shops, but they are not sufficient; something, as I have said, ought to be done on a very big scale.

"Well, this, of course, will naturally bring down prices, and it may not be out of place to put forward one matter and that is, that Government has counted on high prices and the demands of Government in regard to land revenue have risen because it was thought that the poor zemindar has got lots of money and should be further taxed. I hope that if Government takes any action which will result in prices going down, the poor zemindars will not be burdened, and the revenues which are now paid to Government may be brought down to such a level that they do not suffer. The monied classes will gain if prices go down because they will be able to buy things cheaper, but there is a difficulty in the case of a zemindar who produces and sells the same stuff. If he has got two or three biggahs of land which do not produce sufficient food for himself or for his family, even then he is taxed. That means that his food is taxed. I hope Government will, when looking into the case of a man who only possesses land enough for his bare food, see their way to exempt that land from the payment of Government revenue.

12-21 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Sir, I heartily support the Resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda. The situation is a very critical one and calls for most anxious consideration on the part of Government and the people. In the first instance, that the prices of food and cloth are unprecedentedly high and that there is a great deal of suffering in the country are admitted and do not require to be dwelt upon, unless it be to show the great need, the pressing need, for action in order to give relief. At the start I may say that I acknowledge the steps which the Government have taken and I would have no objection to meet Mr. Mant's wishes by putting in the word 'further' before the word 'steps' in the Resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda. It is not a question where we have met to find fault with the Government unnecessarily or unreasonably; it is not a question where we have met simply to justify the existing state of things or to show that there is nothing more that can be done. The unfortunate fact is, there is indescribable suffering owing to very high prices in the country. I, personally, have not the least doubt that millions have died because of the want of sufficient food and clothing during the last few years. This being the situation, the question is to find out the causes, to diagnose the disease, and then to think of the remedy. In diagnosing the disease the Hon'ble Mr. Mant has referred to three factors, world factors, all-India factors and local factors. The world factors are of primary importance. So long as India was not open to the rest of the world, India produced its grain and fed its people. India's misfortune is this that, while she has been thrown open to all parts of the world, while people, who are much more civilised, much more advanced, are free to trade with India, India has not advanced equally in material respects in relation to Europe and other countries. Europe, Japan and the United States have made tremendous progress. The average income per head of the population in these countries has risen tremendously. The average income in England is 20 times that of the average income in India, so also it is nearly the same in the United States, so also, though not quite exactly but about that, in some other countries of Europe. While, therefore, the average income of people in other countries has risen so high, the average income of the Indian people has remained low, if it has not gone down very materially. The result is that, there being a shortage of food-grains in Europe, the richer people of Europe can and do pay a higher price for the grain that they need than the people of India can pay, and the people of India have been brought into competition with them in the matter of the supply of grain. Now, if steps had been taken to enable the people of India to advance materially, by developing indigenous industries and manufactures and in other ways, if the average income in India had risen, the rise in the price of food-grains and cloth would not have pressed so hard upon the people of India as it does. But what has been the fact? While these other countries have advanced, the people of India have not advanced in a corresponding measure, in fact their advance has been so poor that it is hardly worth comparing. This is the great world factor. The Government have afforded facilities for shipping for conveying goods to other ports. They have provided railway facilities and shipping facilities, and this is not a matter entirely of complaint. I am not sorry that railway facilities have been provided, I am not sorry that shipping facilities have been provided; I am glad that they have been provided. I would not be sorry if more railway facilities and shipping facilities were available to the people if these facilities enabled the people to improve their condition as much as they have helped or they have contributed to impoverishing them. I submit that in the absence of an advance in material civilisation and material prosperity among the Indian people, these facilities which have made it easy for the people of other parts of the world to import the produce of India and to export their produce to India has been a world factor of tremendous significance in creating the situation that has been created in India. Now, Sir, that being so, the remedy to consider is how to meet the situation now which has been so created, and I submit that when the fact has been found that, owing to various causes, not merely to the failure of the monsoon last year, but also owing to other causes, the prices of commodities have risen, the first thing which I suggest to the Government is to consider why they should not lock their door against export to other countries, until the needs of the Indian people have been satisfied. I maintain, and I maintain with confidence, though with great regret, that the food production of India is not sufficient to meet the needs of the Indian people. I maintain that what is exported of the food production of India is exported at the expense of the lives of many millions of Indian people in this country. It may be said that there is a surplus, an exportable surplus in the country. I say that surplus is obtained because the people have not money enough available to them to buy as much food as they should buy in order to maintain themselves in health and strength. The poor Sepoy who has served in His Majesty's Army, who has shed his blood for the honour of His Majesty's flag finds that he is not able to purchase enough food to feed himself and those dependent upon him. Many other people, a considerable number of people, do not find themselves able to purchase food for two meals a day. Lord Sinha, speaking at the Conference of the Overseas Press in 1918 said: 'Literally, millions in India were on the border of starvation. Half the population never had a full meal in the day and means must be found to remedy this state of affairs.' Mr. Blant, writing in the 'Edinburgh Review' in July 1918, also observed 'the average of human lives that are wasted entirely in India is about 7 millions.' Mr. Montagu also in speaking of the influenza epidemic in India pointed out that 60 lakhs of people had been carried away by influenza in India, and dwelt upon the fact that the insufficiency of food and clothing was one of the factors which was responsible for this enormous loss of life. Now, I will not refer to earlier statements regarding the number of people who go through life day after day on insufficient food. But I say, Sir, it is a fact which, if the Government will place all the figures available to them or if they appoint a committee to inquire and report upon, it is a fact which will be established that a vast number of people in this country are not eating a sufficient quantity of food, not because they do not want to, but because they have not the means to purchase the food necessary for them. Rai Bahadur Ganga Ram, C.I.E., M.V.O., in his valuable pamphlet on Agricultural Problems in India, said 'We are producing in a normal year just enough to meet—(he has done this after calculations which he has put in his paper)—our requirements of food consumption with no surplus to meet any emergency which may arise in the ensuing year.' That is a statement which Rai Bahadur Ganga Ram has made. Now, I submit this, Sir, that when people talk of the balance of trade, they ought to remember that this balance of trade would be larger if those who want to purchase grain from outside India would be able to pay higher prices and thus draw away the grain, the life-sustaining food-crop from India; the balance of trade would be larger in our favour and bring in many more millions; but those millions will represent the loss of so much life, the loss of so much blood from the people of India. We ought not to be so easily satisfied with this balance of trade being in our favour. The first question which I would ask Government to confront is, to make an inquiry and to find out from definite data whether this statement that the people of India are not having sufficient food is or is not true. If it is not true none will be happier than myself; I will apologise to the Government for having made the statement I have; but I fear that this opportunity is not going to be given to us. I fear that the facts are as I have stated, as I believe them to be. Now, if that is so, then, Sir, I say Government ought in view of the world forces to take into account the fact that our brethren outside who require food—and they will increase as the years go on—are in a much better position to pay than the people of India are. If there was a sufficiency of food in India, if we could produce more than we are producing and might produce if the Revenue and Agriculture Department of the Government of India did its duty by the people of this country, if we did produce as much as we could, I say I should be happy that we, Indians, should be able to serve food to our fellow-men in all parts of the world. I should be happy if we could supply in a larger measure than we do the necessities of other parts of the world. But the Department of Revenue and Agriculture have not, as I say, done their duty to the people, and up to this time the yield of produce in this country has been miserably poor. The yield per acre of produce in India is much lower than in other countries. The figures are given by Rai Bahadur Ganga Ram at page 12 of his pamphlet and are instructive The average yield per acre of wheat in Bombay and the United Provinces was 1,250 lbs., in the United Kingdom it was 1,973 lbs., in Belgium it was 2,174 lbs., in Denmark it was 2,526 lbs., in Switzerland 1,858 lbs. The average yield per acre of barley in the United Provinces was 1,300 lbs., in the United Kingdom 2,105 lbs., in Belgium 2,953 lbs., in Denmark 2,456 lbs., and in Switzerland 1,940 lbs. The average yield per acre of maize in the North-West Frontier Province was 1,356 lbs., in Canada it was 3,487 lbs., and so on. You will find that the average yield per acre of rice in India is only half of what it is in Japan. The possibilities of development are great. Attention has been drawn to this again and again; but the Revenue and Agriculture Department has concerned itself more with matters which will help the department to derive more revenue than as much as they should have done in stimulating the production of crops. I submit, Sir, that this is a matter which should receive attention. I have no pleasure in attacking the department. My grief is that the remissness of the department has created a situation that is causing immense loss, immense suffering and loss of life. It is for that reason that I draw attention to these things. The food problem in India is a very difficult one, and as a writer in the Nation Food Journal, to which attention has been drawn by the 'Leader,' points out the entire surplus productivity of the western hemisphere is totally incapable of meeting the present deficiency in European production if it is long continued. Now, he estimates that the population of Europe is at least 100 millions greater than could be supported without embarrassment. They expect that the United States and India will partly contribute to the needs of Europe. Well, I fear that India as constituted at present cannot meet her own needs, and therefore with very great regret, with no desire whatever that our fellow-men in other parts of the world should not have the benefit of deriving some part of their food from India, but simply because it is necessary to see that the people of India should not starve and should not die premature deaths, I suggest that the first step which the Government of India should take is, unless production is largely, considerably increased, unless there is a certainty, a positive certainty that there is a real, a true surplus which the people do not require after having full meals supplied to them, until then, I say the Government owes it to the people of this country that they should stop export of food-grains to other countries.

"That is my first point. The second is this. There have been other causes at work which have contributed to this. Among these, the step taken with the very best of intentions, namely, the arrangements made by the food controllers, have contributed to the situation. The present system of control was initiated more in the interests of England and the Allies than in those of India. Some of the members present here will remember that a foodstuffs conference was held at Delhi on the 15th October 1918. Mr. Mackenna there moved the following resolution:—

> 'This conference recognises the necessity of conserving the food-grain and fodder supplies of India with a view to meet the military obligations and commitments in the interests of the people of India . . . . .

So my point is that the first desire was to meet the military obligations and commitments of India to people outside. Now when the conference met in Delhi in 1918 the monsoon of 1918 had failed and yet the conference was devising means to exploit India's food materials in the interests of Europe. The termination of the war led this department to modify its arrangements, and unfortunately it began to mobilise the resources of India by controlling internal supplies. I submit, Sir, that internal movements of food-grains from one province to another should not have been checked. I submit that it was a great mistake to exercise any restriction upon the movements of food-grains from province to province, and my next suggestion is that these restrictions should be abolished once and for all . . . . . .

The Vice-President:—"I wish to remind the Hon'ble Member that he has already exceeded his time. I hope he will bring his remarks to a conclusion."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"The subject is a very large one, Sir, and I fear that I shall not be able to do any justice to it. You will see that there are two subjects mixed up, cloth and food. I do not think that within the time limit I can do justice to these questions."

12-30 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha:—"Sir, as I understand, the Resolution of Mr. Chanda is that steps might be taken, as far as possible by the Government, to reduce the high prices of food and cloth prevailing in several parts of the country. In so far as I have heard the speeches of my friends, Mr. Malaviya and Mr. Sarma, I find that they have travelled beyond the real subject of this Resolution.

"They have confused two questions, the high prices of food and the condition of India so far as food supplies are concerned. But the question is, what can the Government do to mitigate the rise in prices and not the condition of India and its people and their food supply? If the last were the question to be discussed here, perhaps, I could say a good deal in reply to the observations made by my Hon'ble friends. But that is not the subject before us, and I refrain from saying anything thereon. A very good answer could be given to the question. It is a matter which I have studied for 30 years and more. There are various factors that go to the bottom of it which would expose their fallacies and sweeping generalisations. But I do not at this moment propose to refer to them. We know that for 30 years and more the condition of India, so far as foodstuffs are concerned, has not been wholly satisfactory, but at the same time statistics show that whatever Government can do to increase the production or increase the area of food crops is being done. As a matter of fact the area for all sorts of crops has greatly increased, specially the area under merchantable crops, has been increased to a large extent but the food crop area has not been extended or developed to the same extent. In his lucid and well-informing speech which Mr. Mant delivered yesterday, he traced the causes of the present rise of prices. Of course it is taken for granted that the prevailing price of foodstuffs in India is what it is. Nobody is to be blamed for it—neither the Government nor the people. Mr. Mant in his exceedingly informing speech traced the causes of the rise in prices . . . .

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"The question was whether the people could pay at that price."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha:—"Exactly: but that clearly is a different question to that before the Council. At the present moment the question is, how far it is possible to mitigate the high prices; how far the people can afford to pay those high prices is a different question. It is an economic question of an exceedingly complicated character which you might discuss for the next 20 years and not be able to find a solution. That is my answer to the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma's interposition. Therefore, I say that the three factors that the Hon'ble Mr. Mant mentioned are there. The question is, what are we to do? How far can we mitigate the rise in prices? It is the immediate concern of the people that we have to take into account, not what may happen in the next 20 years, or what may happen in the next 5 years, or what may happen to-morrow? The people are just now crying out against the high rates. That is the question. What is the answer to the question? So far as I know no answer has been given to it. I do not know what reply Mr. Mant may give so far as the Government are concerned. Of course, for my part I must say at once that it is a very difficult question to answer ; and however-much we may sympathise with the present condition of the masses and however we may deplore their hardships which are entailed by the abnormal prices, we are helpless to provide a reasonably satisfactory solution. How to reduce the prices of food so as to mitigate the hardships of the poor people is a very difficult matter. If you take this pressing question into consideration you will be unable to suggest what is to be done. Supposing the exports of food-grains were restricted or altogether stopped the question is, and I hope my Hon'ble friend Mr. Mant will answer it, would he be able to reduce prices ? Looking at the statistics of the exports of rice and comparing them with those of the past three years, we find that jowar and bajra are not grains that are exported. The only grain that is exported in large quantities is rice, and that is exported from Burma. Supposing that the whole of the exports of rice and other grains were restricted, the question is how much the restriction can reduce prices to effectually mitigate the hardships of the poor people ? That is the question, but a most difficult one. It is very easy for Hon'ble Members to say that Government ought to do this or do that. It is, however, what most looks simple on the surface which is very difficult of solution. But how far can the Government go ? Were they to restrict the inter-provincial movement of grains it is possible we might see prices reduced somewhat in some places. So long, however, as the present conditions last and so long as the effects of the war last, whatever the external factors or the internal factors may be, I consider that the Government and the people will be able to do very little in the direction of a sensible reduction of food prices. That is my opinion."

The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal :—"Sir, I am afraid many economic difficulties have to be faced before the Resolution as it stands can be given effect to. The Hon'ble Mover suggests that exports should be further controlled or imports facilitated. I do not know if the Hon'ble Mover of this Resolution is aware how the import and export duties at present stand. Import duties as fixed by the Tariff Act, 1916-17, are levied, if I mistake not, at 7½ per cent ad-valorem. Sugar, however, is taxed at 10 per cent and the following articles hitherto in the free list will hereafter pay duty at 2½ per cent ad-valorem—Grain and pulse at 8 annas per ton which is roughly equivalent to 2½ per cent ad-valorem. The statutory free list is now confined to such articles as raw cotton, raw wool, etc. I do not know whether Government would be able to facilitate the imports further. If we look to export duties we will find, if my information is correct, that rice in and without husk is already charged at annas 3 per Indian maund, though with the exception of jute (raw, cuttings sacking and hessians) all other articles are free. It is also a fact if I mistake not that the export of wheat is strictly forbidden. I thus do not see how we can further control exports as is implied by the Hon'ble Mover of the Resolution. Then the question arises as to whether it is possible to check the rise in prices in any other way. I am afraid this is not so easy as is expected. General rise in prices is not the result of any artificial method of control either of export or import, but is due mostly to the high standard of living and the corresponding fall in the value of a rupee. If we were to check this rise by any artificial means, as is suggested by the Hon'ble Mover, it will carry with it a corresponding evil which we have to guard against in every such economic question. I do not see any justification in accepting a Resolution like this unless the Hon'ble Mover can point out tangible methods of redress which the Council can consider. It is purely a question of give and take. If you disturb export or imports you will have to suffer from the corresponding evil that such a course will automatically bring into play, inasmuch as exports and imports have to be paid by imports and exports respectively. The action taken by Government, as pointed out by the Hon'ble Mr. Mant, has gone a great way towards mitigating the evil, yet in my opinion there is ample room for improvement. 12-37 P.M.

I, therefore, strongly urge upon the Government the necessity of appointing a Committee to go into this question in detail and to suggest further means, if any. With these words, I oppose the Resolution in its present form."

12-41 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—" Sir, I wish to conclude as I began. I simply wanted to call the attention of the Government to the state of things that now exist, and I therefore do not feel tempted to discuss the points raised by my Hon'ble friend, Rai Saheb Seth Nathmal, who has just sat down. I frankly confessed at the beginning that I did not understand these questions, but I simply wanted to call the attention of the Government to the state of things that now exist and appeal to the Government to improve matters, as in this country in almost everything it is the Government which does everything for the people. Sir, I ought to apologise to the Council, and express my regret that I did not touch on the question of high prices of cloth which was part of my Resolution. It was due to the fact that I was prevented from doing so owing to my miscalculation about the time-limit, and by the time I had nearly finished what I had to say about rice, my time was up, so I could not touch on the question of high prices of cloth. I wanted to mention the fact that the position with regard to cloth was such that it is well known that there have been cases of suicide by women for failure of obtaining cloth to cover their shame. I know it is a difficult question. So long as the price of cotton is high, it will be very difficult, nay even impossible, to reduce the price of cloth. But I only appeal to the Government that, in view of the abnormal situation that has arisen, some palliative measures ought to be taken to ease the situation. Of course, I frankly confessed at the beginning that I had nothing new to suggest, but I simply wanted to call the attention of Government to the existing state of things, and I shall be thankful if my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Ley, will only advise some palliative measures to ease the situation which need not be permanent.

" Now coming to the main part of the Resolution, Sir, I must in the first place congratulate my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Mant, on the very full, fair and informing statement which he made, and I wish also to thank him and the Government for the very sympathetic attitude that has been adopted on this Resolution of mine. I did not mean to suggest, Sir, that Government had done nothing. Of course, the wording of the Resolution might imply it, but my only object was to ask the Government to take further measures to improve the situation, and in this view I shall be quite prepared to accept the wording which my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Mant, suggested provided he in his turn would be pleased to accept my Resolution as amended. Sir, in view of this I do not think I shall be justified in detaining the Council with any lengthy remarks, but I would ask the indulgence of the Council just for a few moments on one or two points.

" In the first place, my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Mant, has criticised my suggestion about fixing the price of Burma rice and mentioned the orders that were passed under martial-law in Lahore. I may say at once that I am entirely at one with him about the unsoundness of these orders. I only wish he could see eye to eye with us as regards the other orders passed under martial law in Lahore. However, I fully appreciate that it is extremely unsound, nay even dangerous, to have passed orders like those passed under martial law fixing the price at figures much below the prices obtaining in the neighbouring districts. What would be the result of that? Suppose for instance, the price of atta was fixed at 2 annas in Lahore under martial law, while the price of atta in the neighbouring districts was 4 annas. Well, we know what happened. The people in Lahore were under martial law, and for fear of being whipped the shop-keepers were more than anxious to sell the whole quantities they had at the price fixed by Colonel Frank Johnson. But what happened when it was known that the price at Lahore was fixed at 2 annas? Did any body import atta into Lahore? No, the result was inevitable, that in a short time when the stock in Lahore was exhausted there was nothing but starvation. Therefore I could not possibly support these orders, and I did not for a moment suggest that such orders should be passed, but what I said was this, that when you controlled the source of supply as Burma rice, what was the harm in fixing the retail prices when you fixed the wholesale prices. That was my humble suggestion, and I do not think that was very wrong. The merchant was not entitled to import any Burma rice unless he accepted the conditions, and when you fixed wholesale prices I submit you ought to have gone further and fixed retail prices also. That was my first submission.

"In the next place, my Hon'ble friend said that the distress in Bengal and Assam was very recent compared with the other provinces. Well, that is so. We had a bumper crop in Bengal and Assam in 1918, and the result was there was no market for our rice That was the reason why my Hon'ble friend the Maharaja of Kasim Bazar put that question last year on this point, and I might mention to the Council that in my division, which had the benefit, if I can say so without any bad taste in his presence, of the experience of my Hon'ble friend sitting on my right who was the Commissioner of my division would bear me out, the condition was such that I think I had mentioned to him that we might suggest to the Munitions Board to take over our stocks of rice last year. Well, Sir, simply because we had a surplus stock of rice last year, will that appease our hunger to-day when there is no rice to-day? The fact that I had a sumptuous feast on Sunday will not appease my hunger to-day if I do not get food to-day. Therefore it is no consolation to say that we had large stocks of rice last year.

"My Hon'ble friend also compared the condition of India with other countries, and showed that in India the rise in the price of food-stuffs is much less than in other countries. It is about 57 per cent. That is so. But is it any consolation to us that other countries are in a worse condition than ourselves? In the next place, Sir, it would be very fallacious and misleading simply to compare the rise of prices of food-stuffs in India with other countries unless you compare the average income per head in other countries and the rise of wages during war time. Well, Sir, so far as income goes, of course it is well known that India is the poorest country. Well, in an article in the Journal of Indian Economics in December last year, Mr. O'Byrne, I.C.S., Assistant Wheat Commissioner, says that for ten years ending 1916 the average income of India was Rs. 45 to Rs. 50 annually. And the price of food grains was just under Rs. 4 per maund and the expenditure on food grains alone per head absorbed between 42 and 43 per cent. of the annual income. Now that food grains sell for Rs. 10 per maund every pice is taken for food grains if they can get enough and there is nothing left for any other purpose. Similarly, in regard to wages, as has been mentioned by Mr. Sarma, we know that in other countries, especially in England, they have been very much increased. Therefore it would be very fallacious to compare the condition of things in other countries with that in India if you do not compare the income and the increase in the rise of prices. The deaths from starvation in Bengal and suicide due to it were mentioned by me yesterday and we have to-day heard from Hon'ble Members who have spoken to-day. The Hon'ble Maharaja of Kasim Bazar has mentioned not only deaths and suicides due to starvation, but the abandoning of children owing to want of food. Well, that is the position of the country, and I submit, Sir, that abornmal measures will have to be adopted. With these remarks I have much pleasure in amending the Resolution as has been suggested by my friend, Mr. Mant. The Resolution as amended will read thus:—

'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council to consider whether any further steps can be taken for the reduction of the unprecedented high prices of necessary articles of food and of cloth which obtain in several provinces either by further controlling exports or facilitating imports, or both, and by such other means as may be considered fit and proper.'

"I trust the Resolution will commend itself to the Council."

12-52 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant:—"Sir, I have very little to add to what I said yesterday on this subject. I explained then the steps that Government were taking to deal with the situation and said that we should be very glad to avail ourselves of non-official advice. I have listened to a debate of about two hours to-day, with, I must say, a feeling of great disappointment, because I did hope that we should have had some more constructive suggestions from Hon'ble Members. We have heard a good deal about the hardships, which are admitted, we have heard a good deal about the poverty of the country. In fact, some Hon'ble Members, certainly the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma and the Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya, seemed to speak to item No. 8* of the Agenda part of the time, discussing whether the people have enough to eat, but of suggestions for remedies I could find very little. The Hon'ble the Maharaja of Kasim Bazar did make a constructive suggestion. I think he said Government should sell Burma rice in every village of India. I do not know how many villages there are in India. If he would consider what an establishment and what an expenditure that would entail, he would surely realise that it is not a feasible suggestion. Then one or two Members suggested the abolition of internal control. I explained yesterday that we hoped shortly to be in a position to do that, but it cannot be done all at once. It has been the experience in Europe, I believe, that demobilization was nearly as difficult a business as mobilization, and we find much the same difficulty in demobilizing control. Two Hon'ble Members, Mr. Sita Nath Ray and I think, Mr. Sarma, suggested that we should abolish the control on Burma rice . . . ."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"No, I did not."

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant:—"It was Mr. Sita Nath Ray. I am not sure whether the Hon'ble Member meant that we should withdraw all restrictions on the Burma rice trade, because it is perfectly clear from the figures I gave him yesterday that India would not get a grain of Burma rice in that case; it would all be bought up by countries outside who are willing to pay three times as much as India . . . ."

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur:—"What I meant was that, so far as Bengal was concerned, the restrictions on the import of rice from Burma should be withdrawn."

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant:—"I understand the Hon'ble Member to mean that we should maintain our control over exports, but we should maintain no control over the price; that we should not utilize our control for the purpose of bringing down prices. I understand that is his intention. Well, that is a possible course, but it will not help the situation. We have in Calcutta employed as distributing agents for the sale of rice, a few large firms, because we found that the small firms were profiteering and were not helping at all to bring down prices. We found that by using a smaller number of firms it was possible to see that they sold at reasonable rates. However, that is a matter which, as I said yesterday, we left entirely to Local Governments.

"There were really very few other suggestions made. The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma, as I understood him, said we ought to raise wages. Well, I wish we could do it, but I really do not see how we can. I have no doubt wages in time will be raised and will adjust themselves to prices, but I do not see how Government is going to expedite the process . . . . .

* 'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that a Committee be appointed to enquire into and report at an early date :—

(a) upon the adequacy of the food production of the country to supply the legitimate needs of the people ;

(b) what proportion, if any, of the population in British India is unable to procure sufficient food either owing to lack of food supply or of pecuniary inability to purchase it.'

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I said the Public Works Department should increase the irrigational activity and other activity."

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant:—"We do what we can when we get the money to spend, but we cannot certainly pay higher wages above market rates on public works. The only other suggestion that I need notice is that of the Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya. I did not quite catch the accusation that he directed against the Revenue and Agriculture Department, but if he merely means that the Agriculture Department in India is too small, I admit the fact and plead guilty to this extent, but I would point out we have been trying to increase the Agriculture Departments for a long time and we have not been able to get the men. It is thoroughly realised that much greater activity is required, much wider research and stimulation of production, and in so far as the Hon'ble Pandit suggests the increase of production as a cure or partial remedy at any rate for the present evils, I am entirely with him, but when he says, block exports, I thought I disposed of that theory yesterday. I did my best to, but I must have been preaching to deaf ears . . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"May I explain? I meant exports should be stopped when prices reach a certain level. When prices go to a certain level, exports should be stopped at least then."

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant:—"I do not know how the Hon'ble Pandit would work an arrangement like that. It is certain that somebody would make money out of it. But I have not really anything more to say on this subject of exports. I showed clearly yesterday that if you stop exports, you stop production. If the argument is that the production of food-grains of the country is too small, well you are taking the best way to make it smaller. You will not increase production by a single grain. I am afraid therefore the debate has been somewhat fruitless, because when I asked or hoped for suggestions, one of the last speakers, the Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha says, he hopes that I myself will find a remedy. Well I wish I could. But I think the fact is that a debate in this Council is not really the best way of tackling a problem of this kind. The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha has proposed in another Resolution that we should have a Committee, and I hope we may be able to meet him to some extent in that way. I should very much like to take advantage of the presence of members here from all parts of the country to explain to them more informally what our difficulties have been. It is much more difficult to do so in a formal speech, and if we can get a talk round the table, I hope that we shall get more mutual understanding and more mutual benefit."

The motion was put and the Resolution, as amended, was adopted.

The Vice-President:—"I think it will probably conduce to the public business if we take up next Resolution No. 7 which stands in the name of the Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha. It is a kindred subject, in which the Council is interested, and I understand that an agreement has been arrived at between the Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha and the Member of Government."

RESOLUTION re APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER THE QUESTION OF PROFITEERING.

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha:—"Sir, my Resolution reads as follows:— 1 P.M.

'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that a Committee consisting of the Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes, the Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur, the Hon'ble Sir George Barnes, the Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma, the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent, the Hon'ble Pandit M. M. Malaviya, the Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant, the Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan, the Hon'ble Mr. Shafi, the Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum, the Hon'ble Mr. E M. Cook, the Hon'ble Mr. N. F. Paton, the Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal, the Hon'ble Mr. J. P. Thompson and the Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha be appointed to investigate and report, as soon as possible, on the extent to which profiteering is prevalent in India, with particular reference to the question of clothing and articles of daily consumption; and to suggest such remedies as may be possible to mitigate the hardships from which the poorest and lower middle classes are suffering.'

" Sir, after the discussion that has already taken place on the Resolution of the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda which was just passed, and which, of course, relates to a kindred subject, I have nothing more to say on it, although a good deal might be said on the general question of profiteering. Profiteering, at the present moment, is universal, though to what extent profiteering, particularly in food-grains and in articles of consumption of the poorer classes in India, has taken place, it is very difficult to say. The cry everywhere is ' profiteering, ' ' profiteering, ' ' profiteering. ' There may be profiteering in one commodity and there may be profiteering in another commodity. But, at the present moment, we do not know much about it; we all speak superficially on the subject. I assume that there is some profiteering, and to what extent it may be asked, is it possible to suggest a remedy so far as food and cloth are concerned? There are some factors to which the Hon'ble Mr. Mant referred while speaking on the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda's Resolution. But speaking frankly I was somewhat staggered by that Resolution and I did not know what I could practically suggest. The Hon'ble Mr. Mant in his reply observed that he was disappointed at the absence of any really ' constructive' proposal from the Hon'ble Members who spoke. He is right; I had fully anticipated that it would not be possible to offer a practical suggestion. It is a very difficult problem, and, therefore, Sir, I do say that possibly a large Committee of the character I have proposed in which, perhaps, most of the provinces will be represented and on which there will be some of our friends of the Government, because they are greater experts than ourselves, may be able to arrive at some remedy, whereby the same excellent object which my friend the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda has in view, could be attained. The Hon'ble Member for Commerce and Industry wishes that I might drop the Committee that I have named and that another Committee may be appointed, a small Committee of real experts, who may perhaps sit at a round table, and might, before this Council dissolves, try to suggest and submit to the Council some remedy in the direction we all desire. I hope, Sir, that we may be able to do something in this matter. The public cry is very loud, and the ignorant multitudes do not, of course, know how difficult the situation is. It is a difficult economic phenomenon which is prevalent in England and other countries. India is peculiarly situated in this respect, especially in its economic aspects, to some of which the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma referred. But, whatever that may be, I do earnestly hope that, as far as this immediate question is concerned, we may be able to solve it so as to mitigate the hardship entailed on the poorer classes of people. Therefore, Sir, I propose this Resolution. "

1-6 P.M. The Honble Sir George Barnes:—" Sir, I had an opportunity a few minutes ago of discussing this Resolution with the Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha. Of course when Sir Dinshaw Wacha put down his Resolution, he had not had the opportunity of hearing the very luminous address which the Hon'ble Mr. Mant gave us yesterday . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha:—" Exactly."

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—" I believe that he agrees with me in thinking that it is hopeless to appoint a Committee of this kind to investigate and report on the extent to which profiteering is prevalent. I was very glad to hear the Hon'ble Mr. Mant's last words on the subject of personal discussion round a table, and I think, if other Hon'ble Members agree, a round table conference on this subject would be very useful. We believe, as a Government, that we have explored every avenue which leads to possible remedies for the present high prices, but it may be that we are wrong, and if we are wrong, we shall be very glad to have a new avenue pointed out to us. I have no wish to suggest any change in the membership of the Committee except to warn my friend, Sir Dinshaw Wacha, that I am afraid that some of the officials will find it practically impossible to attend meetings at the present time, and I think that the Committee might have liberty to add to its members, or that the Government might have liberty to add to the proposed Committee in such a way as they may think fit, because there may be other Hon'ble Members who take a deep interest in the subject whom Sir Dinshaw does not chance to have mentioned. I would, accordingly, suggest that the following words be substituted for the words which stand at present in the Resolution, if the Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha will agree to them, that a Committee consisting of . . . . be appointed 'to consider the high prices which at present prevail in articles of daily consumption, and to suggest such remedies as may be possible to mitigate the hardships from which the poorest and lower middle classes are suffering.' "

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha:—" Of course, I agree to that."

The motion was put and the Resolution, as amended, was adopted.

RESOLUTION re UNIVERSITY AT NAGPUR.

The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal:—" Sir, I beg to move the following Resolution :— 1-9 P.M.

> 'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that a Bill for the establishment and incorporation of a University at Nagpur be introduced into this Council at an early date.'

The question of the establishment and incorporation of a University at Nagpur for the Central Provinces is by no means a new one. During the last few years it has repeatedly attracted the attention both of the public as well as the Government. My object in moving this Resolution is not to raise a discussion on the desirability or otherwise of establishing a University at Nagpur, but in order that it may simply serve as a reminder for early steps being taken towards the execution of a project which is admitted on all hands to be an urgent necessity.

" In view of the happy termination of the world-wide war and the conclusion of the work of the Calcutta University Commission, 1917-19, I think this is the most opportune time to push forward this scheme. The proposals regarding the University were submitted to the Government of India by the Central Provinces Administration long ago, and they held them up pending the report of the Calcutta University Commission. I know, Sir, the Government of India is as anxious as any of us to promote the cause of higher education everywhere as quickly as possible, and I will therefore close this with a very few observations.

"The question to which the Resolution which I have the honour to move relates is one which has a long history behind it. The contemplated University for the Central Provinces was referred to in the Report of the Education Commission of 1882. The Universities Commission of 1902 also adverted to it in paragraph 29 of their Report and bore unequivocal testimony to the fact that the proposal to create a new University at Nagpur had received both official and non-official support. Later on, the Government of India in their Resolution dated the 21st February 1913 while declaring the educational policy said that, with a view to satisfy the aspirations of the people, they contemplated the establishment of a University at Rangoon, Patna and Nagpur. Not long after that the Central Provinces Government by their Resolution No. 682, dated the 8th July 1914, appointed a strong Committee consisting of officials and non-officials to consider a scheme for the creation of the University at Nagpur. The Committee gave a very close and thoughtful consideration and after seven months' labour produced an elaborate report embodying a detailed scheme for the constitution of the proposed University. The Local Government invited public criticism on the said report and gave the people an opportunity to express their own views on the subject. The report was discussed thread-bare at the meetings of the 4th Provincial Conference, Central Provinces and Berar, and a deputation was arranged to wait upon the Hon'ble the Chief Commissioner and placed before His Honor the views of the Conference. This was done and a favourable and sympathetic reply was received from the Government. The Hon'ble Mr. Dixit also interpellated the Local Government on the subject on 18th March 1916 and received the following reply :—

> '(a) The Government is not aware that the proposals for the Dacca and Patna Universities and for a University for Burma have reached the advanced stage which is mentioned in part (a) of the question.'
> (b) and (c) With regard to parts (b) and (c) of the question I would refer the Hon'ble Member to the reply which was given by the Chief Commissioner to the deputation which waited on him in January to present the resolution of the Provincial Conference. The reply was published in the Press. The Hon'ble the Chief Commissioner is aware of the interest that is taken on the subject in the Province, that in view of the voluminous criticism received and of the necessity at a time like the present for putting forward proposals which should be as practicable as possible he must await the detailed report on the scheme which is to be furnished by the permanent Director of Public Instruction. Until the report has been received and considered, it is impossible to make a further statement on the subject.'

"Again, Rai Bahadur B. D. Shukul asked the Government of India on the 19th September 1916 if they had received any definite proposal regarding the establishment of a University at Nagpur from the Local Government and the reply received was in the negative. He repeated his question on the 12th September last and further asked the Government as to when a Bill for the establishment of a University at Nagpur was likely to be introduced in the Council. The Hon'ble Member in charge of Education then replied to the effect : 'Proposals have been received from the Local Government for the establishment of a University for the Central Provinces and are now under consideration. It is therefore undesirable to publish the proposals at present and impossible to give a definite reply to the question when a Bill for the establishment of the contemplated University will be introduced.' No provision was, however, made for the establishment of the proposed University in the ensuing year's budget, consequently a Resolution was moved by Rai Bahadur B. D. Shukul in this Council on the 12th March, 1918, to provide a sum of rupees four lakhs as a preliminary measure for the establishment of a University at Nagpur, when he took advantage of the opportunity to give a short review of the whole history . . . . .

The Vice-President:—" I think if the Hon'ble Member would speak a little slower we should all hear him better. "

The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal:—"To give a short review of the whole history as to how the question of the Central Provinces University has been hanging fire for the last 37 years, i. e., since 1882, when the Education Commission presided over by the late Mr. William Hunter suggested the establishment of a separate University for the Central Provinces at Nagpur. In reply to this the Hon'ble Sir Sankaran Nair was pleased to observe : ' Even with reference to the Patna University the question arose whether it would not be wise to defer the consideration of the Patna University scheme pending the report of the Calcutta Commission who were expected to deal with all these questions. Further, we also hoped that we might be able to submit the Nagpur University scheme if not to all the members of the Calcutta Commission, to some members at least. Therefore we have put it off till the receipt of the report from them. That is the reason of the delay. '

" Sir, the report of the Calcutta Commission to which the Hon'ble Sir Sankaran Nair referred has already seen the light of day and the recommendations made by the Commission are now before the Government of India. Sir Sankaran Nair, I presume, must have consulted all the members of the Commission or at least a few of them as he already expressed in his reply which I have just quoted and in my humble opinion the time has come when the legislation for the establishment and the incorporation of a new University at Nagpur on the lines suggested by the Calcutta University Commission be introduced into this Council. Fortunately, the terrible war has also ceased to the greatest relief of us all and with better financial prospects in future. I do not think any pecuniary considerations would now deter the Government of India from granting to the people of the Central Provinces a boon which has been long overdue. I think it is a very reasonable and modest request and my entire province is looking forward to an announcement on this particular subject. It is in that hope, Sir, that I have ventured to move this Resolution before this Council. "

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi:—"Sir, in dealing with the Resolution which 1-15 P.M. 1/- has been moved by my Hon'ble friend , I need not detain the Council long. Hon'ble Members are aware that on 21st February, 1913, the Government of India with the previous approval of the Secretary of State issued a Resolution embodying their educational policy. In that Resolution they made a comprehensive survey of the whole field of education, summarised the policy which in regard to almost every branch of education had been followed in the past, and laid down the basic principles upon which the educational system in this country was to be developed in the future. In paragraphs 44 and 45 of that Resolution they dealt with University education and after instituting a comparative analysis of the resulting benefits of affiliating and teaching Universities, they laid it down as a general rule that the Universities of the future should be of the teaching and residential type. Then they went on to say :

> ' At present there are only five Indian Universities for 185 Arts and professional colleges in British India besides several institutions in Native States.
> ' The day is probably far distant when India will be able to dispense altogether with the affiliating University, but it is necessary to restrict the area over which the affiliating Universities have control by securing in the first instance a separate University for each leading province in India and, secondly, to create new local teaching and residential Universities within each province in harmony with the best modern opinion as to the right road to educational efficiency. The Government of India have decided to found a teaching and residential University at Dacca and they are prepared to sanction under certain conditions the establishment of similar Universities at Aligarh and Benares and elsewhere as occasion may demand. They also contemplate the establishment of Universities at Rangoon, Patna and Nagpur.'

"Hon'ble Members are aware that the Universities of Patna and Benares are already accomplished facts and the movement for the establishment of a university at Rangoon, I believe, has reached a fairly satisfactory stage. Had the promoters of the Muslim University acted wisely, I have no doubt that the proposed University at Aligarh would have already been in existence. So far as the proposed University at Nagpur is concerned, the position is a very simple one. I need not enter into the history of this question as my Hon'ble friend has already given us a fairly clear resumé of the whole problem. As he has reminded the Council, when the Hon'ble Mr. Shukul moved his Resolution on the 12th March 1918, advocating the establishment of a University at Nagpur, the Hon'ble Sir Sankaran Nair in his reply, after referring to primary facts, proceeded to observe :—

> 'The result was that we felt that these questions required very careful consideration. At that time the Calcutta Commission was appointed; even with reference to the Patna University the question arose whether it would not be wise to defer the consideration of the Patna University scheme pending the report of the Calcutta Commission . . . . .'
> 'In those circumstances the Government felt that it would not be right to go on, pending the report of the Calcutta Commission who were expected to deal with all those questions. . . . Therefore we have to put it off till the receipt of the Report from them. That is the reason of the delay.'

As has been mentioned by my Hon'ble friend, the Calcutta University Commission have now presented their Report. Therefore, Sir, I am in a position to go a step further and on behalf of the Government of India to accept the Resolution which has been moved by my Hon'ble friend with two slight reservations, the reasonableness of which I am sure he will recognise. I am sure he will understand that the bearings of the Calcutta University report on the proposed University at Nagpur have to be decided upon by the Department and those interested in the establishment of this university. In consequence it is impossible to specify any date on which the necessary legislation will be undertaken. There is one further point in this connection, the reasonableness of which also, I am sure, the Hon'ble Member will recognise, i.e., the question whether the necessary legislation ought to be undertaken in this Council or in the Provincial Council to be established under the Reforms Scheme. In all probability the necessary legislation will be undertaken in this Council, but it is a question that requires consideration, and therefore I cannot at this moment give an undertaking on the point. With these slight reservations I have pleasure in accepting on behalf of the Government of India the Resolution moved by my Hon'ble friend. Meanwhile, he may rest assured that the Government of India are in the fullest sympathy with the object which he and the people of Nagpur have in view and will, in so far as circumstances permit, take every reasonable step to bring about the establishment of a University at Nagpur as early as possible."

1-24 P.M. The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal :—"Sir, we quite realise the position of Government which has been given expression to by my Hon'ble friend who is in charge of the Education Department, and I offer my hearty thanks to the Government of India for accepting my Resolution, as pointed out by the Hon'ble Member. With regard to the latter remark that this legislation ought to be undertaken in the Provincial Council, I might point out that we ought not to wait till the new Reforms Scheme has come into operation. We have to consider the time that would be required in the preliminary arrangements as, e.g., construction of buildings and the arrangement of the staff, etc., and the earlier we start the better and so far as the first condition is concerned, I think it has my full sympathy."

The motion was put and the Resolution was adopted.

RESOLUTION re REMOVAL OF THE CALCUTTA MINT TO ANOTHER SITE.

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—" Sir, I beg to move :— 1-25 P.M.

'That this Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that the question of removing the Calcutta Mint to another site be taken into consideration.'

Sir, if this Chamber were provided with a black board and chalk I would be able to explain my Resolution to the Council in five minutes. As, however, a good many of the members here are not acquainted with Calcutta, especially with the locality of Burra Bazar, it may take me a little time to enable them to visualise the position. Calcutta may be divided into three parts, that is northern, central and southern. I shall deal with the central portion. Here there are two main roads, Harrison Road running from east to west, from Sealdah station to Howrah station viâ the Howrah bridge, and the Strand Road running from north to south, from Chitpore nearly to Kidderpore. The district of Burra Bazar is bounded on the south by Harrison Road, on the west by Strand Road, on the east by the Chitpore Road. Since the part of Burra Bazar that we have to deal with is only the southern part, I propose to take the northern boundary as a street called Darpanarayan Tagore Lane. The frontage of this portion of Burra Bazar on the Strand Road is 750 yards, and it has also got a frontage of 750 yards along Harrison Road. This part of Calcutta, so far as density of population is concerned, is the second most dense. It has got a population of something like 220 to the acre, which is considerably higher than any part of London. It is rather peculiar in its construction. The houses in Burra Bazar have godowns on the ground floors with living premises on the upper floors, and therefore it is probable that the real density of the population per area occupied is equal to, if not more than, that of any other part of Calcutta. Now, Sir, some years ago Dr. Crake, the Health Officer of Calcutta examined very carefully the conditions of the various wards of Calcutta for density of population and for the number of the sanitary and insanitary houses. He divided the houses of Calcutta into three different classes, sanitary, moderately sanitary and insanitary. He found that Ward 5 which is Burra Bazar, with which we have to deal, was the section with the largest number of insanitary houses and the smallest number of sanitary houses of any part of Calcutta. He also found that whereas the average deaths from tuberculosis in Calcutta were 3·2 per thousand, in Ward No. 5 they were 4·2 per thousand making that ward the second worst ward for tuberculosis. He went on to say : 'Still one could not help being struck with the extremely overcrowded condition of many of the large tenement houses in Burra Bazar section. Here one actually finds rooms sub-divided by partitions and whole families occupying the resulting tiny dens. A great deal of the insanitary property is overcrowded simply because a considerable portion of it is so horrible that it is abandoned, the inmates all crowding into two or three upper rooms.' In a letter addressed to the Government of Bengal by the Improvement Trust—I do not know if it has come to the Government of India, if it has not it will come later—it is said that 'the existing roadways are quite insufficient to meet the requirements of the traffic; a large percentage of the buildings, even though of costly construction, are insanitary, and Burra Bazar is a standing menace to the health of Calcutta.'

"Now, Sir, there are at present running east and west in the Burra Bazar about six streets over a frontage of 750 yards. All of these streets go down as low as 15 feet in width in places, and in fact Burra Bazar which as its name implies is one of the most important business centres of Calcutta, is nothing but a rabbit warren. It is absolutely essential for the health of Calcutta that Burra Bazar should be improved by Town Planning Experts as soon as possible. I have told the Council that the frontage of Burra Bazar, or rather of that part of Burra Bazar with which I am dealing, is about 750 yards on the Strand Road. No less than 330 yards of this frontage is occupied by the Mint; and the result is of course that any new roads running east and west through Burra Bazar are stopped in their egress to Strand Road by the Mint.

"A plan for improvement has been drawn up by the Improvement Trust, and slight alterations have been suggested by the Municipality in conjunction with the report drawn up by Professor Geddes, and this plan proposes that eight new roads should be driven from east to west. These roads will vary in width from 70 feet in the case of the broadest road to 35 feet in the case of the narrowest road. No less than three of these suggested roads converge on to the Mint, and therefore they cannot be extended towards the Strand Road which, as I have said, is the main traffic artery running north and south.

"Therefore, I think from the point of view of the health of Calcutta and also the trade of Calcutta, it is most important that the Mint should be removed.

"Now, Sir, the history of the Mint, or rather the history of the question of moving the Mint, as far as I can make out, is as follows. In 1906, Sir Charles Allen, who was then the Chairman of the Corporation, proposed to the Government of India that the Mint should be removed, because it was proposed to go on with the improvement of Burra Bazar as soon as possible, and it was necessary that more space should be given to the people who were turned out of their houses by the improvements. A Committee was appointed, and five conditions were laid down which must be fulfilled by any new site. I will deal with them later. The report of that Committee seems to be shrouded in mystery. The Improvement Trust say that no decision was come to. I understand that the Government of India have told the Improvement Trust that a decision was come to; but unfortunately the Government of India forgot to tell the Government of Bengal or the Improvement Trust as to what that decision was.

"Now, be that as it may, conditions have materially altered since the year 1906, and it does not at all follow that the decision which was come to in 1906 should now be followed. The position at present is that the Improvement Trust have written through the Bengal Government to the Government of India, and the Government of India, I understand, have replied saying that the decision arrived at from 1906 to 1908, which was that the removal of the Mint was impracticable, cannot be reconsidered.

"Now, Sir, I would like to deal with the reply of the Government of India, and they give no reason why they should not reconsider their former decision, so that my only course is to deal with the conditions which were to be fulfilled in 1906, by a new site. The first condition was that the Mint should not be more than three miles from the Comptroller General's office. Well, I must say, Sir, that I do not quite see the reason for this requirement. We have got motor cars in these days, and I really do not think that it matters very much whether the Mint is three miles from the Comptroller General's Office or ten miles.

"Then they go on to say that it must not be less suitable than the present site for the purposes of Government including the import of bullion and the Currency Office work. Well, I entirely agree with the Government as regards the import of bullion, and it is absolutely necessary that the Mint should be on the railway. As regards the question of Currency office work, I understand that that means that when coin is made it has to be removed from the Mint to the Currency Office. In 1906, I think that motor lorries hardly existed and everything, I presume, was then taken by bullock carts moving about two miles an hour. Well, supposing that three miles was suitable then, that is to say, that a bullock cart would take an hour and a half to take coin from the Mint to the Currency Office and vice versa, I submit that a motor lorry could do about fifteen miles in that time, as it would run at something like ten miles per hour; so that there is no real objection on that point.

"Then we come to the third condition, that the present site should not be less convenient for the Banks and the commercial public. I think the answer to this is found by studying the personnel of the Calcutta Improvement Trust When this suggestion was made by the Improvement Trust, there were as Members of the Improvement Trust Mr. Dods of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, which, I think, is the bank most concerned with movements of bullion in Calcutta; Mr. Murray, the Vice-president of the Chamber; Sir Frank Carter, another member of the Chamber Committee; Raja Rishi Kesh Law of the Bengal National Chamber, and there was also my friend on my right* who, I am sorry to say, told me yesterday that he was going to oppose the Resolution; I have not yet discovered his reason though no doubt we will hear that later. I have spoken to a good many Marwari gentlemen and they are all exceedingly anxious that the Mint should be removed. If then the commercial public of Calcutta as represented by the gentlemen I have mentioned are not opposed to the removal of the Mint, I think that condition No. 3 really falls to the ground.

"Then we come to condition 4, namely, that the proposed site is capable of being at least as efficiently defended in case of disturbance as the present building. Well, Sir, if I were asked to draft a programme for defence for the public buildings in Calcutta, I think I should have to ask somebody else to deal with the Mint. I have the authority of the Commissioner of Police in Calcutta, who says that for this reason he would very much prefer that the Mint should be removed elsewhere.

"Then we come to No. 5, that the cost of removal, both initial and recurring, should not be prohibitive. Well, it is difficult to prophesy and I am not an expert on land values in Calcutta, but the Mint occupies an area of some 50 bighas, that is to say, about 17 acres. It is reckoned that the value of land in that part of Calcutta is something like Rs. 10,000 per kotah, i.e., 1-20th of a bigha, and I leave Members to work out that if they wish; but it comes to this, that the value of the Mint premises is something between 75 lakhs and a crore of rupees. Now I do not think there would be any difficulty in getting a site outside Calcutta, a bit further out, not necessarily outside Calcutta, for a tenth of that cost and a considerably larger site. And then there is this to be considered. The present Mint is a Mint which has been built up gradually and is more or less patchwork. The work it does is extraordinarily efficient, but I cannot help thinking that if a new Mint, a real modern Mint was built elsewhere, the cost, the recurring cost, would be very much less than it is at present; that is to say, that a Mint considerably more thorough than the present one could be built elsewhere. There is one point however, Sir, which has not been mentioned as one of the conditions, and to my mind it is far the most important, I mean the question of labour. As far as the present Mint is concerned, it is admitted at once that it is in a very central position as far as labour is concerned, and of course a Mint has to work to a certain extent spasmodically, and therefore it is very important that a place should be found where casual labour can be easily got. But the present Mint has this disadvantage, that the area is almost entirely occupied by the Mint buildings and that a large number of the staff, the superior staff, the supervising staff, have to live elsewhere. I consider that, if a site could be found somewhere else and a larger site, it would be possible to accommodate not only these officers, but also a large portion of the labour actually on the Mint premises.

* The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur.

"Now, Sir, that is really all that I have got to say on the subject, but I should like to quote one more paragraph from the letter which the Improvement Trust have sent through the Government of Bengal, to the Government of India. They say this:—

> 'The Board of Trustees for the Improvement of Calcutta are of opinion that it can be shown that the sanitary improvement of Bara Bazar will be greatly facilitated by the removal of the Mint, and that the removal of the Mint would improve the conditions under which the trade of Calcutta is carried on, and that these considerations are of such great importance to Calcutta as a port and centre of commerce that they should outweigh any administrative difficulties which may arise in connection with the removal of the Mint.'

"That is the position, Sir, and I very much hope that Government will see their way to accept this Resolution and have a thorough inquiry afresh into the conditions of Bara Bazar, and the question of removing the Mint."

1-43 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Abdur Raheem :—"Sir, I have pleasure in supporting this Resolution so ably moved by my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Crum. I am afraid, Sir, Mr. Crum has left almost nothing for me to add to the reasons he has put forward in support of his Resolution. Therefore, instead of recapitulating the whole thing, I beg to endorse every word that has been said by him, and in doing so, I wish to add only this much that as a Commissioner to the Calcutta Corporation, I fully recognise the necessity of removing the Mint to a more suitable site than that on which it now is."

1-44 P.M. The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi :—"Sir, I have much pleasure in supporting the Resolution which has just been moved by my Hon'ble friend Mr. Crum recommending the removal of the Mint from its present site. It is well known to every one in this Council that Bara Bazar is a very dense quarter of Calcutta, and it is difficult now for carts to pass through the small streets which exist at present in that locality. The Improvement Trust have contemplated that there should be roads from East to West, and these roads would be 35 feet wide and there would then be no difficulty in the passing of carts and thalis and motor vehicles through this quarter. At present it is very difficult, sometimes it is impossible, to pass through the existing roads. People live in that quarter and it is also a business quarter, and, I think, it would be better if the Mint were moved to a different place near Calcutta, where the necessary space for the houses of the guards and other officials would be available. This would lead to an improvement in the condition of Bara Bazar. I, therefore, support this Resolution of my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Crum."

1-45 P.M. The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur :—"Sir, I regret that I cannot see eye to eye with Mr. Crum in this matter. It is not that I am very much opposed to the idea of removing the Mint; but I beg to say that the removal of the Mint will not conduce to the health of Calcutta, i.e., to the health of Bara Bazar, as has been suggested by Mr. Crum. The genesis of the Improvement Trust, the reason why it was created, was that congestion in Bara Bazar should be removed, that the dirt and filth from that quarter should be removed and thereby the health of Bara Bazar improved. In the first place, Bara Bazar now-a-days is not confined to the four corners of Harrison Road and Chitpur Road and the Strand Road. It is really expanding.

" Now coming to the point of health, I may mention that the object of the Improvement Trust being to improve the health of Bara Bazar, the removal of the Mint would not conduce to that object. The modern idea of removing the Mint has originated from the fact that the Calcutta Improvement Trust has undertaken to open several roads and to create open spaces, and as a large number of insanitary houses and over-crowded houses would have to be demolished, the site of the Mint should be taken up and Marwari gentlemen permitted to build new houses there, to provide accommodation for the disturbed population of Bara Bazar. If that be so, then instead of removing the congestion and improving the health of Bara Bazar, it would rather promote congestion and endanger the health of that portion of Calcutta. The Mint occupies a very large space; nearly 17 acres of land. It is something like what the Maidan is to Chowringhee. It is the lung of Bara Bazar and if, instead of creating more open spaces, the idea is to fill up that place with large three, four and five-storied houses, then the sooner the idea is abandoned the better. I do not see why sites should be created near Bara Bazar to provide accommodation for the dehoused Marwari gentlemen. They are now-a-days not confined to the four corners of Bara Bazar ; they are expanding ; they have invaded the southern quarters of the town, Kalighat, Bhowanipore and other places. They have been expanding and buying building sites and erecting large houses in every part of Calcutta. Formerly they liked the idea that they should remain very close to one another in Bara Bazar. But that is an exploded idea now, that idea has now been abandoned, and they are now expanding everywhere. In these circumstances, it is not necessary that any attempt should be made to find space—especially near Bara Bazar—to provide accommodation for the dislodged population. As I pointed out before, the object of the Trust is to create more open spaces and they have undertaken to provide several squares in Bara Bazar. It would be disastrous, it would be dangerous, to the health of the people, if this space was filled up by the houses of Marwari gentlemen, which are always three, four and five storeys high.

" Not only from the financial point of view, but also from the political point of view, it is not very safe to have the Mint in an isolated place. From the financial point of view, the cost would be very great indeed. Now-a-days, especially since the last ten years, the price of land in Calcutta has been going up. It has gone up by how many per cent I cannot say; it has been going up by leaps and bounds. Formerly, lands even in my quarter, which used to sell for Rs. 2,000, are now selling for Rs. 10,000 a cottah. In Beadon Street and other places lands which were sold for Rs. 2,000 are now selling for more than Rs. 10,000, and in the area which has been improved by the Improvement Trust, which is known as Soorti Bagan, lands have been selling lately at Rs. 30,000 a cottah. Even in the suburbs this phenomenal rise in prices has taken place. So it would from the financial point of view, from the point of view of the Government, be extremely expensive to find out adequate and necessary space close to Calcutta. Of course, if the Mint is located in an isolated place, the cost would be less. But I doubt very much whether it would be wise to locate the Mint in an isolated place. There is another aspect of the question. However high the authority may be—I bow of course to the authority of the Commissioner of Police—I beg to maintain that it would not be very wise to remove the Mint out of Calcutta. In the case of a disturbance or riot the first object of the mob is to loot the Treasuries. If that is possible, from that point of view, the Mint should be located as close as possible to the headquarters of the Commissioner of Police and the Fort. Now-a-days, the Mint is very conveniently situated. It would be dangerous, I should say, to allow the Mint to be removed to a long distance in the suburbs. I have no particular objection to the removal of the Mint, but my opposition simply arises from the fact that it would be dangerous to the health of Bara Bazar to have the Mint removed and to allow that space to be taken up by our Marwari friends."

1-44 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard :—" Sir, I need not detain the Council very long over this matter. The Hon'ble Mr. Crum has explained the objects of his proposal very clearly and I do not wish to adopt any non-possumus attitude in the matter. I think that, first of all, I had better remove one or two misconceptions. Firstly, I had better state what the history of this previous Committee was. The Committee did sit, as the Hon'ble Mover says, but after holding two or three meetings the Committee seemed somehow or other to have fizzled out and, though they came to no decision on the subject, they met no further, and Sir James Meston, who had been on the Committee, eventually, some time in 1908, wrote the following note about it :

> ' The Committee never met again. The whole scheme was an impracticable one : and none of us could see anything in favour of it, with the exception of its originator the Chairman of the Corporation, who had the somewhat half-hearted support of Mr. Bertram The cost of moving the Mint would have been prohibitive : the reasons for it were feeble, as it provides far more air space than the buildings by which the Corporation would have replaced it ; and before any decision could possibly have been come to, Government had sunk a large amount of additional capital on the site. Finally, there was no evidence that the Calcutta Improvement Trust, when it begins its labours, would have required the Mint site ; or that, if it had, it would have been able to offer Government any compensation for removal. '

As the matter was noted on in this informal way, no communication on the subject was unfortunately made to the Government of Bengal at the time.

" Coming to the recent reference from the Bengal Government, they did not, as we read their letter, ask us to proceed with the matter in any way, but merely put to us an inquiry as to what had been done. We understood that the Bengal Government merely desired to be informed of the previous decision of the Government of India in the matter, and accordingly, proceeding on what Sir James Meston had said at that time, we told them what had been decided and said we did not propose to re-open the question. I do not however wish, as I have said, to resist the Hon'ble Mr. Crum's Resolution, because I recognise that, even from our point of view, the present Mint site is not ideal for all the purposes he has mentioned and the site is in some ways cramped and inconvenient. But, in agreeing to the question being re-opened, I must not be understood in any way to commit the Government of India to agreeing to its final removal, if we are not provided with an equally suitable site for all our purposes or if it is considered on inquiry that there are other obvious weighty objections which prevent the proposal being proceeded with.

" I agree with the Hon'ble Mr. Crum as to the points of importance to be considered in connection with the site of a Mint. The question of the distance of three miles from the Comptroller General's office can now be dismissed as of no importance. The Comptroller General's Department now has nothing to do with the Mints ; they are now under the Controller of Currency. But I attach considerable importance to the Mint being within very easy reach of the Currency Office, as well as of the Banks and of the commercial portions of the town. I think Mr. Cook will confirm my statement when I say that last year, when the currency crisis and the rush for rupees was at its height, it was a matter of minutes whether we could get rupees from the Mint to the Currency Office in time, and there can be no question whatever of having the Mint at a distance where, with a motor car, it would take an hour and a half to get rupees to the Currency Office. I may say that I am rather surprised at the attitude of the Bengal Chamber representative in the matter and of the Banks. I would just like to detain the Council for a few minutes while I read what they said with regard to previous proposals for the removal of the Mint. The Hon'ble Mr. Crum has not gone into that previous history as he might have done. In 1902, there was a proposal to close the Calcutta Mint and to remove the Bombay Mint to another site at or near Bombay. The Bengal Chamber of Commerce, writing on the 9th of July 1902, strongly resisted the proposal for closing the Calcutta Mint and with regard to removing the Bombay Mint outside Bombay said :—

> 'A very strong feeling exists, especially amongst the banking community, against the removal of the Bombay Mint from its present site. The Committee are decidedly of opinion that the risk to banks, merchants and the public generally, of having to convey to or from a Mint situated outside Bombay large amounts of coin and/or bullion is one that they should not be called upon to undertake.'

"The Bombay Chamber of Commerce on similar lines objected to the proposal, and in their letter it was said 'I am to say that it is the unanimous and strong opinion of my Committee and of the Banks consulted that the site of the Mint should be central and close to the Banks. It need scarcely be stated that the transmission of treasure of any kind to a Mint outside or on the outskirts of Bombay would entail grave inconvenience and risk.'

"I do not think I need go beyond the opinion of the commercial communities themselves in this matter.

"There was one argument that Mr. Crum brought forward, and that I cannot think was quite justifiable. He said that some of the Mint supervising staff have to be accommodated elsewhere. But the reason for this is, that in order to improve commercial facilities, we gave up some years ago a considerable portion of our land to the Port Trust thereby displacing many of our staff. Mr. Crum's argument seems to amount to this: that because we have given up some of our land for commercial facilities in Calcutta, we should therefore now remove ourselves bag and baggage from the site.

"There is also the important question of cost. When the question of the removal of the Calcutta Mint was under consideration in 1906 or 1907, it was estimated that this would cost between 25 to 30 lakhs at the least. Sir James Meston, knowing as we do how these estimates are apt to be pitched rather low, estimated that at the lowest the cost would be 35 lakhs. It is certain at the present time that the cost would be considerably more; and though it is true that Government might in time be compensated by the money received from the site made over to the Improvement Trust, it is obvious that in the meantime they would be out of pocket for a very considerable sum.

"In accepting Mr. Crum's Resolution I must be understood to do so with these qualifications, that I am quite prepared to have an inquiry, but we cannot commit ourselves, the whole question will have to be carefully gone into and a decision arrived at when we know what site it is proposed to give us and what the cost is likely to be and so forth."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum:— "Sir, I must thank the Finance Minister for the sympathetic way in which he has received my proposal, and I quite understand, of course, that nothing this committee might do would absolutely commit Government. 2-3 P.M.

"There are one or two points, however, to which I should like to refer. I never knew of Sir James Meston's note, and I submit that the position is entirely changed since Sir James Meston wrote that note. That was in 1908, and as I said we are now in the days of motor transport, which entirely alters the position. The same consideration applies to the distance from the Currency office, and as regards the question of distance from the banks which the Hon'ble the Finance Minister alluded to and which was discussed in 1902, I think my comparison between the bullock cart doing two miles an hour and the motor lorry moving at ten miles an hour comes in, because it is evident that it is much more difficult to safeguard a string of bullock carts than it is to safeguard one substantial motor lorry.

"With regard to the remarks of the Hon'ble Member on my right,* he likened the Mint to a maidan, that is to say, he said that the Mint is to Burra Bazar what the maidan is to the rest of Calcutta. Well, I am afraid that I cannot see the similarity. The maidan is an open area without any single building, with green grass and nice clumps of trees. The Mint has a very considerable number of buildings, is almost covered with buildings. The maidan is hardly peopled during the day except for a few people wandering about. During the day the Mint is very fully populated indeed; a very large number of men work very hard. The only similarity that I can see is, that the Mint premises have a tank in the middle of them, and the maidan has several tanks; but the tanks on the maidan are nice clean tanks where you see people fishing, while as regards the tank in the Mint premises, it is dirty and unclean with steam always issuing from it and is a most unsavoury place altogether . . . .

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur:—"May I interrupt my Hon'ble friend ?"

The Vice-President:—"The Hon'ble Member will address the Chair."

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur:—"May I interrupt my Hon'ble friend for a moment ? I said that the western portion of the Mint was quite open."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum:—"I think that I may well content myself with leaving my Hon'ble friend to the tender mercies of the other members of the Improvement Trust when he returns to Calcutta. As I say, Sir, I thank the Hon'ble the Finance Member for accepting my Resolution, and I quite understand the terms under which he accepts it."

The motion was put and the Resolution was adopted.

The Council then adjourned till Wednesday, the 17th September, 1919, at 11 A.M.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

(5 & 6 Geo. V, Ch. 61.)

The Council met at the Council Chamber, Viceregal Lodge, Simla, on Wednesday, the 17th September, 1919.

PRESENT :

His Excellency BARON CHELMSFORD, P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., G.C.M.G., G.C.B.E., Viceroy and Governor General, presiding, and 52 Members, of whom 44 were Additional Members.

The President :—" Before we commence proceedings to-day I wish to call the attention of Hon'ble Members to the two specimen tablets which have been placed in the entrance hall to the Council Chamber. They have been prepared under the directions of the Indian Soldiers Board and it is intended to erect a replica of one or other of the specimens, with the appropriate numbers inserted, in every village throughout British India which has contributed any considerable number of recruits to the war, leaving it to Local Governments to arrange for the appropriate setting. The two specimen tablets have been made, one in marble and the other in cast iron. They have been exhibited here in the hope that Hon'ble Members will criticise them from the point of view of material, design and inscription, and that any such criticisms will be conveyed to the Secretary of the Indian Soldiers Board. If Hon'ble Members would like to meet and discuss the matter, my Colleague, Sir George Lowndes, will be glad to arrange for this. 11 A.M.

I think there is one matter in connection with the tablets which Hon'ble Members might consider. They will notice that on the tablets the dates are 1914-1919. I would suggest for consideration whether, instead of these dates, we should not insert the actual date of the commencement of hostilities, i.e., August the 4th, 1914, and the date of the Armistice in 1918.

We will now proceed with the business of the day."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

11-5 A.M.

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur asked

Express train service between Madras and Manmad, etc.

1. " Do Government propose—

(a) to abolish the Express train service between Madras and Manmad, and (b) to add Intermediate class carriages to the G. I. P. mail train between Bombay and Delhi ? "

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied :—

" (a) The Express train service between Madras and Manmad was discontinued in 1917. The question of its re-introduction will be considered when the present shortage of engines on the Madras and Southern Mahratta Railway has been made good by replacements from England.

'(b) It is not proposed to attach Intermediate class carriages to the Bombay Delhi Mail the load of which is strictly limited. Such accommodation is, however, provided on the fast Express between Bombay and Delhi."

Subordinate Accounts Service (Posts and Telegraphs.)

2. " Do Government propose to consider—

(a) whether any reasonable saving in public expenditure cannot be effected by abolishing the present distinction between junior and senior Accountants among the members of the All-India Subordinate Accounts Service (Posts and Telegraphs) ; and

(b) whether a proportion of the vacancies on the staff of the Subordinate Accounts Service cannot be reserved for the members of the backward provinces and the depressed classes, and whether such members will be exempted from the operation of the rules for departmental examinations ? "

" The answer is in the negative to both portions of the question."

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur, asked :—

Restoration of train services in India.

3. " Have any steps been taken to restore the train services in India to what they were in pre-war days ? "

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied :—

" The Hon'ble Member's attention is drawn to the reply given on the 1st March last, to a similar question asked by the Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur.

Some of the pre-war services have been restored, but a return to the full normal standard can only be gradual, as the replacement of engines and rolling stock from England must necessarily take some time."

Coal supplies.

4. "(a) Is it a fact that on the 22nd April last, the Coal Controller declared, with the approval of the Government of India, that no coal special indents would be certified on and from the 1st July, 1919, and all coal special indents would cease to be valid on and from the 1st August 1919, from which date coal consumers and dealers would have to arrange to draw their coal supplies from collieries by the ordinary methods which were in force prior to the introduction of the special indent system, and that the post of Coal Controller would be abolished early in May, but the work would continue to be carried on by the then Deputy Coal Controller under the designation of 'Coal Transportation Officer,' Railway Board ?

(b) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing the maintenance charges of the Coal Transportation Officer and his establishment ?

(c) Is it a fact that the Coal Controller suggested to Government that the post of the Coal Transportation Officer might be abolished towards September, 1919, if not earlier ?

(d) If so, do Government intend to give effect to the suggestion of the Coal Controller ? If not, why not ?

(e) Have Government received any scheme or notes from the Coal Transportation Officer with regard to the wagon supply for coal and with regard to the maintenance of his post and his establishment ? If so, will Government be pleased to lay those schemes or notes on the table ? "

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied :—

" (a) The facts stated by the Hon'ble Member are substantially correct.

(b) A Statement* is laid on the table.

(c) The answer is 'yes,' but the Coal Controller recognised the possibility of the continuance of the appointment being necessary should the shortage of rail transport continue.

(d) The Government are anxious, and intend to put an end to the control of coal transportation at the earliest moment consistent with safety.

(e) Except as regards estimates of cost for which figures are given in reply to (b) above the answer is in the negative. "

The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur asked :—

Tent accommodation at old Delhi.

5. " (a) Is it a fact that in the orders regarding accommodation at old Delhi issued in 1913, it was stated that officers drawing Rs. 1,000 and under and clerks, European and Indian, who were to be accommodated in tents, would have the free use of tents, furniture, water and lighting ; and that hitherto such officers and clerks have not been charged for the use of tents, furniture, water and lighting ?

(b) Do Government now propose to revise this order, and are these officers and clerks to be charged for the use of furniture, water and lighting ?

(c) Is it not a fact that there has been a tremendous increase in the cost of living and that the officers and clerks mentioned above have memorialised Government for increase of salary, etc. ?

(d) If the replies be in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to give the reasons for departure from a definite promise ?

(e) Do Government propose to stay the enforcement of the order for payment of rent, etc., so long as the men have to be accommodated in tents ? "

*Vide Appendix A.

" (a) The answer is in the affirmative, but the orders issued in 1913 applied only to the cold seasons of 1912-1913 and 1913-1914.

(b) The answer is in the affirmative.

(c) There has undoubtedly been a great rise in the cost of living since 1914. Memorials from the ministerial establishments of the Government of India, praying for an increase of salary, are now under consideration and it is hoped will be disposed of without delay.

(d) No definite promise has ever been made that officers and clerks drawing Rs. 1,000 a month or less accommodated in tents at Delhi will have the free use of the tents, furniture, water and lighting for future seasons. The latest orders on the subject, issued in October 1914, merely continued the concession until further orders. It is now being withdrawn, except as regards the free use of tents, because it is essential that quarters in New Delhi should be occupied as soon as they are completed, and that the amount of tent accommodation provided should be reduced to a minimum. It is considered that officers and clerks will be reluctant to occupy these quarters if they are allowed to occupy tents on unduly favourable terms.

Manufacture of cement and importation of spirits in the Punjab.

6. " Will Government be pleased to state who enjoys the privilege of—

(a) manufacturing cement in the Punjab ; and

(b) importing spirits and industrial alcohol into that province ? "

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

" (a) There are no restrictions on the manufacture of cement in the Punjab.

(b) The classes of persons who can import spirit into that Province, as laid down in the Punjab Excise Manual, are :—

(1) all persons who import it within the limits of private possession,

(2) all licensed vendors, and

(3) all persons holding passes and permits granted by the authorities concerned.

The Government of India have no information as to the names of persons authorised to import spirits, and if that is the information which the Hon'ble Member requires, he should apply to the Local Government."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinashaw Wacha asked :—

Sale of surplus Military stores.

7. " How do Government propose to sell surplus military stores ? "

The Hon'ble Major-General Sir Alfred Bingley replied :—

" It is understood that the term 'surplus military stores' means engineering and textile stores which were purchased to meet actual or estimated military demands and are now surplus to requirements.

"The Hon'ble Member is referred to the three Press Communiqués* copies of which are laid upon the table."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

8. "Will Government be pleased to state the programme of post-war trade with enemy countries?" Post-war trade.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"I would invite the Hon'ble Member's attention to the Department of Commerce and Industry Notifications Nos. 2030, 3563, 4207, 5715 and 6403, dated respectively, the 26th April, the 31st May, the 21st June, the 2nd August and 23rd August, 1919, and published in Part I of the Gazette of India of the same dates. Copies of these Notifications have been laid on the table for the Hon'ble Member's convenience. It will be observed that, subject to certain restrictions, trade with the countries which were recently our enemies is now permissible. I cannot at the present moment give any detailed statement explaining in full the policy which may be adopted with regard to trade with the Central powers, but I may say that, while it will be necessary both in our own internal interests and in those of the Empire as a whole to continue to control to some extent and for some period the import or export of certain commodities, we hope that these restrictions may be in course of time removed, so that the trado of the country may resume its normal course."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

9. "(a) What was the amount of Savings Banks deposits on 31st March 1919 and the average amount of deposit per head of depositors on that date? Savings Banks deposits.

(b) Has there not been a marked decline in the average amount per head since 1913 (when it was 141·38) as shown by the following figures?

1914-15	... ...	Rs. 90·58	per head.
1915-16	... ...	" 92·27	"
1916-17	... ...	" 100·73	"
1917-18	... ...	" 101·27	" ".

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"(a) The amount of Savings Banks deposits on the 31st of March 1919, was Rs. 18,82,44,748.

The average amount of deposit per head of depositors on the same date was Rs. 112·22, which as the Hon'ble Member will observe is a marked increase on the figure for the previous year.

(b) My Hon'ble friend will have noticed that there is a marked decline in the first two years of the war on the figures for the year immediately preceding the war, and that this decline is gradually being made good. The decline in the first year of the war was very likely due to alarm among the big holders. In later years the comparatively low average of deposits per head is probably due to the fact that some people who would have made deposits in the Savings Bank invested their money in the War Loan and others in like manner invested their money in Post Office Certificates, and some withdrew their money from the Savings Bank for that purpose. The War Loan and the Post Office Certificates both of course offered a higher rate of interest than the Savings Bank."

Purchase of rails, wagons, etc.

10. "Will Government be pleased to state (a) the number of rails, wagons (passenger and goods) and other railway materials purchased or agreed to be purchased with the money sanctioned in this year's budget, (b) their pre-war and present costs, and (c) the countries in which, and the names of firms with which, orders have been placed ?"

"(a) The total purchases of railway rolling stock and materials during the current financial year both on Capital and Revenue accounts are expected to amount to Rs. 4120·98 lakhs, of which 2227·99 lakhs will be in England, 323·05 lakhs in America, and the balance of 1569·94 lakhs in India.

The numbers of rails, wagons, etc., to be purchased with funds allotted in this year's budget are as follows :—

	Miles.
Rails	878
Carriages	1,136
Wagons	17,738
Brake vans	1,267

together with large quantities of miscellaneous railway materials.

(b) It is not possible to give exact figures for pre-war and present costs of railway materials, but the rise in prices has been approximately :—

	Per cent
Rails	100
Carriages	120
Wagons	120
Brake vans	120

(c) A list* showing the countries in which and the names of firms, so far as known, with whom orders in respect of State-worked railways have been placed, is laid on the table."

The Hon'ble Khan Bahadur Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer asked :—

Increase of pension to officers retained on account of the war.

11. "Will officers whose services were continued owing to the exigencies of the war, though they had attained the age of 55, be entitled to an increase of pension on account of such extension of service ?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

"In the case of officers whose service before they had reached the age of 55 had entitled them to the maximum pension admissible to officers of the service to which they belong, it is not under contemplation to grant any increase of such pension. In the case of officers who had not qualified for the maximum pension, service during extension will, following the ordinary practice, be taken into account for determining the amount of pension admissible."

Muhammadan education.

12. " (a) What action has been taken by Local Governments on the letters Nos. 585-595, dated 3rd April, 1913, addressed to them on the subject of Muhammadan education ?

(b) Have local committees been appointed to consider the question of Muhammadan education as suggested in those letters ? If so, in what Provinces ?

(c) What recommendations have been made by these committees ?

(d) To what extent have such recommendations been carried out ?

(e) Have all the recommendations been carried out yet ? If not, will Government state the reasons ? "

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi replied :—

" The circular letter referred to by the Hon'ble Member was issued on the 3rd April 1913, commending the whole question of Muhammadan education to the careful attention of Local Governments, and suggesting the advisability of convening local Committees. Local Committees were accordingly convened in some provinces. The Governments of Bengal, Bombay, Bihar and Orissa, and the United Provinces issued resolutions dealing with the recommendations of their respective Committees. The United Provinces' resolution of 25th August 1914 among other things dealt with the position and needs of the Muhammadan community in the matter of primary education. It is not specifically known to what extent these recommendations have been carried out, but for further information the Hon'ble Member is referred to Chapter XVII of the 7th Quinquennial Review which deals with the subject of Muhammadan education and to the heading IV—Education of special classes in the annual narrative 'Indian Education' in 1917-1918."

The Hon'ble Khan Bahadur Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer asked :—

The General Provident Fund.

13. " (a) Are Government considering the desirability of raising the rate of interest that is at present allowed on the General Provident Fund for State servants ?

(b) Is it a fact that higher rates of interest than before are now prevalent in the country and are also allowed on Government loans ? "

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

" The answer to both portions of the question is in the affirmative."

The Hon'ble Khan Bahadur Ebrahim Haroon Jaffer asked :—

Number of Indians admitted into the Indian Educational Service.

14. " Will Government be pleased to state how many Indians have recently been admitted into the Indian Educational Service in the whole of India and give figures as to the different Provinces and the creeds of the men so admitted ? "

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi replied

"A Statement* giving the information is laid on the table. It omits certain appointments very recently made whose confirmation is conditional upon medical examination, also the case of three Indians who have recently been appointed in temporary posts on pay analogous to that of the Indian Education Service.

The statement which I am now placing on the table supplies the information asked for for the last 20 months province by province. The net result is that 29 Indians have been appointed, of whom 25 were Hindus, one Muhammadan, one Sikh, one Parsi and one Christian."

Export of food-grains from India.

15. "(a) Will Government be pleased to state the exact nature of their understanding with the Royal Commission on wheat supplies, in regard to the export of rice and other food-grains, and how far the same has been carried out?

(b) Is it a fact that there has been a rationing arrangement under which India has to send out food-grains to certain foreign countries? If so, will Government be pleased to state full particulars thereof?"

"(a) The Royal Commission on wheat supplies was appointed in England in October, 1916, to purchase and control the delivery of wheat on behalf of the British Government. Its operations in India were controlled by the Government of India through the Wheat Commissioner in respect of such matters as the quantities of wheat to be purchased in given periods and the prices to be paid for the wheat. This control was exercised both with the object of safeguarding the internal situation in India and also of co-ordinating purchases by different Government departments. The Secretary of State was warned on the 21st of July 1918 that it would probably be necessary still further to cut down the Royal Commission's programme which had already been reduced, and, as was announced at the time, the purchase of wheat for export overseas to all destinations other than Mesopotamia was definitely stopped in the beginning of October 1918. The purchase of lentils and peas by the Royal Commission was continued on a small scale till the middle of November 1918 but was then stopped.

In October 1917 when the price of paddy in Burma had fallen to a very low level the Royal Commission undertook to purchase large quantities of Burma rice at a price considerably above the market rate then ruling, and to provide freight for its carriage to European destinations. Their requirements of Burma rice for 1919 were stated at one million tons, but they were informed in December last that not more than 300,000 tons could be spared, and subsequently the offer of this quantity was also withdrawn by the Government of India. As a result no rice of the 1918-19 crop has been exported by or to the order of the Royal Commission on Wheat Supplies. The Government of India's understanding with the Commission does not extend, so far as rice is concerned, beyond permitting the export of rice of the 1917-18 crop purchased prior to December 1918, of this 66,321 tons have been shipped since the 1st January 1919 and a balance of 18,829 tons remains to be shipped.

(b) It is a fact that in restricting exports of food-grains from India the Government of India have recognised their obligation not to withhold supplies altogether from certain territories normally dependent on India for food. Strictly limited allotments have, therefore, been made to these territories, and in framing these allotments the chief consideration has been the extent to which supplies were required for the consumption of Indian pilgrims and Indians resident abroad. By far the greater part of the territories benefiting by this scheme have been British. A Statement* is placed on the table showing how far foreign countries have participated."

The Hon'ble Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia asked :—

Increase of pay in the Provincial Services on account of rise in prices.

16. " (a) Is it a fact that Government servants in the Provincial services have been hard hit by the rise in prices? If the reply be in the affirmative, will Government be pleased to say when they propose to consider the question of increase of pay of those services?

(b) Has necessary relief by increase of pay been afforded in the case of certain other services on the recommendation of the Public Services Commission?"

"Members of the provincial services have doubtless been seriously affected by the rise in prices, like all other persons on fixed incomes. In regard to the remaining portions of the question the Hon'ble Member is referred to the answer given on the 15th instant to a similar question by the Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, I beg to move that the Bill be passed. We have received no amendments and no suggestions with regard to this Bill, which consists of but a number of small amendments. I may mention that nearly half the amendments embodied in the Bill are owing to the establishment of a High Court of Judicature in the Punjab, and I am quite sure that some of my Hon'ble friends who represent that Province will be gratified with the leading part that their Province has played even in so innocent a Bill as this."

THE INDIAN TARIFF (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"My Lord, I beg to move that the Bill further to amend the Indian Tariff Act, 1894, be taken into consideration." 11-30 A.M.

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, I beg to move :— 11-31 A.M.

'that in column 4 in clause 3 for the words and figures '15 per cent' the words and figures '20 per cent' be substituted.'

"My Lord, we agreed to the introduction of this Bill with great alacrity because we were assured that the object of the Bill was to protect the Indian tanning industry, and the Indian leather industry, and that the Government felt it incumbent upon them to bring forward the present Bill in order to effect that purpose. We were also told that the imposition of this duty would not in any manner be calculated to prevent or hamper the export trade of India in hides and skins, and it was on that assurance that we consented gladly to the introduction of this Bill. There were certain clauses which we felt would operate in the direction of giving India a favourable position. Even prior to the war there was a steadily growing increase in the quantity and value of the exports of raw hides and skins. The war makes a certain difference also, because a large number of cattle have, I believe, been slaughtered for the purpose of furnishing food to the population and to the soldiers in Europe and elsewhere, and the demands for hides and skins from India is not likely to diminish therefore in the future. On that assurance and basis the question would be as to whether we should have a duty of 15 per cent or 20 per cent. I remember reading recently in books dealing with war finance and trade that a duty of 20 per cent could be levied without the duty being of a protectionist character, merely as a revenue duty, and I believe some of the recommendations of the London Chamber of Commerce are in partial support of this view. Therefore, even looking at the question from the revenue standpoint, I do not think that 20 per cent is likely to hamper trade. If I am told that the result of levying a duty of 20 per cent would be to prevent any countries from taking the raw hides and skins of India, or that it would prejudicially affect the trade by reason of a large reduction of the trade, certainly I shall not press this amendment, but I think having regard to the manufacturing profits in other countries, and having regard to the remarks made by the Hon'ble Member for Commerce as regards the world requirements it would not have that effect and even from the strictly revenue point of view, it would be justifiable to levy a duty of 20 per cent provided it would not be a hardship upon the agriculturist and other exporters of these hides and skins. During recent years no doubt on account of reduced shipping facilities and prohibition orders, the price of raw hides fell considerably, but having regard to the enormous inflation of currency and the growth of prices in almost every country, I think that the exporter of hides and skins would get, and has been getting, a very large increase over his pre-war profits and pre-war prices, and that is so notably in the case of skins, and consequently an export duty of 20 per cent would not unduly diminish the price to the exporter and the agriculturist.

"Then, my Lord, there was another point to which I wish to allude, and it is this. The object of this duty is, if possible, to divert the trade in raw hides and skins from the enemy countries, Germany and Austria-Hungary, which have in the past largely taken our raw hides and skins, in favour of the British Empire and possibly the Allies. Well, I think, I am justified in saying that the Government have thought that the measures that they are bringing forward will be able to effectuate that purpose. If they are able to effectuate that purpose by the proposals of the Government, Hon'ble Members will see that we shall collect an export duty of only 5 per cent, because every one of the countries from which the trade is intended to be diverted is either a country foreign to the British Empire or an Allied country for which, I am sure, the League of Nations would ask for favourable treatment, and, consequently, the net result of the proposals of the Government might be —I hope I shall be shown to be wrong—if they really divert the trade from foreign countries, to impose a duty of only 5 per cent in favour of India. Well, from the revenue point of view, a 5 per cent duty would certainly be an extremely small duty having regard to the enormous growth of prices in raw hides and skins. We must remember that we pay an export duty on several articles, that we have an ad valorem import duty of 7½ per cent. on other articles, and a third of 20 per cent which would be collected from the rest of the Empire would give us only 6⅔ per cent . . . ."

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"I think the Hon'ble Member is under the impression that the rebate is to extend to the Allies as well as to the Empire. That is not the case; that is not proposed by the Bill."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I was under that impression. Column 4 of clause 3 says 'or of any territories under the protection of His Majesty or in respect of which a mandate of the League of Nations is exercised by the Government of any part of His Majesty's dominions.' I am wrong, but that does not make any very great difference in respect of my argument for the simple reason that, excepting in the case of skins to America, I will not say the whole, but a large portion, of the trade is confined to the United Kingdom. On an analysis of the figures, Hon'ble Members will find that the enemy countries were taking in 1913-14 nearly 5 million pounds worth of raw hides and skins, and other countries, in so far as that portion of the trade is concerned, were not taking very large quantities. Now, I take it that the object is really to divert the trade, as I have said, if possible, from foreign countries to the British Empire and to the other countries forming the British Empire, and I shall proceed upon that supposition. If that object is achieved, and, I think, it is an object which ought to be achieved, then, from the point of view which I have suggested, the duty on exports to the rest of the Empire would be only really 5 per cent—⅓ of the general rate 15 per cent. If the general rate be 20 per cent, the duty would be only 6⅔ per cent and cannot by any means be said to be protectionist. For the reasons that I have mentioned the agriculturists would not be hit hard by reason of the enormous growth in prices. There is also another point which I also had in mind when I brought forward this amendment, which would be more pertinent really in speaking on the other amendment, but which has some bearing upon this, and, therefore, I shall mention it, Hon'ble Members will find, if they turn to page 72 of the Review of Trade for India for 1917-18, that on dressed and tanned skins the United States of America imposes an import duty of 15 per cent and Japan 51 per cent. Therefore, the United States have felt that a duty of 15 per cent was necessary to protect their tanning trade against the Indian industry, because almost all the skins imported are, I believe, from India. They have got no import duty whatever on raw hides and skins; they have got an import duty on dressed hides and skins. And Hon'ble Members will find, turning to the figures for the United States' revenue, that this duty was not levied for revenue purposes, because the revenue has been steadily decreasing up to the year 1915, and the total revenue also is about 2·6 million dollars on manufactured leather and about a few thousand dollars (97,004) in respect of raw hides and skins. The duty was levied therefore for the purpose of protection, and that the protection was effectual is seen from the fact that the revenue was decreasing from year to year. I took it therefore that, in order that protection may be effectual, the duty would range somewhere between 15 and 51, and, therefore, inasmuch as we have started with the assumption that the Indian tanning merchants would have to be protected in order that the trade may not disappear, we must make our duty run betwen 15 and 51 per cent in respect of all countries whether belonging to the Empire or not. I hope I shall be shown to be wrong and that a smaller duty would effectuate the object of protecting India against other countries. There is a larger question raised upon the other amendment, but I will take it that the object of the Government is to protect India as against other parts of the Empire, showing a preference to the other parts of the Empire no doubt some preference, but at the same time so as not to defeat the object in view. If that be so, I would ask how an export duty of 5 per cent in favour of the rest of the British Empire would effectuate that object. I therefore thought that a slight increase might do the work a little more effectually than the 5 per cent that has been suggested, and, so far as the present . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes :—" My Lord, the Hon'ble Member is speaking to the second of his amendments. If he could take his amendments separately, it would be a great convenience. "

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—" If my second amendment is not carried I have suggested a rebate of one-third in favour of the rest of the British Empire. I find from the report of the proceedings of the House of Commons of the 30th April at page 126, that the Empire Preference is stated to be one-third. Assuming a 20 per cent duty and one-third rebate, the net duty 13⅔ would be the duty as against the rest of the Empire. It would be nearer the 15 per cent which has been imposed by the United States. Therefore, if there be a rebate of ⅓ unless you raise the duty from 15 per cent to 20 per cent, you would not effectuate the object which the Indian Government and all of us have at heart, namely, the protection of Indian industries. Mr. Austen Chamberlain speaking on the British Budget said :—

> ' As I have said, the range of our existing duties is small. It falls mainly into three classes. (1) There are the new Customs duties imposed . . which carry with them no corresponding Excise duty on cinematograph films, clocks and watches, motor cars and musical instruments. On these duties I propose to fix the preference at one-third, which is what I may call the general Empire rate, in so far as a general Empire rate exists.'

Then he goes on and cuts it down to ⅙th in case of tea. Therefore, taking the Empire rate to be one-third, if my amendment be accepted the duty would be 20 per cent and the rest of the Empire would pay 13⅓ per cent; that is not much. It will not cause any hardship to the Colonies or the rest of the Empire. When we are told that we have a practical monopoly and when 20 per cent may be levied as a revenue duty, I think that there is no harm whatsoever in accepting my amendment asking for an increase to 20 per cent. I may also invite the attention of Hon'ble Members to the fact that for purely revenue purposes the United Kingdom as well as other countries are imposing duties to a very much larger extent than I have proposed in my amendment. For instance the duty imposed by the United Kingdom on coffee is 18 per cent and on tea it is 60 per cent ; on sugar it is equivalent to 18 per cent. We know that England was a free-trade country until recently, and these duties were imposed purely for purposes of revenue, and therefore a 20 per cent export duty cannot be complained against by any countries, whether included in the British Empire or not on the ground that it is excessive or prohibitive in its incidence. "

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—" My Lord, I beg to oppose this amendment. It is very difficult to say what would be the effect of this amendment to increase the export duty. But the position is that at present it is admitted that India cannot tan all her own hides and skins. Therefore, I consider it very important that any duty of this sort should be imposed gradually. I may say that I have telegrams from several raw hides and 11-43 A.M. skins export associations asking that the duty may be considerably reduced. Well, I do not propose to support that. I think that probably this 15 per cent duty is a fair duty, and I do not think that the Hon'ble Member is right when he suggests that the net result would be a protective duty of very much less than 15 per cent, if I understood him rightly. Certainly other countries like America, and, probably as soon as we trade with the Central Empires, they also, will continue to take our hides and skins, probably in decreasing quantities, but at any rate in very considerable quantities for a number of years. As regards what the Hon'ble Member said about the American import duty on tanned hides and skins, I would just like to say that the duty was removed in 1914. There is no duty into America now on tanned hides and skins. I suggest that what America did was, as I said when the motion was first made to introduce the Bill, to build up her industry by a protective duty on leather, but as soon as she fairly well established her position she then removed the duty."

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes :—" My Lord, this amendment proposes directly to increase the proposed duty from 15 to 20 per cent. We fixed the figure of 15 per cent after making inquiries in every possible direction, and after taking the advice of the best expert advisers that we could find in India. We believe that this figure of 15 per cent is the right figure as between the various interests concerned. Yesterday I listened with great interest to the speech of the Hon'ble Mover of this amendment when he pleaded for an all-India view. That was in relation to Burma rice. He wanted to get cheap Burma rice into Madras. I would ask him whether he is taking an all-India view to-day. He is now, I take it, looking at the case through Madras spectacles, and through the spectacles of the Madras tanners. I have in my hands a telegram from Rangoon asking that no duty be imposed at all. Surely, we have the exact reverse of yesterday's picture. Yesterday the Hon'ble Member wanted to get cheap rice into Madras ; accordingly he then said 'I am all for the unity of India '. To-day he wants to enlarge the duty in a way that may prejudice the hide producers of Rangoon and Burma. Here apparently the Hon'ble Member is for the interests of Madras as against the interests of Burma and is consequently opposed to view that India is one. I regret, My Lord, that I cannot accept the Hon'ble Mover's amendment. "

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha :—" My Lord, it is certainly time when we are on the threshold of a new industrial evolution to protect the young industries of India, particularly leather. But while we attempt to impose duties for the protection of these young industries, let the duty be neither too exorbitant so as to arrest the rate of progress of the industry nor too small as not to be worth our while at all to impose. Therefore, in a matter of this kind, when India is just entering upon a new industry of great promise which has to be temporarily protected though not against the sound principles of free trade, it is far better that we go by the golden mean. That golden mean is the one suggested by the Hon'ble Sir George Barnes, and I consider it to be very good. In fact it conforms to the principle of how young industries should be started as recommended by free trade experts, of whom Professor Tanssig is not the least ; and at the same time is one which will heartily commend itself to all members of this Council. I therefore oppose this amendment of Mr. Sarma."

11-47 A.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—" My Lord, I can assure the Hon'ble the Commerce Member, whom I thank for the policy underlying this Bill, that I have not in the least the Madras interest or any sectional interest in view in putting forward this amendment. I have no interest in it except as part of the general trade problem of the whole of India. I am not concerned with the Madras trade as such. If the Commerce Member had shown that in this respect the interests of Madras are opposed to the rest of India, I would certainly have nothing more to say; the interests of Madras cannot have any consideration whatsoever at the hands of this Council as against all-India interests. But the only argument which the Hon'ble Sir George Barnes has advanced as to this being a peculiarly Madras view is, that he has received a telegram that the Rangoon people object to it. Is it the Rangoon tanners who object to it, or is it the Rangoon raw hides and skins merchants? I am sure that the raw hides and skins merchants will always object to it, as the Hon'ble Mr. Crum has told us, whether they belong to Madras, Bengal, Rangoon or elsewhere. Therefore, if we are to look to their profits as such, then certainly this Bill may be unsound. The fact that Rangoon objects does not convince me that the interests of the rest of India are opposed to the particular amendment which I seek to bring forward. Then the Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha said that we should adopt the golden mean. There is no question of a golden mean here. The question is one of the practical effect of the duty. Are we giving effect to our policy? Hon'ble Members will remember that we are here beginning to wage an economic war against particular countries, which may retaliate against us; it is a very large question. We have begun the war in hides and skins; we do not know exactly what effect this war which we have commenced would have upon our other export trade and upon our import trade. It may lead to monopolist concerns which would reduce the prices of our export articles. Therefore when we are risking that, we shall have to see that the object with which we have set out is effectuated, namely, protecting the Indian tanning industry.

"If the United States felt it necessary to fix the rate at 15 per cent and Japan at 51 per cent, I do not see how I am wrong in the suggestion put forward in my proposal. The Hon'ble Mr. Crum said we must remember that we cannot tan all the hides, and the rest of the Empire will take them, exactly, but how does my proposition prevent that? If it can be shown that a 20 per cent duty would restrict the export trade, the opposition to my amendment would have some force, but I maintain that no valid reasons have been urged against my proposition.

The motion was put and negatived.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—" My Lord, I beg to 11-52 A.M. move that :—

'in col. 4 in clause 3, the proviso be omitted.'

"My Lord, this relates to the question of rebate or preference between the various parts of the Empire. It is a very large and important question. It has been raised indirectly by this proviso which was introduced by the Government. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya objected to this clause when the Bill was introduced. I made no statement on that date and even now I am of opinion that it is just and right that we should do whatever we can to consolidate the Empire and the conditions of trade within it, and if this is the only way in which we can do so, certainly we should not interpose any obstacle in achieving that object unless Indian interests should grievously suffer. Now, my Lord, as I said a little while ago by introducing this clause we have thrown out a challenge to other countries, allies as well as enemy countries. We have by the imposition of 15 per cent duty expressed our determination to effectuate our object, the protection of our industries against other countries. Other countries have been doing the same and cannot complain, neither the Allies nor Germany and Austria-Hungary can complain against the action of India protecting her own interests. But we go further and give preference to countries which form no doubt part of the British Empire, but which have hitherto always been treated for financial and commercial purposes as distinctly separate. We have thrown out a challenge and we cannot complain if other countries, enemies as well as allies, discriminate in their markets and in their tariff policies against us in favour of other countries. They may have been doing that in the past, perhaps some have, and we shall have to be prepared for more of that in the future. The question is whether the relations between India and the rest of the Empire have been so arranged as to enable us to work on a common policy and with a common goal. There is no assurance whatever that the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, South Africa or any other part of the Empire would not resort to protective duties or heavy revenue duties as against India. There is no inter-allied programme as to the rest of the Empire as to what the future policy should be as to trade and commerce. There has been a suggestion that India should be treated for fiscal purposes on exactly the same footing as the dominions and the United Kingdom, and it has been recommended to His Majesty's Government that where the Government of India and the Legislative Council are agreed upon any common policy, upon a definite line of action no obstacle should be placed in its way. I have every confidence that the Government of India, if left to itself, will do justice to the Indian people and I know as a matter of fact that several of my European colleagues, especially members of the Indian Civil Service, would fight for Indian commercial interests as against the rest of the Empire. I have every confidence that the Indian Government would act in this manner. We are all working to attain this end that India should have fiscal freedom to adopt its own policy when such a policy is not opposed to Imperial policy. There has been no pronouncement on this question as to whether India should be allowed to treat itself commercially, industrially on exactly the same footing as the rest of the Empire, and until that question is solved by the Empire or the League of Nations, it would be wrong to throw out a challenge to the rest of the world. My Lord, a good many of us have been characterised as protectionists; we are no doubt that in a sense, we believe that, where there is an industry which is peculiarly Indian and suited to India, requiring encouragement and help, it should be protected against being killed in its infant stages. But in all other respects we are free traders. The question is whether in throwing out this challenge to the rest of the world we are wise without taking adequate steps to protect our own interests. If there is any trade which is of extreme importance to India and which can be encouraged in India, it is the cotton industry, and recent events have shown how important that industry is to us, and how depending upon other industries many people had to go half naked. Therefore, if there is any industry in India which requires to be encouraged, it is the cotton industry. But the Indian Government and His Majesty's Government alike have met with very hostile criticism in the British Parliament, and we must be thankful to the Indian Government and the British Parliament for the courageous way in which they have taken up our cause to the extent they have done. Well, we find that it would be impossible even for His Majesty's Government much less the Indian Government to protect India as against the United Kingdom. I am not now considering the question whether it is right or wrong, but as a practical proposition it would be an absolutely impossible thing. Therefore, in respect of the largest imports into India, namely cotton, there can be no question of protection.

"Another large item which figures in the import trade is sugar. That is an essential food of the people, and some of us will be very slow indeed to impose any duty on sugar unless we are clearly convinced that we can start the industry here without detriment to the people. Well, if we go through the other articles of the import trade, we find that there are very few articles which could be taxed without our coming into conflict with either the Allies or the British Empire. Therefore, my submission is, that this question should not be tackled in a piece-meal fashion. Of course it is always open to the Imperial Government, once the Imperial policy is settled, to bring in a proposition like that, but I submit at the present stage it would be very inconvenient to do so, having regard to the effects which it would have with regard to jute, cotton, and several other things in respect of which the Committee on

Industries in England has made specific recommendations. There is no use of taking a leap in the dark. The Committee on Commercial and Industrial Policy after the War which submitted its recommendations to His Majesty's Government, say at page 18 of their Report, paragraphs 77 and 78 :—

'Jute. The value of the exports of jute yarns in 1913 was £ 781,000, of piece-goods and other manufactures of jute 3 3 million £ and of bags and sacks something over one million £. . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—" I do not quite follow the Hon'ble Member. We do not propose this duty as part of any general scheme of Imperial Preference, but we propose it because we believe that this particular duty is in the interests of India. It is in the interests of India, that the hides and skins produced in India should be tanned in India, if possible, or within the British Empire, if it is not possible to tan them in India. No general scheme of Imperial Preference in which India is to join is at present suggested."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I am thankful for the assurance that any acceptance by this Legislative Council of the principle involved in this Bill would not commit them to any large policy in respect of other articles either of import or export, and that it is open to take up each question on its merits and discuss as to whether it is for the convenience of India or not.

"Then the sole point would be, whether we should ask for this rebate duty to be omitted from the provisions of the Bill. Well, I start with this proposition, either a 15 per cent duty is necessary in the interests of the Indian tanner or it is not. If it is necessary in the Indian tanning trade interest, then if we impose an export duty of only 5 per cent in respect of the other countries in the British Empire, how would it affect us? There would be no real protection. Hon'ble Members will see that there is a large tanning industry in Great Britain, and I hope it will grow, because it is not from India alone that raw hides and skins are imported, but from various other parts of the world as well. The value of the trade in raw hides and skins of the United Kingdom was between £5·9 millions in 1914 and £11·9 millions in 1918. But Indian export up to 1913-14 ranged in value only £166 thousand. It was only during the period of the war when there was a limitation of freight and when there were several other restrictions and a large demand that they went up to £857 thousand, whereas other countries were taking to the extent of £3·6 millions. Therefore the United Kingdom up till now has not been taking very large quantities of raw hides and skins from India. She has been taking raw skins to the extent of £149,000 before the war, and the value was £136,000 in 1914-15, £130,000 in 1915-16, £287,000 in 1916-17 and £387,000 in 1917-18 during the course of the war out of a total for 1917-18 of £3·2 millions. Therefore raw hides and skins from India were not largely tanned in the United Kingdom—as a matter of fact the United Kingdom has been actually exporting a portion of the hides which she has been importing. In 1914, she exported again to the value of £6 millions; in 1915, £4·8 millions, in 1916 £6·1, in 1917 £3·7 and in 1918 £2 millions. Therefore, the United Kingdom exported a larger quantity of raw hides than she imported from British India. Of course this argument of mine is a double-edged weapon. It shows that we need not at present . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"I think I can help the Hon'ble Member if I explain the position. He is under the impression that rebate is to be payable in respect of re-exports. I tried to explain, as clearly as possible, that our proposal is that no rebate shall be granted in respect of re-exports of raw hides and skins."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"I knew, my Lord, that no rebate would be granted on re-exports. My point is that the skin and tanning trade of Great Britain would not be hit at present by our export duty, because the exports to the United Kingdom have been very small, and as a matter of fact there has been a large re-export trade in the United Kingdom. That was the way how I introduced that subject. My point is that we would not in any way prejudicially affect the existing condition of things by the imposition of this export duty of 15 per cent all round, and therefore we shall not be interfering with vested interests.

"Now with regard to the future, I think we have as much right to take effectual measures here which will protect our industries against new industries in the United Kingdom as elsewhere. In respect of new tanning industries which may grow up in the United Kingdom, we should not discourage them, but my contention is, if 15 per cent be necessary to protect our industries, why not have it all round? If 15 per cent is not necessary to protect our industries, reduce the rate, unless it be required for revenue purposes. As a matter of revenue policy we may fix a duty of 5 per cent, but for protectionist purposes a duty of 15 per cent would be necessary. What does it matter from where the competition comes so long as the Indian tanning trade is concerned? Therefore the argument is that we shall have to be protected against everybody if we adopt a protectionist policy. We shall not be hitting any one in the United Kingdom at present; we will be encouraging the Indian trade, and every country can take hides and skins from us equally paying the 15 per cent export duty. It is on these grounds, my Lord, that I advocate the acceptance of my amendment. I know full well that the United Kingdom have been so gracious as to give us a 2*d.* rebate in respect of tea, 2*d.* out of a pound, 1-6th, but whereas, it is necessary that we should have 15 per cent protectionist duty there was no question of protection involved but only revenue when the United Kingdom granted a rebate on tea. The reduction also helped the British tea drinker. If it was only a question of revenue, I would certainly not object to this 10 per cent reduction, or even a larger reduction, but when it is a question of protection, my Lord, let us secure our object and not reduce the duty by granting a rebate."

12-14 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—"My Lord, I must oppose this amendment. I think the Hon'ble Member has wandered somewhat from the reasons for which this Bill was brought in. It was brought in for two reasons, first, because the tanning of hides was a key industry, that is to say it is an industry which must be protected because tanned hides are required during war. It is therefore absolutely necessary that we should try to conserve the tanning of hides within the Empire.

"Secondly, it was brought in because it was considered that India is particularly suitable for the tanning of hides, and therefore that the tanning of hides should be protected as far as India is concerned. It seems to me perfectly clear that since, as I said before, India cannot at present tan all her hides, we must go back to the other reason for which we impose this duty, namely that it is a key industry, and try and arrange that all those hides, or as large a number as possible of those hides which India cannot tan are tanned within the Empire."

12-15 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes :—"My Lord, Mr. Crum has left very little for me to add. The Hon'ble Member's amendment is to the effect that the 10 per cent rebate which we proposed shall not be given. In my opening speech and again just now I tried to make it clear why we imposed this duty and why we gave the rebate. The rebate is given primarily in the interests of India. Only a small proportion of our hides and skins can be tanned in India, and it is entirely in the interests of India that the hides and skins should be tanned within the Empire. If war should again unfortunately break out in future years, it is of the highest possible importance to us that we should not be again in the same position that we were in at the beginning of this war. At the beginning of this war a large proportion of the tanneries which were capable of dealing with the hides which were necessary for army equipment were unfortunately situated in Germany. If war should break out again in future, we must not again be found unprepared in this respect. We must be able in one part or another of the Empire to make the leather which is needed for the equipment of our army.

"Now the greater part, certainly all the first part of the Hon'ble Member's speech I should like to claim as a speech in favour of the rebate, for he expressed himself as proud of belonging to the Empire, and of believing that we ought to do all that we can to bind the Empire together. All that part of his speech I welcome with all my heart. The latter part of his speech I confess that I did not follow altogether, and I was unable to gather from it any arguments which need a reply. My Lord, I cannot accept this amendment."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, there are two points which are involved in the amendment proposed by the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma. One is the question whether India will be better benefited by the proposal in the Bill or by the proposal of Mr. Sarma. The second is, are we so well off that we can share our benefits with the other parts of the Empire? The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes has said that we should consider the situation which would arise if another war breaks out. We ought to hope that another war is not going to break out very soon. But if it should unfortunately break out, then I doubt not India will do as it did on the recent occasion and better, and the British Empire will do as it did on the recent occasion and better. We were able during the war to utilise a lot of our hides and skins, and I think that with the advance in the tanning trade which she will have made within the time, however unfortunately soon that time may come, when another war will break out, India will be immensely better prepared to utilise its own hides and skins for the purpose of the war, and the British Empire will be even better helped by it than it was during the last war. 12-18 P.M.

"There is one question which I wish to ask and which is to me of the deepest concern. Is it in the interests of India that you propose to make the sacrifice involved in the grant of a rebate of 10 per cent on hides and skins? If India were rich, I should be delighted to share some of its superfluous riches with the other members of the Empire, though unfortunately they have not yet set an example to us in that direction. But what I say is, accepting what was said about tea, which I consider to be a matter of small importance, what I say is that India needs every pie of the money she can raise by her export duties. If you can levy an export duty of 15 per cent on hides and skins, I say let the whole of it come to India. If other parts of the Empire find it to their advantage to take in Indian hides and skins, let us find out whether they do not find it profitable to do so even with the export duty that is proposed. Are we sure that even after taking Indian hides and skins with the export duty of 15 per cent they will not be making a good profit on the business? If it is proved that, even with the export duty proposed, our hides and skins which will be imported into the United Kingdom will bring those who deal with them a fair profit, then I say no case is made out for asking India to make this sacrifice. If the experience of a year or two should show that 15 per cent is too much to ask tanners of other parts of the Empire to pay, and that it affects India's export trade, that hides have to rot, as one Hon'ble Member suggested they will if we did not encourage their export, it will be time enough for the Government to reconsider the question.

"As I said the other day, unfortunately India does have a large quantity of hides and skins to export. Well, then let us make all that we can out of it for the benefit of those who are injured by such a large quantity of hides and skins being produced in the country. For these reasons I say that the proposal of my friend is a reasonable one and that the Government should accept it for the present. We ought to remember that there are not many other parts of the British Empire which produce as many hides and skins as we do, and as every part of the British Empire does generally take all that it can out of other parts of the Empire for its products and manufactures, I do not see why India should be deprived of the money which it so badly needs for promoting the welfare of its people in so many directions. I remember the correspondence that took place between some British tanners and the Secretary of State, which was forwarded to the Government of India. As a Member of the Industrial Commission I was privileged to see that correspondence. And I do not at all feel doubtful that, even with the export duty which it is proposed to impose upon our hides and skins, the British tanners will be able to make a good profit out of the business, and, therefore, I say there is no occasion to start with granting them a rebate. There is no justification for the sacrifice of India's interests, no overpowering reasons in the interests of the Empire, why that sacrifice should be made for the benefit of other parts of the Empire.

"For these reasons I wish that the Government would see their way to reconsider their position. I support the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma's amendment."

12-23 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"My Lord, practically the sole reason that was given in favour of the Government view is that we shall have to tan the hides somewhere in the British Empire in Imperial interests. India is unable to tan all her hides and skins, and, therefore this policy has to be embarked upon. The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes forgets that my argument was that the United Kingdom is equally unprepared at present to tan all the additional hides that would be diverted to it, from the fact that although its tanneries take a certain number of hides and skins, it re-exports some. I quite grant that the tanneries can be expanded enormously, but, as things stand, the tanners in the United Kingdom are in the same position as the tanners in India, namely, neither can meet the additional demand. Therefore, I do not see any reason why we should not start all the tanneries that are required in India for tanning the rest. Why cannot you do it to-day? Is it that you have not got experts? Is it that you have not got the money for it? I submit there is no reason whatsoever why our tanneries cannot be so expanded as to meet the additional requirements. Well, assuming for the sake of argument, that India cannot tan all her hides, we estimate that even a 5 per cent duty would divert the trade to the Empire. Well, if it does, the United Kingdom would start her tanneries on a favourable footing. We are not placing her in any disadvantageous position as against others—India and the United Kingdom—because the others do not count for much in this matter—can do the work between them equally. I, therefore, submit that, in carrying out the protectionist policy in favour of India, you will encourage the tanning industry equally in India and in England by giving only 5 per cent rebate instead of 10 per cent, having regard to the difference in the conditions."

The motion was put and negatived.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"The next amendment which I wish to move, my Lord, is that in column 4 in clause 3 the following further proviso be added:—

'Provided further that no rebate shall be granted to any dominion, state or territory . .

The President:—"The Hon'ble Member has got another amendment down before that. I have no doubt the Hon'ble Sir George Barnes will be grateful to him if he does not move it."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, my next amendment is that in column 4 in clause 3 for the words 'two-thirds' the words 'one-third' be substituted. 12-25 P.M.

"I hope I shall have better luck on this amendment than on the previous two amendments. I shall try to be as clear as I can. My Lord, I said I was in favour of encouraging the Imperial connection, and that is the reason why I will take it that some sort of preference would be shown to the Empire as against the rest of the world. Now the question is whether the preference is to be 10 per cent or 5 per cent. That is the only question. Here, following the analogy of Great Britain, I think we would be justified in making it 2½ per cent, because the rebate granted in favour of Indian tea so far has been two pence in every shilling or one-sixth. I think that is not controverted. Mr. Austen Chamberlain in his speech on the Financial Statement on the 30th April last said :

> 'On a consideration of the facts I have come to the conclusion that one-sixth would be an effective preference on these articles, and I hope it will be satisfactory to those concerned'

"I have suggested one-third for the reason that in the earlier paragraph Mr. Chamberlain seems to suggest that, as at present advised, the general Empire rate of preference would be one-third. I have read that passage on a previous occasion. 'On these duties I propose to fix the preference at one-third which is what I may call the general Empire rate, in so far as a general Empire rate exists.' I submit that there is no reason why the Government of India should go further than what His Majesty's Government have proposed to do, namely, to give a preference to the extent of one-third.

"Then, the only other point would be as to whether one-third would not be effectual for the purposes which the Government have in view, namely, diverting the trade to the United Kingdom, I mean to the rest of the Empire, and encouraging tanneries there. I have already argued, my Lord, that we have very great difficulties in respect of this general rebate policy, and that the Government hoped that by means of this they would be able effectually to divert the enemy trade into Great Britain. I think they can do that with 5 per cent preference as well as 10 per cent preference. I have already shown that even a 10 per cent duty would hardly help the Indian tanneries to struggle with their small resources as against the capitalist countries both within the British Empire as well as elsewhere.' I hope the Government and Hon'ble Members will not forget that our concerns are very small, that they are struggling, and that they are slowly rising in importance, and the Government have felt it incumbent upon them to protect them. If they are to be protected, by all means protect them properly, give them effectual protection, and not merely nominal protection. That is my prayer. We would not be transgressing the policy of His Majesty's Government, we shall be effectually protecting our industries, while at the same time diverting trade to the rest of the Empire and giving some preference to the United Kingdom. All these objects would, I submit, be met by a one-third rebate duty and I, therefore, press my amendment upon the attention of Government and the Council."

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes :—"My free-trade friend, my Lord the Mover of the amendment has apparently no difficulty in accepting the measure of protection offered to him by the Bill ; in fact he asks for a bit more. He reminds me of a constituent of Sir Robert Peel, a story concerning whom is recorded in the life of Sir Robert Peel. Sir Robert when he was sitting for a seaside constituency received a letter from a constituent who was a fisherman stating that he was a strong free-trader, but that he thought there ought to be a small duty on herrings. I think that is the view the Hon'ble Member really takes. He feels that the Madras tanner is not sufficiently protected if the 10 per cent rebate is conceded, and he wants to reduce that rebate to 5 per cent. Let us go therefore into the protection which we are giving to him. 12-31 P.M.

With regard to foreign countries the protection by the export-duty is 15 per cent. With regard to countries within the Empire the protection afforded by export duty alone is 5 per cent. Apart from the protection afforded by the export duty there is in each case the natural protection afforded by the cost of the freight, insurance in sending the hides and skins from India to the country where they are to be tanned; then there is further protection in the cost of freight and insurance on the manufactured article,—that is the leather; then on entry of the leather into India there is an import duty of 7½ per cent. Now that surely is sufficient protection for anybody. We do not want to make it impossible that foreign leather shall be sold in India. We do want to set the Indian tanners on their feet and to give them a fair chance; but we do not want to make it impossible that any foreign leather shall be sold at all in India. If we did this the result would presumably be that the price of leather would be raised unduly, and the consumer would suffer accordingly. For these reasons, my Lord, I cannot accept this amendment."

12-33 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"My Lord, if I were the first to advocate a slight departure in favour of India from the free-trade principle, the Hon'ble Sir George Barnes' remarks would be very weighty; but I am afraid that he stands in exactly the same position as myself. Both of us wish to depart and do depart from the strict free-trade principles and try to give some protection in favour of India. The only difference is as to the measure of protection that shall be afforded, and I think that my suggestion is reasonable. I quote the precedent of the United States which thinks 15 per cent is necessary; I quote the precedent of Japan which thinks 51 per cent is necessary, after taking into account the insurance freight and other charges mentioned by the Hon'ble Member; if in addition to these charges other States consider 51 per cent to be necessary, and it is also granted that the United Kingdom and the other countries forming the Empire are capitalist countries, much richer than India, I do not think I shall be pleading wrongly in favour of the reduction of the rebate."

The motion was put and negatived.

12-35 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"My Lord, before Mr. Sarma rises I should like to make an appeal to him not to move his amendment. It may do us infinite harm if he does move it. We are at the present time sending a deputation to South Africa, and the moving of this amendment cannot do us any good. It will embarrass Sir Benjamin Robertson on his mission, and I do appeal to the Hon'ble Member not to move it for that reason. Pin-pricks are doubtless amusing to the person who handles the pin, but a pin is not a good instrument of diplomacy. I do appeal to the Hon'ble Member not to move the amendment."

12-36 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"My Lord, I understand the spirit in which the Hon'ble Sir George Barnes has made these remarks and I appreciate them. But I find this difficulty that we can move no amendment whatever at a later stage without the permission of Government. If the efforts of Government are unsuccessful and India should be treated exactly as at present, if your Excellency would permit me to move this amendment to the Act at the Delhi Session after the negotiations are completed, I have not the slightest objection to dropping it now in the interests of harmony. But if it is not permissible for me to do so at a later stage I shall have to press it."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, may I point out something which might help the Hon'ble Member to drop his amendment? Under the wording of the proviso we have powers as a Government to grant this rebate only to such parts of the Empire as we wish and to refuse it to any part of the Empire. The amendment would only make compulsory the powers which are to be given to the Government. The Hon'ble Member has perhaps not discovered that."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—" I want that this should be provided for by the Legislature. It is one thing for the Government to have discretion to grant or refuse rebate; it is another thing altogether for the Legislature to lay down that rebate shall not be granted to certain parts of the Empire. It is the united voice of the people of India that pleads that the policy should be laid down clearly. I know that Government have already got these powers; but I think there is greater force in the Legislature of India, acting on behalf of the people of India, giving expression to that view. Therefore, I have not the slightest objection to dropping this amendment now and bringing it up again at a later date if the Government will permit me to do so. But if they do not, if they cannot give me permission at any stage, then I shall have to move this amendment. The motion is only conditional. If any country should treat Indians in the way I have described in the amendment, it is incumbent on the Government to grant no rebate. If, on the other hand, as a result of these negotiations the other countries should treat us fairly, then the proviso would be inoperative. It would have no application whatever. Therefore, I shall not be prejudicing the progress of the negotiations in this case. It is only optional, conditional. But I am willing to drop it if the Government would permit me to move this in case of necessity, of course after due notice to the Government."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—" It would be possible for the Hon'ble Member to move a Resolution in this Council that the Government do put these powers in force against any particular country he likes or the Legislative Assembly might do so."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" May I draw attention ? "

The President :—" On a point of order ? "

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" No, my Lord; but the point has to be considered."

The President :—" I do not really see how the Hon'ble Member can. We do not know yet whether the amendment is going to be moved or not. Until that question is settled there is no point for the Hon'ble Member. He may later on when this Bill is to be passed address the Council."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" May I submit my point for your Lordship's consideration ? "

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" The language used in the Bill is 'shall'—'rebate shall be granted.' I would invite the attention of the Council to this because the Hon'ble the Law Member has said that the Government will have the option to grant a rebate or not to do so; it will not have the option. The language is 'Provided that subject to such conditions as the Governor General in Council may . . . prescribe, a rebate shall be granted.'

The President :—" The Hon'ble Member reads rather fast and that is why perhaps he has passed over the words there referred to—'subject to such conditions as the Governor General in Council may by notification in the Gazette of India, prescribe.' Those are the governing words."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malviya :—" Do they take away the force of the word 'shall'—'the rebate shall be granted'? "

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"If His Excellency would give me an assurance that I may bring it up next Session, if necessary, I shall drop the second portion of my amendment; the first portion will stand, it is inoffensive."

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"The position is that Government will have full powers under the Act when the Bill has become law, and it will be open to the Hon'ble Member at any time in the future, if circumstances necessitate it, to move a Resolution asking the Government of the day to use the powers but I really think that that meets the Hon'ble Member entirely."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"Resolution, but not legislation. No Revenue Bill can be modified by a private member without the sanction of Government."

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"The powers are here; the Resolution will be to put those powers into effect."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I shall not press that portion, my Lord, under these circumstances. But I may be permitted to move the first portion, namely, 'that no rebate shall be granted to any dominion, state or territory which discriminates against Indian tariff policy.' That has nothing to do with this inconvenient question."

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"Will not the Hon'ble Member drop it altogether?"

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"It is perfectly harmless; it merely says any state, etc., which discriminates against our tariff policy."

The President:—"If the Hon'ble Member wishes to move his amendment, let him move it. I understand that he does not wish to move the latter part, but that he wishes to move the former part. I think we shall get on quicker if he does move it."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I cannot move it without your Excellency's permission to omit the second part."

The President:—"But I have given you permission to omit the second part."

12-40 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"Then I move that in clause 3, column 4 to the proviso the following be added;

> 'Provided further that no rebate shall be granted to any dominion, state or territory which discriminates against Indian tariff policy.'

"My Lord, I think many words are not needed to support this amendment of mine. All I desire to say is that if any country acts unfairly then the Government of India shall act in the manner suggested. It is only fair that when we grant a concession we should be treated in the same way by other countries. Therefore I submit that if any country adopts a policy of discrimination against India, then this clause which I propose should be applied to that country in regard to its tariff policy."

12-41 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"My Lord, the Bill already gives full powers to the Government of India in the direction desired by the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma. Should any part of the British Empire discriminate against the Indian Tariff policy, which I hope will never occur, and of which there is not the slightest sign at present, I hope the Council will leave the Government of India of that day to deal with the question."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha:—"My Lord, the question raised by the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma seems to relate to that of a retaliatory policy. Is this Council at present discussing the general question of tariff policies? If this were a general question then the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma would be in order in raising it, but we are not discussing at present the merits of the whole tariff system but simply a minor point. Therefore, I think, the Hon'ble Member's point is superfluous. He is simply wasting the time of the Council." 12-42 P.M.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"My Lord, there is the possibility that a discriminating policy against India might be adopted by Australia, South Africa or any other country. Why therefore should not the Legislature say that no rebate shall be granted. What is the objection to that? I do not see any reason why the Legislature should not lay down clearly what should be done in certain circumstances; this action can only be taken if other parts of the British Empire do not behave rightly. It is the direction of the Legislature which must be obeyed by the Executive Government. It would not leave any option in the matter." 12-43 P.M.

The motion was put and negatived.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"My Lord, I move that the Bill be passed." 12-45 P.M.

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE WORKMAN'S BREACH OF CONTRACT (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Workman's Breach of Contract Act, 1859. I do not know how far Hon'ble Members of this Council are familiar with this law. I may say very shortly that it is an old Act of 1859, which originally applied to Presidency-towns only and was intended to penalise fraudulent breaches of contract by artificers and workmen. It has, however, since been extended to other parts of India outside Presidency-towns. Under the Act labourers and artificers who take advances from their employers on certain undertakings and wilfully neglect to perform their contracts are liable to imprisonment. 12-46 P.M.

"In February, 1917, the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya gave notice to the Government of his intention to introduce a Bill repealing this Act, and the Government were prepared to allow his motion to be carried and his proposal submitted to public criticism. He, however, postponed introducing the Bill because he wished to secure certain information which was not readily available. Local Governments were addressed in order to obtain this information and at the same time the Government of India, which had some reason for thinking that the Act was misused in certain places, took the opportunity of consulting Local Governments as to whether the Act should be repealed altogether and, if not, what amendments, if any, should be made in it. On the 22nd March, 1918, the information called for by the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya was laid on the table, but, so far as I am aware, no further action was taken by him in the matter of his Bill. The replies to our inquiries from Local Governments indicated that the majority of them thought that the total repeal of the Act was inadvisable, but that it required modification in certain respects to prevent abuse or misuse of its provisions. In order to meet the defects brought to our notice by different Local Governments, this Bill has been introduced. I think I can explain it best by taking clause by clause, dealing of course only with important clauses.

"Clause 2 makes a modification in section 1 of the Act and limits its application to cases in which the money advanced does not exceed Rs. 300. That was the sum fixed roughly after inquiry as to what was a reasonable maximum for cases of this kind. The clause makes also another important change in the law by providing that before issuing a process on the artificer or labourer, the Magistrate shall examine the complainant and that the Magistrate may if in his opinion there are no grounds for proceeding further dismiss the application altogether. Under the existing law, I think, I am right, once a complaint is made, the Magistrate has at once to issue process on the workman or labourer.

"Clause 3 makes another important change. Under the present Act, if a Magistrate to whom an application is made is satisfied that the labourer has received an advance and is wilfully refusing to perform the contract, the Magistrate has no discretion, but at the option of the employer must either order the labourer to refund the money or perform the work. Under the Bill the discretion is vested not in the employer but in the Magistrate. Further, where an order is made for repayment of an advance the Magistrate will have power to order that the return should be made in instalments. Finally, there is an obligation cast on an employer who wishes to make a complaint under the Act that he must do so within a reasonable time; three months has been provisionally chosen as a suitable period within which such complaints should be made. There is no such limitation in the Act at present.

"I now come to sub-clause (2) of this clause. At present for refusal either to repay an advance or perform his contract a Magistrate has to sentence a man to rigorous imprisonment. We propose to leave it to the Magistrate to decide whether imprisonment should be simple or rigorous. There is one other small provision. In making an order of repayment of money a Magistrate has power to extend the period or vary the instalments, and in no case can an order under the Act operate to force an employé to work for a longer period than one year. That is a very important change, because under the present law there is no limitation at all for the period for which a man may be ordered to work, and in my own province I have known of cases in which agricultural labourers are bound for very long periods who might come within the scope of this Act. I am referring to what Members from Bihar are familiar with, the Kamiouti system.

"Then comes another provision in the Bill which allows a Magistrate the option to refuse to enforce any contract which he thinks is unfair. That is also a clause which, I think, will commend itself to Council on general principles.

"Finally, the Magistrate is given power to award compensation to any labourer against whom a false or frivolous or vexatious complaint has been made under the Act. Well, these are, I think, all the important provisions of the Bill, and I need not explain them any further at present. I only want to make one thing clear, and it is this, that the whole principle of this Bill is to make the provisions of the Act less stringent as regards labourers and artificers than at present, and the Bill is directed to prevent any possible abuse of the existing law. I am aware that the Bill may not go as far as some Hon'ble Members of this Council may wish. I can only say that the Government have gone as far as they consider that the opinions which they have received from the Local Governments justify. If, however, the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya will after this Session send me a copy of the Bill which he at one time proposed to introduce for the total repeal of this Act, I shall be very glad to have it circulated for opinion, together with the present Bill. In regard to this Bill all that the Government seek to do at present is, to obtain leave to introduce it in the hope that it will be effective in preventing the abuse or misuse of the Act. If the views of Local Governments and other persons interested in this matter are that we ought to go further, the Government of India will have to consider the question again."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" My Lord, I thank the Hon'ble the Home Member for the sympathetic manner in which he has put forward the motion for leave to introduce the Bill to amend the Workman's Breach of Contract Act. My Lord, I frankly say at once that while I welcome the advance which the Government propose to make, in my opinion the total repeal of the Act is what is necessary. The reason why I did not take action is very simple. My Lord, I regret to say that, constituted as the Council is at present, I have given up all hope of carrying any important legislative proposal or even an important Resolution in this Council unless I was sure that I would have the support of the Government, and I was waiting for the time to which we are all eagerly looking forward when the Legislative Assembly will contain a majority of the elected representatives of the people, for I thought I would have a better chance then. I therefore welcome the attitude which the Hon'ble the Home Member has indicated in the matter of this Bill. 12-55 P.M.

" Now, my Lord, the reasons why I suggested a total repeal, and why I still suggest a total repeal of the Act are very simple. My attention was drawn to this Act when I toured about the country as a member of the Industrial Commission. I found that in several places the Act was in force, and it seemed to me from all that I heard that this Act had outlived its period. The Act was passed in 1859, when railways had not come into existence—the first railway was constructed, I think, in 1854—and communications were very difficult. Conditions of life in the principal cities of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, the towns which are mentioned here, were very different from what they are now. People did not find it so easy to go to Calcutta, Madras or Bombay from the mofussil; they did not find the conditions of life quite so satisfactory as now. In 1859, it might have been found necessary to empower Magistrates to enforce contracts against artificers or labourers in certain circumstances, but the tremendous changes which have taken place since then clearly point out that this legislation has outlived its utility, even if it was found necessary at the time it was enacted. My Lord, we are now in the 20th century. We are in the post-war period. A great International Labour Conference is going to sit at Washington. Labour problems are to the fore. The welfare of labour is engaging the attention of British and other Statesmen in all parts of the Empire. Even in this country the Industrial Commission has recommended that in towns in which industries are more predominant than in others more attention should be paid to the welfare of labour. I am surprised, therefore, that while the Government recognised the desirability of amending this Act, they did not decide upon its total abolition. What will those gentlemen, representatives of various Governments including our own, who are going to meet shortly in the interests of labour at Washington, think of a proposal like this when it goes before them, that in a matter of a purely social contract,—a man should be liable to be sentenced to imprisonment if he fails to perform the contract? I am sure they would decline to accord their support to such a proposal. Hitherto it has been understood that failure to carry out a simple agreement can be compensated by certain recognised processes. It is not a case of failure to perform a specific contract. We are not dealing with the case of individuals or men who are experts or who possess great technical skill and who fail to perform some work which they alone can do. It is the case of ordinary artificers, workmen and labourers. If one man does not do it, another man may easily be found to do it, it may be at a little higher cost; the rule which governs the enforcement of specific performance of contracts does not come at all into play here. In this case, if a man fails to perform his contract . . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"May I interrupt the Hon'ble Member for one minute ? I did not say for failure to perform a contract, but a fraudulent breach of contract."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"I beg your pardon. I did not hear the Hon'ble Member. Will the Hon'ble Member speak to this side. I could not hear him, my Lord."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"I thought it was customary to address the Chair in this Council."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"If the Hon'ble Member had spoken clearly I could have understood him."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"I said that the Act does not apply to all failures to perform contracts, but to fraudulent breaches of contracts."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Thank you."

"My Lord, the preamble to the old Act which it is proposed to amend says:—

> 'Whereas much loss and inconvenience are sustained by manufacturers, tradesmen, and others in the several Presidency-towns of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, and in other places from fraudulent breach of contract on the part of artificers, workmen and labourers who have received money in advance on account of work which they have contracted to perform.'

"Now, my Lord, that preamble is retained. It is left to the Magistrate to decide whether the breach was a fraudulent breach or not, and then he is to pass judgment either that the person defrauded should be compensated, or that the labourer should perform the contract, or if he fails to do so, that he should suffer rigorous imprisonment for a term which used to be three months before but which the Bill now proposes to reduce.

"My Lord, in section II of the old Act it was laid down that:—

> 'If it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Magistrate that such artificer, workman, or labourer has received money in advance from the complainant on account of any work, and has wilfully and without lawful or reasonable excuse neglected or refused to perform or get performed the same according to the terms of his contract, the Magistrate shall at the option of the complainant, either order such artificer, workman, or labourer to repay the money advanced, or such part thereof as may seem to the Magistrate just and proper, or order him to perform, or get performed, such work according to the terms of his contract.'

I am glad that in the amending Bill that objectionable clause 'at the option of the complainant' is omitted and that the matter is left to the discretion of the Magistrate. I am glad also that it is proposed to do away with rigorous imprisonment. For the amending Bill says: 'If an artificer, workman, or labourer who has been ordered to perform the contract or repay the money advanced, shall fail to comply with such an order, the Magistrate may sentence him to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months, or, if the order be for the repayment of a sum of money, for a period which may extend to three months or until repayment is made, whichever period is shorter.'

"Now, I submit, my Lord, that it is not right at this time of day to enact a provision like this. It is bad enough that the Act of 1859 was allowed to remain so long on the Statute-book, but when the attention of the Government has been drawn to it and Government have decided to deal with it, they ought to deal with it in a healthy way, in the way which will appeal to all those who are interested in the welfare of labour, and repeal this Act altogether. My Lord, we must not ignore the changes that have taken place. I have seen what facilities have been provided for labour in the important towns of Calcutta and Bombay. Bombay has to do more. It is unfortunately true that Bombay has not done as much as Calcutta has done; but I have seen that the Jute mills round Calcutta, and the Buckingham Mills in Madras and the Nagpur Mills have made most excellent provision for the accommodation of their labour. At Jamshedpur too, at the Tata Iron Works, they have made very satisfactory provision for such accommodation and it is going to be improved still further. Labourers willingly go to these places. There are thousands upon thousands of persons willingly working at Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Jamshedpur and Nagpur. I have seen the very excellent provision made for the accommodation of labour at Cawnpore by the Elgin Mills and the Muir Mills. Now I am certain that if the state of things which exist to-day existed in 1859, nobody would have thought of enacting Act XIII of 1859. Therefore taking the reverse of it, now that such a state of things does exist, the Government ought to repeal that Act. With the advantages that have been created, it seems to me such a pity to present the spectacle to the labour world and to the rest of the world interested in labour, ~~that~~ of proposing that if an artificer, workman or labourer fails to perform a contract for labour, according to the terms which are preserved in the Act, he may be sentenced to imprisonment. My Lord, as I have said before, I quite recognise the liberalising elements which have been introduced into the Bill. I note that the Government recognise that in its present form Act XIII of 1859 is unsuited in many respects to modern conditions. They also recognise that it has been found capable of abuse by employers. I have not got before me the statement which the Government was good enough to supply to me in answer to a question of mine, but that showed that there are many places in this country where workmen are sentenced to imprisonment under Act XIII of 1859, and that this Act is abused. It is necessary therefore that it should be done away with altogether.

"Another modification which has been introduced is, that it will be only in cases where the advance does not exceed Rs. 300, that the Magistrate will interfere, but this will not to my mind very much alter the situation, though it slightly will. Why should a person who has received something less than Rs. 300 as an advance, be liable to be sentenced to imprisonment, when a person who has received Rs. 400 in advance is not liable to such imprisonment? I fail to see any reason for it. The suffering which the one may be subjected to will be felt by him quite as keenly as the suffering which might have been undergone by the man who contracted for larger wages would have been.

"My Lord, the modification that 'the Magistrate may in his discretion refuse to make an order under section 2 where in his opinion the contract in respect of a breach of which the complaint has been made was substantially unfair' is a good provision and I have nothing to say against it. If the Act must continue, this is a provision which I welcome. As regards the change proposed in the nature of imprisonment, whereas the old Act provides that wherever imprisonment is inflicted it must be with hard labour, the present Bill proposes to give the Magistrate the discretion to inflict imprisonment of either description, simple or rigorous. I submit it is a pity that the Government should still think of retaining rigorous imprisonment even as an alternative punishment. In any event the very least the Government might have done was to cut out rigorous imprisonment altogether, and to say that if any imprisonment must be inflicted, it must be simple. My Lord, if a man fails to pay his debt, he is subjected to simple imprisonment only; I do not see why a person who fails to perform a civil contract should be put in a worse position. These are my reasons, my Lord, for the view which I have submitted. I recognise that the Bill makes an advance and a welcome advance, to the extent that it goes, on Act XIII of 1859; but it does not go far enough, and at this time of day the welfare of the labourer, and fairness to him demand that this Act should be obliterated from the Statute-book. The labourer, my Lord, has suffered a great deal in the past owing to the operation of this Act and of some other enactments and practices which have prevailed in different parts of the country, out of which the capitalists have made much at his expense. I hope the Government will now take the step which is demanded, which is dictated by the interests of the labourer and help him to live and breathe as a free fellow subject."

1-9 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—"My Lord, I am not conversant with the workings of this Act and I do not know to what extent any of the amendments may affect the interests of the members of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. Am I right in understanding that this Bill will not be proceeded with at present, but that it will be circulated to all bodies concerned through the Local Governments ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"Certainly."

1-10 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"My Lord, I rise to give my support to the principle of this Bill. It is certainly an improvement on the Act which it seeks to amend. As the Hon'ble the Home Member has said, the old Act is out-of-date and relates to conditions of life which are obsolete and, therefore, it requires amendment. The Hon'ble the Home Member has explained very lucidly the conditions which this Bill seeks to introduce, and the five important points in which it tries to amend the old Act are, to my mind, very important and of a, on the whole, liberalising character.

"The limitation of three months now introduced for bringing a complaint against an offender; the limitation of the amount involved to Rs. 300; the option given to the Magistrate to refuse to proceed on a complaint, if he thinks the contract unfair; the option conferred upon him to throw out a complaint if he finds, after examining the complainant on oath, that no case is made out; and lastly, the power now vested in him to award the workman compensation, if the complaint is found to be false or frivolous—all these, my Lord, are to my mind great and useful improvements. I am glad to give my support to this Bill, particularly because it is of a humanitarian character. The Government of India, during the last ten years, have had to pass so much of coercive legislation, that I am gratified to find that they are in a position to-day to bring in a measure before this Council which is of a humanitarian character. At the same time, I regret that the Hon'ble the Home Member has not seen his way to go a little further. I am not asking him at present to repeal the old Act, but to take one more step forward in the direction of liberalising the Bill still more by abolishing imprisonment for the offences which this Statute maintains.

"My Lord, the infliction of imprisonment, whether simple or rigorous, for breach of contract, goes against my grain, and I hope in this particular matter the Hon'ble the Home Member—who, I understand, is open to conviction so far as this Bill is concerned—will be pleased to consider our suggestion when it comes before the Select Committee in due course. I shall be very happy if he can see his way to abolishing imprisonment altogether, both rigorous and simple, for the offences specified. But if, unfortunately, he cannot do that, I shall be happy if he will meet us half-way, at any rate, by abolishing rigorous imprisonment and keeping in only simple. With these words, I give my support to the provisions of this Bill."

1-12 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, I have endeavoured to be as fair as possible to the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya in connection with this Bill. I have invited him to put in his proposed Bill to repeal the Act, and I have said that I would circulate it for opinion with the present measure. That is feasible even now, because a Bill may, as Hon'ble Members will remember from last year, be published before introduction. I must, however, object to the statement that the Bill was not introduced before by the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya because he knew that such a motion would not be accepted. I put it to the Council that he had no reason whatever to suppose that the Government would oppose the introduction of his Bill, and he never took the trouble, as far as I am aware, either by letter or personal communication, to ascertain what the views of the Government on this question were. The Government were quite prepared to allow his Bill to be introduced and to be circulated, and I am more than a little sceptical as to whether the reason given was the real reason why he did not introduce his Bill.

"My Lord, it has been said that there is a considerable volume of opinion in favour of a total repeal of this Act, but there is also a great volume of opinion in favour of it, and we must move carefully in this matter. The Hon'ble Mr. Crum said that he did not know whether it affected the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. Well, my Lord, this Bill will affect the tea industry and the labour employed by the tea industry very considerably. Before considering the question of repealing the Act, various important interests will have to be very carefully consulted. The Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya went on to say that this Bill penalised any breach of contract. I think that is an impression which should be corrected at once. What it does penalise is not a mere breach of contract, but a fraudulent breach of contract, which is a very different matter. His omission to make this point clear and another mistake he made indeed created a suspicion in my mind that he was getting up his brief as he went along and that he had not read the Bill or the Act recently . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, I had read the Bill this morning before I came to Council."

The President:—"Order, order."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"Then the Hon'ble Member must have read the Bill very carelessly, because one of the things he said was that the Bill reduced the period of imprisonment that could be awarded under the Act . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"That was a mistake."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"The Bill does nothing of the kind. It may be advisable for us to do that, but the point I wish to make is that these mistakes created in my mind what was apparently a mistaken impression that he did not know much about the subject on which he was speaking.

"We were then attacked because of the restriction of the application of the Act to advances of a certain amount. My Lord, the sole object of Government in making this proposal was to restrict the application of this Act as much as possible. People to whom larger sums are advanced are generally men of some substance, and it is the cases of persons to whom small advances are made and who fraudulently fail to perform their contracts which afford the only justification for an Act of the present character.

"There is one other question, which I was asked in a written communication received from one Member of this Council, namely, whether there is a right of appeal against an order of imprisonment. My Lord, I am afraid I can only say that I am not certain whether this is an appeal or not, but I will have the point examined and, if necessary, referred to Local Governments."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, I now introduce the Bill, and move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English, and in the local official Gazettes in English and in such other languages as the Local Governments think fit."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The President :—"The Council will now adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

"I think it may be for the convenience of Members if I state what I propose to do to-morrow. I propose to sit till half past one. We shall then have an adjournment until 3 o'clock. As regards Friday, until to-morrow's sittings are ended, I will not make any announcement, but it may be necessary perhaps to sit longer on Friday."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"May I submit that it will be convenient not to have two sittings for this important discussion on the Indemnifying Bill."

The President :—"I am afraid that is a matter which I must decide. I have decided the other way."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"I have only submitted the reasons for your Lordship's consideration."

The Council then adjourned till Thursday, the 18th September, 1919 at 11 A.M.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

(5 & 6 Geo. V, Ch. 61.)

The Council met at the Council Chamber, Viceregal Lodge, Simla, on Thursday, the 18th September, 1919.

PRESENT :

His Excellency BARON CHELMSFORD, P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., G.C.M.G., G.C.B.E., Viceroy and Governor General, presiding, and 52 Members, of whom 44 were Additional Members.

THE IMPORT AND EXPORT OF GOODS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes :—" My Lord, I move for leave to introduce a Bill to extend the operation of, and otherwise to amend, the Import and Export of Goods Act, 1916. The Bill proposes to extend the operation of this small Act by two years and six months. Under the Sea Customs Act considerable powers already exist, but further powers are needed in order to continue our rationing of food-stuffs and for other purposes. It is accordingly necessary to continue the Import and Export of Goods Act in force a short time longer. I need not say that it is the policy of your Excellency' Government to put an end to all forms of control as soon as we possibly can. "

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes :—" My Lord, I beg to introduce the Bill, and to move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English. "

The motion was put and agreed to.

11-7 A.M. The President :—"We now come to the introduction of the Indemnity Bill, and on the introduction of the Bill there is an amendment proposed to be moved by Mr. Chanda. I think it will be convenient if I outline the course which I propose to take with regard to the motion to introduce the Bill and with regard to the amendment. I think it will be the sense of the Council that they would prefer one debate only on the amendment and the motion for introduction of the Bill, but I do not, by suggesting this, propose to exclude Mr. Chanda from the right to reply, which the mover of every amendment would have when he moves his amendment ; and therefore I would suggest that we take the motion to introduce the Bill and the amendment as one debate ; otherwise I should be under the necessity of keeping Hon'ble Members strictly to the discussion of Mr. Chanda's amendment. I think some Hon'ble Members might wish to discuss the matter more broadly. But of course if I give them that indulgence and do not keep them strictly to the discussion of Mr. Chanda's amendment, it must be on the understanding that there is only one debate on the motion to introduce the Bill and on Mr. Chanda's amendment. I think Mr. Chanda will probably agree to that."

THE INDEMNITY BILL.

11-10 A.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" My Lord, I move for leave to introduce a Bill to indemnify officers of Government and other persons in respect of certain acts done under martial law, and to provide for other matters in connection therewith. This measure, my Lord, has been the subject of so much discussion both in the Press and by other competent authorities, that I think I ought to set out to the Council in some detail the reasons that have led the Government to introduce the Bill at this moment and to explain seriatim the effect of, at any rate, the more important clauses of the Bill ; and I will ask Hon'ble Members to listen to me as carefully as they can, to follow in particular the detailed statement of the effect of the clauses, to view this matter without any kind of bias and to get rid of any misapprehension as to the intentions of Government or as to the meaning of the Act, which may have been created by writings or speeches outside this Council.

" My Lord, wherever martial law is declared, as it was recently in the Punjab, it inevitably follows that speedy and decisive action has to be taken by the executive officers of Government for the restoration of order. Not only does this responsibility lie directly on the supreme military commander, but also on those who are subordinate to him ; that is, he gives orders which he thinks necessary, and it is their bounden duty to carry out those orders. It follows that frequently action which is just and proper, though not necessarily legal, is taken by these authorities.

" They cannot possibly wait in such circumstances to examine the law and see whether what they propose to do is strictly legal or not ; delay at such a time is fatal. The authorities and the officers concerned have to act at once. Indeed, the very meaning of martial law is, that it confers powers to maintain order at any cost that may be necessary of life or property. That is the essence, as I understand it, of martial law. Such conduct will in some cases necessarily involve an infringement of the personal rights of individuals, either of their liberty or their rights in regard to property ; and when martial law expires, an Indemnity Act of some character is the inevitable consequence. I think members in this Council will realise that if such an Indemnity Act is not passed, no officer charged with the very irksome and responsible duty of restoring order will ever act with the confidence that is really essential for the effective handling of the situation. If he has to wait, to hesitate, to examine the law, to consult legal authorities here and there, the time for action may be gone, and the very mischief he seeks to stop develop to a dangerous degree. That such an Indemnity Act is the normal consequence of any period of martial law is, I believe, accepted by all constitutional writers. I do not wish to weary the Council by citations from a number of these, but I will content myself with one :—

> 'If at a period of national danger a breach of the law is demanded, if not by absolute necessity yet by stress of political expediency, the law breaker whether he be a General or other servant of the Crown who acts bonâ fide solely with a view to public interest may confidently count on protection by an Act of Indemnity . . . .
> 'Statutes of this description have been invariably, or almost invariably, passed after the determination of a period of civil war or disturbance and the very object is to protect officers and others who in the interests of their country have in time of common danger pursued an illegal course of conduct.'

These quotations are from one of the greatest writers on Constitutional Law, Dicey. In fact, we know that whenever there has been an insurrection or civil war, or invasion by a foreign power, Acts of this character have invariably been passed. There was one in England after the insurrection of 1715, again after 1745; we had one in this country after 1857, and more than one instance of such Acts is to be found in the various Colonial Legislatures, including the Legislature of South Africa. Further than this, when a military officer is acting under the stress of such circumstances, in a crisis of great magnitude, it is essential that he must have behind him some sanction to enforce his orders; reference to ordinary Courts in such cases is impracticable. It would involve delay which would be fatal to the very object he has in view. Consequently summary measures, often stern and always of a very speedy character, are necessary if order is to be restored. There are some who think that these summary orders necessarily connote injustice and an undue degree of harshness, but it is not correct to think that this is either the practice or the intention of many commanders. I should like to cite from the Martial Law Regulations passed in Lahore on this point. This is an order by Col. Frank Johnson, a somewhat well-known name.

> 'In order to prevent the occurrence of regrettable incidents it must be clearly understood that the institution of summary law neither necessitates nor justifies the committal of excesses, either in the maintenance of order or in enforcing obedience of martial regulations or the infliction of punishment. It cannot be too clearly impressed upon all ranks that temporary supersession of the ordinary process of civil law by the introduction of summary law does not mean that justice ceases to be administered ; on the contrary, the suspension of the usual safeguards make it doubly imperative that all concerned should bear in mind that it is up to them to see that justice and not irresponsible violence is administered.'

"It is however essential that the military authorities in such cases should have power to come to swift decisions of a most important character; power to take prompt action on all matters affecting the State; power to punish summarily and effectively those who endanger the peace.

"My Lord, it may be said that martial law was not necessary in the Punjab and that the Government made a mistake in proclaiming it. I do not seek to argue that point now. I believe that any such course would be unfair to those concerned, primarily or indirectly concerned, until the evidence of the facts has been recorded by the Committee of Inquiry. The decision on that matter must rest with the Committee in a great measure and after their report has been received, with other authorities. But, irrespective of this question, the position of our officers must be protected. I do not know if I make myself clear on that point. What I wish to say is this, whether martial law was necessary or not, our officers, our subordinate officers were bound to carry out their duties, and to give effect to the orders given them and they cannot be penalised on that account. I think the case has been very clearly put on this point by a writer in, I think, the 'Civil and Military Gazette' recently. He called himself 'An Indian Student of constitutional law' or by some such title. I commend that article to the consideration of Members of this Council.

It appears to me to put the case for an Indemnifying Act both impartially and fairly.

"So far I have been dealing with the part of this Bill which deals with indemnifying officers of Government. The second part deals with the validating to a certain extent of a number of sentences which have been passed. I shall explain this in detail later, but it is clear, as I said before, that where military officers are given power to issue certain orders, it is essential that they should also have authority to enforce those orders. There must be some sanction behind them, some power of enforcing order speedily and effectively and in many cases—in fact I believe this is the normal course—summary Courts are appointed to administer justice in such circumstances. They do not deal normally with all criminal cases, but only with cases arising out of a breach of military regulations or cases connected with the disturbances, and I believe I am right, so far as the Punjab is concerned, in saying that the duties of the summary Courts were confined to this class of cases; but I speak subject to correction on this matter. It is sometimes supposed that these summary Courts, however, dealt only with petty offences, such as breaches of military law regulations. That, is an entirely incorrect assumption, and if Hon'ble Members will see the Statement that, I think, was laid on the table here recently, if not I will have it so placed, they will see that the summary Courts dealt with many offences of great gravity, such as arson, theft, rioting, breaches of the Railway Act—and they are really very serious—and offences under the Telegraph Act, which really meant the endangering of all communications both between the Local Government and their officers and between the Government of India and the Local Government. Many of these men are now under confinement, and I want to make it clear to the Council that, unless their confinement is now ratified in some manner, then the continued detention of these men in jail is illegal. In fact from the date on which martial law expired our only justification for retaining these men in custody was our intention to introduce an Act of this character at the earliest opportunity.

"My Lord, I will now, if I may, proceed to explain the Bill clause by clause. I will not deal with clause 1, which is of no great importance, but proceed at once to clause 2. That clause indemnifies any officer of Government, whether civil or military, from any action, civil or criminal, in respect of any matter or thing done for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order. But I want Hon'ble Members to read and fully consider the effect of the proviso to that clause 'provided that such officer or person has acted in good faith and in a reasonable belief that his action was necessary for the said purposes.' Those are really the governing words of the clause. I think I have already said, or at any rate I say now, that this Bill will in no way forestall the inquiry by the Committee, and I will proceed to justify that statement. I do not think that any member of this Council will for a moment suppose that the Committee of Inquiry, which assesses the blame for these disturbances, will recommend any form of punishment for any officer of Government who has acted bona fide and in a reasonable belief that what he did was necessary. Further, in any case the report of the Committee is not affected by this Bill. This Bill protects officers against proceedings in the Courts of justice. The report of this Committee, whatever be its value, will in no sense be evidence for the purposes of any such case; that is a matter which can only be decided on evidence in the Courts. The Government of India have decided, for the satisfaction of their own conscience and to meet the public demand, to appoint a Committee to inquire into these disturbances, and their action on the report of that Committee will not be limited or barred by this Act in any way. This Bill simply deals with suits and legal proceedings, and really all that it seeks to do is to protect from legal proceedings bona fide action taken with a reasonable belief that it was necessary to suppress disorder, and not any action taken mala fide or without good reason. We make no attempt by this Bill at any rate to protect officers who have been guilty of excesses which cannot be justified by the terms of this proviso. Now I myself shall be much surprised and disappointed if the Council will not give protection to officers for actions of this character, actions which are morally right though they may be legally wrong, that is, actions for which no strict legal justification can be made out. If this Council says that in a time of this character when the country was in great disorder,—and I put it very mildly,—officers who acting on the understanding that martial law had been proclaimed by an authority which is superior to them, over whose actions they have no control, if officers acting on that assumption and acting bona fide and perfectly reasonably are not to be protected by Government, then the future prospects of Government officers is very serious. How can any member of this Council expect an officer to act confidently, firmly and decisively if he knows that this Legislative Council and the Government will repudiate his action at the first opportunity? Is he not entitled to come down here and say 'I have done what I was told. I have acted perfectly reasonably, I have acted fairly, I have acted bona fide; now give me that protection which I am entitled to by all constitutional practice.' My Lord, in a Resolution published by this Government some time ago, I think during the period of the disturbances, we solemnly promised that we would afford all those charged with the onerous duty of restoring order our full countenance and support, and it is in fulfilment of that promise that I now come to this Council and ask Hon'ble Members to ratify what we then promised, believing that that is a just and honourable course which must commend itself to all Members here. As I said before, I conceive it to be impossible that the Committee should censure any one who is not guilty, who has acted bona fide and in a reasonable belief, that his action was necessary, and the report of the Committee will not and cannot affect the liability of officers of Government in the Courts of law. That is the reason, my Lord, why I say that this Bill, which merely seeks to protect those who have done their duty, in no way forestalls the report of inquiry by this Committee.

"I now come on to section 3, and this is a section which, I am afraid, I shall have to explain at some length, because there exists considerable misapprehension about it. Section 3 says:

> 'For the purposes of section 2 a certificate of a Secretary to Government that any act was done under the orders of an officer of Government shall be conclusive proof thereof, and all action taken for the aforesaid purposes shall be deemed to have been taken in good faith and in a reasonable belief that it was necessary therefor unless the contrary is proved.'

"Now a certificate of a Secretary to Government only proves, and the Hon'ble the Law Member will bear me out here, that the act was done under the orders of an officer of Government Many private individuals during these recent disturbances have assisted Government in various ways, many indeed have been of the greatest assistance to the authorities; and all that this portion of the clause says is; that if any man acted under the orders of an officer of Government and can get a certificate to that effect, thus far and no further is that certificate conclusive proof of that fact. The question of bona fides, as I understand the Bill, is a matter for the Court entirely. That is, a man will go to the Court and it will be for the Court to say, whether his action was bona fide and reasonable, and what fairer proposition could be put to this Council? When a man goes down the Court shall have power to say, 'yes, you did so and so, whether it was reasonable or not, that shall be judged by one of the Government judges acting in his judicial capacity.' My Lord, if there is any cause of complaint in this matter, it might well be on the side of Government officers, that the Bill does not go far enough, and if Hon'ble Members will look to the Act of 1860, which was passed after the Mutiny, they will see that the provisions of that Act went very much further than this, and that when a Secretary to Government there ratified the conduct of an officer, this ratification absolved the man altogether from any possibility of a suit; that is the kind of certificate which apparently some Hon'ble Members think that this Bill provides. It does not. If this Bill had come on for consideration after the Commission of Inquiry, after the whole of these matters had been investigated, it might have been possible to frame it in that way. It is true, however, that this clause does go thus far, that it provides that, 'all action taken for the aforesaid purposes,' that is for restoring order, 'shall be deemed to have been taken in good faith and in a reasonable belief that it was necessary therefor, unless the contrary is proved.'

"My Lord, is a Government officer to be denied even that protection, that he shall be presumed to have acted in good faith, that he shall be presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty! Is that much to ask from this Council? Is that a reasonable request, or is it not? I believe also that a clause of this kind is a normal condition—I speak again subject to correction—of many Indemnity Bills of this character.

"My Lord, I now pass on to clause 4, which sanctions the retention in custody of persons convicted by summary Courts. I have explained to this Council that many of these men have been convicted of serious offences; that they are in reality dangerous criminals whom it would be most unsafe to release wholesale upon the countryside. I believe—I have been told this by the Punjab Government also—that any such release would not be compatible with the public safety. But I ask Members of Council to read this clause again with clause 6. Clause 4 says: that every person confined under or by virtue of a sentence passed by a Court, or any other officer acting in a judicial capacity, shall be deemed to have been lawfully confined and shall continue so until discharged by lawful order or released by order of the Governor General in Council.' Clause 6, however, again limits that and restricts the operation of that clause. First of all it says:—

'Nothing in this Act shall apply to any sentence passed or punishment inflicted by or under the orders of any Commission appointed under the Martial Law Ordinance, 1919.'

"Members of this Council are aware that various persons who have been convicted by the Commissioners appointed under this Ordinance have appealed to the Privy Council. It would obviously be improper for us to attempt in any way by an Act now to invalidate the actions of those Commissioners. The sentences depend for their validity upon Ordinances already passed. I do not propose to discuss the question of these Ordinances here for one moment, nor would it be relevant to this discussion. All I wish to point out is, that this Bill in no way affects sentences by Commissioners appointed under the Ordinances. Then there is a second limitation, that the Bill in no way prejudices the right of any person who thinks he has been dealt with unjustly to appeal to the Privy Council from sentences of these summary Courts. There is no intention, even if there were the power, of which there may be some doubt, of interfering with that right. Any man who has been convicted by one of these summary Courts is at liberty to go and seek for leave to appeal to the Privy Council just as if this Bill had not been passed. I tried to make that clear because it has been suggested that in some way the action of this Government, in introducing this Bill, is intended to prejudice the authority and power of the Judicial Committee. It is quite clear to my mind that it is not so. It has been our deliberate intention to make that abundantly manifest to every reasonable man. At the same time, my Lord, I do admit that there are many men in this country, perfectly loyal citizens, men of weight and authority, who have grave apprehensions and felt great uneasiness as to many of these convictions. We believe that many of those apprehensions are ill-founded, but still there is no getting over the fact that there is this sense of uneasiness as to the correctness of all these convictions. That apprehension has been alleviated to a considerable extent, but not removed, by the admitted clemency of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor and the debate on the Resolution to appoint a Committee to investigate these occurrences indicated—I think, on the part of many Members of this Council, Members not hostile to this Government, not unreasonably opposed to everything we do, but Members who are ready to co-operate with Government in this matter, in all matters, and who really seek to do what is right—uneasiness in the mind of many Members of this Council and a feeling that some of these sentences had not been examined with sufficient care; and there was further indication of that feeling in the proposal made for revising the terms of reference to the Committee. I think Hon'ble Members will remember the various suggestions. Well, to meet these apprehensions the Government of India have decided to have all these cases examined and revised by two Judges of the High Court, one being an Indian and one being a European, in order that they may recommend to His Excellency the Viceroy or the Governor General in Council, as the case may be, through the Local Government, such action as they think fit, either in the direction of remitting or commuting sentences, or any other course they may think desirable, having regard to the circumstances of the case. My Lord, it is the desire of the Government of India that full justice should be done in this matter. They are as anxious as any Member of this Council that innocent men should not be detained in jail. One point, however, I have not made clear, and that is, that our intention is that only the cases of those men who remain under sentence should normally be inquired into by these Judges, though they will also deal with any other cases which may specifically be referred to them by His Excellency or the Government of India.

"Now, I do hope that this will meet the approval of Council and indicate the desire of Government to prevent injustice. I believe that such a Tribunal as we propose, being composed of judicial officers, will be far more effective for the purpose of seeing that justice is done than any Committee of Inquiry which may be appointed to investigate the general occurrences. For, not only will the officers have the advantage of judicial experience, but, by reason of their being on the spot, they can be not to work immediately and directly. So that I hope the matter will be dealt with with reasonable expedition.

"There is only one other clause in the Bill, clause 5, to which I need draw attention, and that provides for the payment of compensation where the property of any person has been commandeered by the military authorities. Members of this Council are aware that when martial law is declared and when the military authorities take over control, they frequently have to, and frequently do, commandeer property for their own use, if such action is in the public interests necessary. All that this clause proposes is, that the Government should pay compensation for such commandeering and provides the means by which the compensation may be assessed.

"My Lord, summarising what I have said, I want to make one or two points quite clear. First, this Bill is the inevitable consequence of martial law. Whether martial law was necessary or not, we must at least protect our officers. The Bill will not in any way forestall the decision of the Committee of Inquiry. The indemnity of officers is limited, and reasonably limited, to those who have acted bona fide, the question of bona fides will be decided by the Courts, and the validating clause, to which I have referred already, does not affect either any case tried by the Commissions or any right of appeal to the Privy Council. Further, in order to prevent any injustice, and, so far as we are able, to enable us to exercise clemency, so far as is compatible with the public safety, we will have the cases of the men convicted by these summary Courts and still in jail revised by two of the best judicial authorities that we can procure. My Lord, I contend that this is a reasonable Bill, a Bill of the most moderate character, and that it only affords such protection as it is essential for us to give to our officers, which they have a right to demand of us and which it is our paramount duty to give them. I may be asked, why the Bill is introduced at this season. Indeed, I promised the Council to explain this, and, having regard to what your Excellency said, if I am only to speak once both on the Bill and the amendment, save for my right of reply, I ought to explain now why the Bill is introduced at the present juncture. The reason is very simple. If it is not passed now, if it is not brought into effect now, then our officers, officers who, ex hypothesi, have behaved fairly and properly, will be left liable to suits at the instigation of any malicious person. Is that reasonable, is that fair? I may be told that no suits will be brought in the immediate future. My Lord, suits might be brought, might even be decreed against them before any Bill was brought forward in this Council, not against men who have acted mala fide, but against those who have merely done their duty with the greatest care and in the most reasonable manner. I say to this Council that that is a position to which no reasonable man here can ask us to submit our officers. Many of the men against whom suits might be brought, against whom action might be taken, may have gone from this country. Should they be left with this sword of Damocles hanging over them although they have done nothing to deserve it? Is that fair? Then, there is another point. If this Council does not validate the detention in jail of these criminals, to whom I referred just now, then we shall have at once to release the whole number of these dangerous offenders on the world. I have told you that we have consulted the Punjab Government on this matter, and they were definitely of opinion that such a release was not compatible with the public safety. The men are not convicted of minor petty offences at all; they are men who were engaged in the burning and looting of stations, in the attacks on railway lines and in the cutting of telegraph wires, guilty of theft and very many of them of arson. They are a class of men who cannot be released with safety at present, and I submit that this Council will be well advised if they do not ask us to release them. My Lord, looking round the Council here, I see many members, who have large vested interests in the country. I should like to know how long they would retain their property, their wealth or even their lives if the forces of disorder were once to break loose in this country. I ask the Members of this Council to look at the question in that light. Is it not their bounden duty to afford protection to those who have undertaken terrible responsibilities in times of difficulty and done their duty bona fide and honestly? That is the question that I put to each Member here. I want them to visualise what the position of an officer of Government in such circumstances is. Take the case of a young military officer. He does not know whether martial law has been rightly or wrongly proclaimed. His one object is to perform his duty, to do it fairly and honestly. He is told that the country is in disorder and that his duty is to suppress it. He tries in a reasonable and fair way to carry out what he believes to be his duty, and then, when he comes to this Council for protection, my Lord, are we to say, 'No, we cannot give it to you until an inquiry has taken place', or 'Postpone it till some other day.' I do hope and trust that this Council will not endorse any such monstrous proposition. It is often assumed that it is only Europeans and Government that are interested in the maintenance of order. Hon'ble Members know that that is not so. Once rioting breaks out, who are the people who suffer? At least some Hon'ble Members of this Council know that they would be the first—their whole existence depends on the maintenance of law and order in this country. And how can they expect, how can any Member of this Council expect, military officers of Government to do their duty unless they receive reasonable support? A military officer is in a position of peculiar difficulty. If he does not suppress disorders, he is liable to censure, blame and punishment at the hands of his superior officers. If he does not take adequate measures, he may be removed from his office. Why, even civil officers in England have been held to blame for action of that kind. Take the case of the Mayor of Bristol. After the Bristol riots he was accused of failing to do his duty in not having taken adequate measures to quell the disorders and he was prosecuted. But, apart from his personal responsibility, every officer of Government in this country is responsible under the system of administration for the lives and property of many hundreds and thousands living under his charge. Let each Member visualise to himself what his position would be faced with these difficulties, often with insufficient forces at his disposal to cope with disorders, doing what he thinks to be his duty, acting according as God gives him to see the right, and then being penalised and held liable to prosecution and persecution afterwards for no reason whatsoever.

"My Lord, I have spoken with some heat because I want to make it plain that I conceive that refusal to grant the limited protection which we ask for our officers would be a gross injustice to those whom we have solemnly undertaken to protect.

"My Lord, I have attempted throughout my speech to say nothing that can in any way prejudice the result of the inquiry by the Commission. I have dealt solely with principles, not with particular actions. Whether any particular action was reprehensible, whether it was right or whether it was wrong, is not a matter which comes within the scope of this Bill. That is a matter either for the Committee of Inquiry and subsequent action by Government or for decision by the Courts. I have endeavoured throughout my speech to avoid saying anything which may prejudice the inquiry. I have also endeavoured, and I hope successfully, to avoid saying anything which might promote racial ill-feeling, and I would ask Hon'ble Members who follow me, so far as they are able, to follow the same course, remembering always how far the deliberate promotion of racial feeling—no, I will cancel that word 'deliberate,' for I do not wish to excite any bitterness myself—I will say ill-feeling has been responsible for the deplorable loss of life, and for the terrible happenings in this country. I would ask each Member of this Council, in speaking to this motion, to realise that any intemperate language of his which may revive or promote such ill-feeling is a great danger, and to remember that the man who uses it is rendering a real disservice to this country and is pursuing a course of conduct the dangers of which, in present circumstances, it is difficult to overestimate."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—"My Lord, may 11-53 A.M. I respectfully inquire of the Hon'ble the Home Member if this committee of judges will go into the question of conviction also and not only of the sentences?"

The President :—"I certainly did not catch what the Hon'ble Member was saying."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—"I beg to inquire, my Lord, whether this committee . . . . ."

The President :—"More slowly, please.'

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—"Whether this committee of judges will go into the question of convictions or only of sentences?'

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"If it will make any difference to the Hon'ble Member's amendment, I shall be very glad to give this information."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda :—"My Lord, I beg to move this amendment which stands in my name and it reads as follows :—

'That the consideration of the motion do stand over till after the submission of the report of the Committee of Inquiry into the Punjab affairs.'

"My Lord, I wish at the outset to assure your Excellency and the Council that I have not taken upon myself to move this amendment with a light heart. I have listened to the very impressive and very weighty utterance of the Hon'ble the Home Member, and I am aware that your Excellency's Government is convinced of the imperative necessity, according to their information, of this legislation; and if I move this amendment, not to oppose the passing of this Bill, but for the purpose of postponing its consideration now, I can assure the Council that it is due to an impelling sense of duty. I have given the matter my most serious and, I may add, anxious consideration, and I felt it to be my duty to place this amendment before the Council. In doing so, regard being had to the considerations which the Hon'ble the Home Member has so impressively and eloquently pleaded for, in proposing my amendment in view of the circumstances, I propose to avoid, as far as possible, all debatable matters. Of course a certain amount of controversy and dispute is inevitable; I shall try to minimise it. There are so many matters to speak about and there is no time limit, and there might be a temptation to go on for a long time, but, my Lord, I shall try to be very brief; and for this purpose I do not propose to go into any individual cases about which it is charged that the administration of martial law has been guilty of excesses. There is one other remark which I wish to submit before I go into my motion. My Lord, it is a matter of great regret to us, I consider it almost as an irony of fate, that this painful episode in the administration of the Punjab Government should have to be discussed after His Honour Sir Edward Maclagan has assumed charge of the province. We know that in the short time he has been in charge of the province he has endeared himself not only to the province but to the country as a whole. It is well-known that every one heaved a sigh of relief when His Honour was able to take charge of the province. I am sure His Honour will understand that in bringing this matter at this stage, after His Honour has been in charge of the province, it is only from a painful sense of duty that we do so.

"Now, coming to the amendment, I may say at once that I agree to the general proposition which has been stated by the Hon'ble the Home Member, and which is also mentioned in the Statement of Objects and Reasons of the Bill, namely, that after a period of martial law such legislation is inevitable. In fact, I think the Hon'ble Member might go further and say with Professor Dicey whom he has quoted that in England such legislation is undertaken before the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Acts runs out. That is so in England; but, my Lord, my submission is this that the cases are not really analogous; the conditions obtaining in England are not the same as in this country. In England, it is well-known that it is the British Parliament with whom rests the question of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Acts. Here under the Statute, it is your Excellency in Council who have to declare martial law. Therefore, the necessity which might exist in England for an Act of this kind does not necessarily exist in this country. Now, that apart, if we inquire as to why it is usual that in England suspensions of the Habeas Corpus Acts are always as a matter of course followed by a Validating Act, we shall see that that is because there has been up to now no case where the question of the necessity of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Acts has been raised. It has always been accepted that there was clear necessity. Where there is undisputed necessity for the declaration of martial law or suspension of the Habeas Corpus Acts, of course the Validating or Indemnity Bill will follow as a matter of course. But, my Lord, here the case is different. Here it has been denied, it has been disputed that there was any necessity for this declaration of martial law. The public have complained that martial law was declared on insufficient, inadequate grounds; that there are grave doubts whether under the existing conditions it could be legally done, and that there have been excesses under that declaration. In view of all this that differentiates the case of India from that of England, I say, my Lord, that the question as to why while I do admit that a validating or indemnity Bill follows as a matter of course the declaration of martial law or suspension of the Habeas Corpus Acts, I oppose this motion or rather move that this motion do stand over does not arise. If the question can arise, my Lord, I submit the answer has been given to this by the Government themselves. I do not think there has been any case anywhere where there has been an inquiry about the necessity of martial law. I do not think there has been any case in India where a Committee of Inquiry was appointed to discuss and to investigate the necessity or legality of a declaration of martial law, but here the question was raised and the Government of India accepted straightaway the challenge as it were, and appointed a Committee of Inquiry to go into these matters. I submit, my Lord, that that has made all the difference. No doubt the composition of the Committee and the terms of reference do not fully satisfy the public demand; but that is another matter. Now, my Lord, what are the scope and the functions of this Committee of Inquiry? We learned from your Excellency's speech on the 3rd that the Committee of Inquiry was to inquire into and report about, among other things, the measures taken to cope with the disorders in the Punjab. What were the measures that were adopted in the Punjab? It is no other than the declaration of martial law. The question that arises is, whether there was any necessity for that declaration, whether it was proper to declare martial law, whether under the conditions obtaining at the time there was legal power to declare martial law, and whether it has been carried out properly. These are questions, my Lord, that this Committee will have to decide. Now what is the reason, the justice, the necessity for this Bill? If we look to the Preamble of the Bill we see it is stated :—

'Resort to martial law.' These, my Lord, are the very matters which this Committee of Inquiry will have to go into and report on; that is the basis of this Bill. I submit that that can hardly be fair. I submit that having referred this matter for inquiry by this Committee, the Government of India have divested themselves for the moment of the power of going into this matter. If you go on with this Bill then what is there remaining for the Committee to go into? What will remain, if you now assume that there was necessity for martial law, what would remain for the Committee to inquire into? Whether there was any necessity for martial law? But we are told by the passing of this Bill that there was a necessity, for the declaration of martial law. This is surely prejudging the question, it is tying the hands of the Committee, it is not fair. My submission is that on this ground you are prejudging the question. The Committee are in possession of the seizin as lawyers call it of this matter. This Council has no jurisdiction to go into the matter at this stage. Of course as the matter has been referred to the Committee, it would not be right for the Council now to go into the question, as to whether the declaration was necessary or legal, or whether it was properly carried out. My submission is this that, in view of this and in view of the complaint that martial law was improperly and illegally declared, I think we ought to state the case on which this demand is made. My Lord, what is the law under which this martial law has been declared? It is the Bengal State Offences Regulation, X of 1804. What are the conditions under which this Regulation can be enforced? The Preamble says that there are two conditions, in the first place, it must appear that the British Government is at war with any other power, or that there was a state of open rebellion in the country. These are the two conditions which give jurisdiction to the Government to enforce this Regulation in any place it wishes. Nobody will contend for a moment that at the time this declaration was made the British Government was at war with any other power. Then we have to fall back upon the second condition, namely, that there was a state of open rebellion in the country. On what is this condition based? What is the proof that there was open rebellion in the country at the time? My Lord, it is well known that after the Rowlatt Bill was passed in the teeth of opposition from the Indian members of this Council and the country, Mr. Gandhi, as a last resort, declared Satyagraha or passive resistance. We need not go into the question whether it was wise or not; it is a fact that he did so and the 6th of April was appointed as the Satyagraha day to be observed in the country as a day of humiliation and prayer on which all business was to be suspended. We know that that was done in the country and that there was no disturbance anywhere. Now what about the Punjab? Was there any response in the Punjab to this appeal of Mr. Gandhi's? Now before going into the question I may tell the Council that on the 7th April His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Michael O'Dwyer, held a Durbar and delivered a speech in the course of which he said 'From the Prince's palace down to the peasant's hut I find I can meet Punjabis of whatever class or condition without any suspicion or mischief'. That was on the 7th April. Surely this language could not have been used by the ruler of the Province if there was anything like rebellion there. It is inconceivable that such language could have been employed if there was anything indicating in the remotest degree that there was rebellion in the province, not only at that time but even a week after when martial law was declared. But what happened when this appeal of Mr. Gandhi was published, how was it received in the province? There is an account published in the 'Civil and Military Gazette', a newspaper which is not as a rule friendly to Indian aspirations and public movements. It is there stated that between 1 and 2 P.M., crowds had collected in the city and moved towards the Town hall where a meeting took place to protest against the Rowlatt Bills. This meeting was held between 5 and 6 P.M., the proceedings were orderly and no disturbances occurred in the city or outside the hall. Then what took place at Lahore on the 6th of April?

"We find, moreover, my Lord, that it was not only at Lahore, but at Ferozepore, Gurdaspore, Hissar, Jullundur, Mooltan, Muzzaferpore, Rohtak, Sialkot and Simla, demonstrations and hartals were observed but there were no disturbances. Is that the sign of open rebellion which somebody seems to have discovered in the Punjab? I think, my Lord, in a sense it might be said to be rebellion. We know that Sir Michael O'Dwyer was in the habit, both in season and out of season, somewhat aggressively, of priding himself that his province was the quietest, the most loyal and the most well-behaved of all the provinces in India and from which he was able to drive out the disease known as political agitation. Now these demonstrations in their intensity and widespread character must have shocked His Honour, awakened to a grim and unpalatable reality and forced the realisation to him most unwelcome, that his province was going to be infected, converted to the evil ways of the other and vicious provinces. We get an insight, we get some glimpse into his inner thoughts, if we turn to the speech of His Honour which he delivered at the Durbar the following morning when he said this: 'that the British Government which has crushed foreign foes and quelled internal rebellion could afford to despise political agitators.' Now what was the occasion for this remark, my Lord? I say that explains the psychology of the subsequent orders and proceedings. Well, I might point out that there were not only these demonstrations in utter defiance of his wishes, almost as a challenge to him, but what is more, the horror of horrors, there was at the time going to grow up what is called the Hindu-Moslem fraternisation. We read in the 'Civil and Military Gazette' on the 9th April: 'At Lahore there was a procession held accompanied by extraordinary scenes of Hindu-Moslem fraternisation. In Amritsar, the procession showed similar scenes of Hindu-Moslem fraternisation, speeches were delivered and votes of sympathy were passed with the Delhi martyrs.' It is exceedingly significant that that was placed as a piece of evidence in a case before the Martial Law Courts as evidence of rebellion. My Lord, this state of things, these demonstrations and hartals, and these scenes of Hindu-Moslem fraternization certainly were very uncomfortable, and it was felt that something must be done, some steps should be taken to nip in the bud the incipient rebellion in the Province, and we find that the first overt act in this campaign against political agitation was that on that very night Mr. Gandhi who was then on his way to Delhi on a peaceful mission was obstructed under the orders of His Honour the Lieutenant Governor at a small station called Kosi, which is in the Punjab territory, and turned back and was escorted to Mr. Gandhi's province, Bombay. Well, that was wired all over the country as the arrest of Mr. Gandhi. What was the result? We know there have been very unfortunate happenings throughout the country. Now, my Lord, it is usual for the Anglo-Indian papers to put down these happenings to agitation against the Rowlatt Act. My submission is, my Lord, that the Rowlatt Act can no more be held responsible for these happenings than the action of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, which was described by Mr. Kali Nath Roy as an act of blazing indiscretion for which he was sent to jail for three years. Well, my Lord, let us see what happened in the Punjab. I say the news of the arrest of Mr. Gandhi was received at Lahore on the afternoon of the 10th. Let us see what happened there. But there is a difficulty here to find out what happened. On the following morning, the 11th, Sir Michael O'Dwyer acting under the Defence of India Rules, passed an order muzzling the Indian press, prohibiting the publication of any account that took place on the previous day. Now why this anxiety to keep the outside world in the dark as to the happenings at Lahore on the 10th? Therefore, the public outside Lahore, we, had to rely on the Government Communiques and the accounts given in the Anglo-Indian press, for the events that took place at Lahore and other places on the 10th. Of course the Anglo-Indian press were evidently able to be above the orders of Government with regard to the publication of accounts of any events. The Government Communique is this: This is dated the 12th April:

'Lahore. The shops in the city and its vicinity were closed and a noisy crowd endeavoured to force its way towards the Civil Lines. This crowd was met with a small police detachment near the High Court, and on its refusal to abandon its progress was dispersed, under the orders of the District Magistrate by musket fire. At a later hour in the evening, the police were again compelled to fire on a disorderly crowd which attacked them with missiles in the vicinity of the Lahori Gate. Two persons were killed in the day's firing and about four others wounded.'

These are the words of the Government Communique, and the account that was published in the 'Civil and Military Gazette' was this :—

'A crowd collected in the bazar which rapidly grew and started coming down Anarkali. Then the mob which had assumed a very threatening attitude proceeded down the Mall. By this time the police were out in force, and a party of them stopped the mob. The Deputy Commissioner then arrived, and seeing the seriousness of the situation and the impossibility of stopping the mob by any other means, gave the order to fire. This produced some result, for the crowd went back and were forced up Anarkali Bazaar. Then they formed at the top of the Bazaar where they had to be dispersed again by fire. . . . The arrangements throughout were in the hands of the civil authorities as, thanks to their immediate and effective action, the necessity did not arise to ask the military to take charge.'

"But the 'Pioneer' went one better and in its account on the 13th it says :—

'The European residents, already disturbed by the news from Amritsar, had to face a serious situation created by an infuriated mob which was bent on mischief. Large forces of military and the police promptly dealt with the outbreak, and on more than one occasion had to fire on the mobs. Strong action resulted in the restoration of order and the city is now being patrolled. . .'. Buckshot cartridges were used.'

"But on the following day it says :—

'Buckshot was supplied to the police, except for 5 rounds of ball issued by mistake.'

"On the 20th there was another Government Communique to contradict what appeared in the 'Leader' about this, and this is what it said :—

'The facts are that despite orders previously promulgated forbidding processions, a large crowd, probably of some thousands, marched from the city up the Mall, forcing back a small body of police which tried to bar their progress. The crowd consisted of city rif-raff and students, but the latter were grown up and not boys. The crowd was making its way to the civil station and would undoubtedly have committed excesses such as marked the Amritsar occurrences, had it been allowed access to the European quarters.'

"These are all the accounts published by Government and the Anglo-Indian papers of the occurrences in Lahore on the 10th. What do they say? Never mind for the present that there are serious contradictions. Take the account substantially as it stands. I ought to mention, my Lord, that there is another fact. The 'Civil and Military Gazette' on the 16th of May stated that the Deputy Superintendent of Police was struck on his head which had to be bandaged. Now it is remarkable that this incident is not mentioned in the Government Communiques nor in the Associated Press telegram. As a matter of fact, this police officer was struck, his head was broken, there was a split. How is it that this incident does not find a place in the Government Communiques? The fact of the matter is that, as was discovered by the 'Civil and Military Gazette' later, it was 'caused by a policeman by mistake' and not by the mob, that is why it was not mentioned by the Government Communique. Now take the accounts as they stand, what do we find? That a mob, unarmed, it must be remembered, unarmed, 'of city rif-raff and students,' to quote the words of the Government Communique, were making their way from the city towards the Mall. What happened? It does not appear that any serious attempt was made to persuade the mob to go back, that civil force was attempted. But from a sense of panic the order to fire was given and there were casualties. What did they do? It is not stated anywhere that they did any injury to any one or destroyed any property on their journey from the city to the Mall. It was asserted in the latest Government Communique that they would have done mischief, but why is this assumed, it is not stated that up to then anything was done by that mob. Well, what were the objectives of the mob? Was an inquiry made to find out why this mob was proceeding towards the Mall? It was unarmed it must be remembered. Well if the object was to do any wrong, to break the law, is it conceivable that 'this rif-raff and students' would go unarmed,' or would refrain from doing anything in the city or in their journey up the Mall? No inquiry was made as to why they were journeying to the Civil lines. If an inquiry had been made it would have been found that their object was nothing more than to interview His Honour himself and to intercede with him and ask him to withdraw that order against Mr. Gandhi. But what happened? This march of the unarmed mob of city riff-raffs and students was the first overt act of rebellion. Anyhow, my Lord, whatever happened then, it was put down in the course of an hour if it was a rebellion, it was quieted in an hour's time. We read in the Government Communique 'that by 8 P.M., the city was quiet; after that time no further disturbance occurred.' Thus in an hour's time this rebellion was put down.

"Then what happened on the following day, on the 11th? We find again from the Government Communique that on the 11th everything was quiet. Well, is that a sign, my Lord, of any rebellion at Lahore at the time? The solitary instance mentioned is that a mob of some three or four hundred people, unarmed, 'city rif-raff and students', were proceeding towards the Mall, and assuming that they were rioters, they met with their deserts because they were fired on by the armed police and there were some casualties, but after that everything was quiet and there was nothing on the following day. Then, on the 12th, what happened? On the 12th the Government Communique says:—

'On the morning of the 12th troops passed through Lahore city and occupied certain commanding points. At one point only the crowed obstructed the passage of the troops and brickbats were thrown. The police accompanying the march, under the orders of the District Magistrate, dispersed the crowd, two being killed and as many were wounded.'

"And the 'Civil and Military Gazette' on the 13th says;—

'The rendezvous for the march of troops and police through the Lahore city was the cross roads outside the railway station at 9-15 A.M. The crowd in front of the fort in Minto Park had to be forced back and the cavalry dispersed it without using their lances. The crowd, however, came in again behind in rear of the cavalry and the Deputy Commissioner ordered a detachment of police to get behind the cavalry and fire.'

"And there was an Associated Press telegram which says that 'more than a dozen had been wounded, some of them having received serious wounds. One of them who received 9 wounds on the chest died this afternoon. Nearly 10,000 people attended his funeral. The deceased was a student of the 4th year class and had come here to sit for the University examination.'

"Now, my Lord, as to the assumption that brickbats were thrown at the military, as stated in this Communiqué, it will be seen, neither the 'Civil and Military Gazette' nor the Associated Press telegram corroborates this. However, assuming that this was done, would that constitute rebellion, or would that make it a clear sign or proof that there was rebellion in the city so that you would have to declare martial law? Has it been inquired into by whom and under what circumstances these brickbats were thrown? There is a discrepancy again. One account says the cavalry were obstructed in front and brickbats were thrown, whereas another account says that when they passed through the city the mob came behind and threw brickbats? However, leave that alone. Does that alone constitute a state of rebellion in the city?

"My Lord, I have tried my best to see if there was any other case of rowdysm. I said there was no account published in the Indian papers or any other information than the Government Communiqués and the accounts in the Anglo-Indian papers and there is no allegation of any of this unlawful act anywhere.

"My Lord, beyond these two incidents, one on the 10th and one on the 12th, I have not come across anything mentioned in the papers as having taken place in Lahore. Well, I should feel grateful if the Hon'ble the Home Member will inform the Council if there was any other occurrence in Lahore, which justified the Government in declaring martial law. After this, my Lord, on the 14th, martial law was declared. We do not find on what grounds this order was based. Of course, attempts were made by interpellations in this Council to find out the grounds in justification of martial law, but they have not been answered. Martial law came into force at midnight between the 15th and 16th. Several days later, by another Ordinance, No. IV, this martial law was given retrospective effect so as to cover everything that was done from the 30th of March. My Lord, it is a serious question as to whether this can be done under the law. The matter has been placed before the Privy Council in the appeals which have been admitted, and we shall know the decision of their Lordships. Another question, my Lord, in this connection is, whether this could legally be done. We find, my Lord, that Lord Wellesley, in whose time this State Offences Regulation of 1804 was passed, issued instructions for the guidance of the Local Governments and therein it was stated (Circular of the Marquis of Wellesley, dated the 11th April 1805) 'Even if a person or persons charged with any overt acts of rebellion specified in Regulation X of 1804 shall be apprehended by any military officer, when not in the actual commission of offences of that description, they are to be delivered by the military to the civil power.' That was laid down in the Instrument of Instructions regarding this Regulation, and the Regulation itself shows that only charges against persons caught in flagrante delicto, that is red-handed, could be tried by martial law, and that was expressly declared in the Instrument of Instructions. Furthermore, my Lord, it appears that the Government of Bengal consulted the Advocate General, Mr. Spankie, at the time, and his opinion was to the same effect. Now, my Lord, this question becomes a serious one as to whether retrospective effect could be given to this Regulation by Ordinance No. IV. My submission is that here also the matter is before the Privy Council which has got seisin of the matter, and if you ask this Council now to decide, it would be wrong; you cannot go into this before their Lordships have decided the question as to whether martial law was rightly or lawfully given retrospective effect to by Ordinance No. IV. And this Bill is based upon the assumption that the order was legal, because it is stated in the Bill that anything done between the 30th of March and the date of the passing of this Bill will be protected. Therefore, my Lord, taking all these questions into account, it would not be right to ask this Council to pass this Bill at this time. We must wait for the finding of the Committee, we must wait for the decision of the Privy Council on the questions raised as to the legality of the promulgation of martial law and the giving of retrospective effect to it. Well, let this Committee have a free hand to go into the matter, sift out facts, find out what was done, and then it will be time enough to go into the question of protecting the officers of Government who had carried out the instructions under martial law. The Hon'ble the Home Member has raised the point that, even assuming that martial law was not properly or legally promulgated, the question of protecting the officers of Government remains because it is no fault of theirs that they were called upon to carry out these orders. Now, my Lord, everything depends upon what the orders were and how they were carried out. You cannot say beforehand that you will pass a general law that every officer is protected for anything he did under any order given. Well, so far as that matter goes, that is already provided for under the existing law. Under the Penal Code if a public servant carries out an order given by a superior, whether legal or illegal, how far he is bound to carry it out is provided for in the general law. If the Committee finds out any specific instances not covered by the existing law, then it will be time enough to consider how far that law has to be supplemented. My submission is that at present we have got a general law. Then, my Lord, even in England instances have occurred where officers commanding the military have had to undergo prosecution for excess of zeal in discharging their duty when their services were requisitioned. In connection with the riots in County Claré in Ireland in 1852, a jury brought in a verdict of guilty of murder against the soldiers who had fired on a mob, but for which they would have lost their own lives. So, I submit, my Lord, that it is premature now to consider this point. The whole thing will depend upon what orders were given, how those orders were carried out. At present all that we need consider is provided for in the general law.

"Then, the other point raised by the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent is that, if you are to wait, there will be actions brought against Government officers and they may be decreed. My submission on this is that it is purely imaginary. If any action is to be brought by any man for damages against any officer of Government for anything done during the time martial law was in force, we know that probably at first notice will be given to Government or the Government officer concerned, and after the expiry of the statutory period only can a suit be filed. Then, assuming that no notice is given but suit filed, the mere fact that a suit is filed need not frighten us. Civil suits, it is well known, are not disposed of as expeditiously as criminal cases. Well, a plaint is filed, then a date will be fixed for the defendant to enter appearance and file his written statement. I do not know what the practice in the Punjab is, but I know in Bengal and Assam no date is fixed earlier than three weeks' time. Well, my Lord, if the defendant has to enter appearance before the Council meets the next time, surely the Courts concerned would be bound to grant postponement for filing written statements in such contingencies. Usually, you find in civil cases, two or four months, or even one year has been given for filing written statements in complicated cases. And in a case of this kind no Court will refuse to grant time for adjournment till the next Session of this Council at any rate. From now till the Delhi Session there is only time. First notice will have to be given two months before any suit is filed, and even after the suit is filed, you will get ample time to have the case adjourned till the meeting of the Delhi session of this Council. Even if that is not enough you can easily provide for it in various other ways. You can pass the Bill in the Delhi Session and give it a retrospective effect so that it will cover any suit or action that may have been filed already. You can do more; you can have some provision suspending all these actions in the meantime, till the Council meets at Delhi. Apart from the questions arising from the fact that a Committee of Inquiry has been appointed, I think we should consider that public discussions of the happenings in the Punjab are bound to create some bad blood and should, if possible, be avoided, and that can be avoided if the Council does not rush through with this Bill now. Let the Committee inquire, find out the facts, sift out the facts, and then we can see how far officers ought to be protected, and how far there ought to be an Indemnifying Act. These are my submissions on which I respectfully venture to think that this Bill ought not to be passed at this stage. I spoke only of Lahore, but the same considerations apply as regards other places. With these remarks I place the amendment before the Council."

The Hon'ble Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia:—"My Lord, 12-42 P.M. I must confess that some of us, non-official Members, who are not well versed in legal technicalities—being laymen so far as law is concerned—are placed in a very awkward position when they are required to assent to a measure like the one we are discussing to-day and for the introduction of which leave has been asked by the Hon'ble the Home Member. Persons like myself feel the weight of responsibility very heavy; I cannot say for others but for myself I have felt very keenly. We have, as dutiful subjects of the King-Emperor, a duty to His Majesty the King-Emperor and to the Government established under law in this country; but, on the other hand, being representatives on this Council of the people we owe a duty to our fellow subjects which we have to discharge to the best of our abilities. I can assure your Lordship that I have been feeling this responsibility very keenly and the tension on my feelings for the past few days has been very very great. Under such circumstances one could only bow before the All Omnipotent for light being granted for guidance in the path which may be the right path.

"When I first heard of the Indemnity Bill I was under the impression that we were to be asked to indemnify all actions of Government officers, whether they were done in good faith or not. Till I had seen the Bill, I was under this impression and as such I felt that I could not give support to such a measure, knowing as I do some of the inconveniences and indignities that some of my countrymen have suffered during the currency of the martial law in my province. I have not the remotest inclination to defend those who have broken the law, and I have no hesitation in saying that no Government can afford to let such actions go unpunished. No man who loves peace and order could possibly side with such people who break law and commit atrocities which cause feelings of horror and contempt in the minds of right-thinking and law-abiding persons. But, on the other hand, one cannot shut one's eyes to some of the doings in my province. My Lord, this, however, is not the place to talk of those things. So I would not touch that point at all, as I believe and as I think that they are to be sifted into by the Committee of Inquiry that has been appointed by your Excellency. On the other hand, I would not withhold protection to those officers of Government who have done their duty during these trying times conscientiously, and whose actions have been taken in good faith and in a reasonable belief that they were necessary for the maintenance of law and order in the country. I understand that after martial law an indemnifying measure has always been enacted. Such a measure was passed in 1860 in India. I am not a lawyer, but I am told that that measure was of a more severe nature and went much further than the one introduced to-day. I am also told that indemnifying measures have been passed in other countries also, such as South Africa and nearer home at Ceylon. I would therefore be prepared to give my assent to the measure before us to-day but I want to be assured fully that Government has no intention to afford protection to those who have acted against the strictest sense of justice and against good faith. Though personally I have no doubt on this point and I am sanguine that Government have no intention of that sort, but an assurance of this nature will satisfy public opinion in the country. One thing more, before I give my assent to the measure before the Council. I would like Government to agree and concede that all cases tried under martial law will further be examined and that wherever injustice is found to have been done, those who are detained in jails will be given their liberty. I am glad that the point has been conceded and that two High Court Judges will revise these judgments and I thank Government for this. I have no wish to ask any clemency for those who have committed atrocities ; but on the report of the Committee of Inquiry I would suggest that amnesty be granted, as I think that many of these unfortunate persons have in the heat of the roused feelings been led astray from paths of righteousness and of their duty as law-abiding citizens of the Empire. With this assurance that the Act does not white-wash all actions done in bad faith as against good faith and with the promise of a further reconsideration of the cases tried by martial law courts, I would give my assent to the measure before the Council. I have avoided making any mention of the unfortunate happenings in my province as this Council Chamber is not now the right place for these to be ventilated. They are in a way sub-judice and till the report of the Committee of Inquiry is published, we must suspend our judgments. The other day I asked for an assurance for the protection of persons who come to tender evidence before this Committee of Inquiry. I understand that the Home Member is willing to give that assurance and that steps will be taken to duly proclaim this to the people. I would, therefore, beg my Hon'ble friends and colleagues to refrain from bringing in matters which are now in the province of the Committee of Inquiry to inquire into and sift."

12-50 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, the measure which the Hon'ble the Home Member has asked for leave to introduce is one of the most important measures which have ever been proposed by the British Government in this country, and it calls for very careful consideration. My Lord, the Hon'ble the Home Member has said that where there is disorder and it has been found necessary to proclaim martial law, certain acts have had to be done which may not be strictly justified in law, but may be morally defensible, and that an Indemnity Act almost as a natural consequence followed. Now, my Lord, the Hon'ble Member having raised the question, as it was necessary for him to raise, under what circumstances martial law should be introduced and under what circumstances an Indemnifying Bill or Act is permissible or justifiable, it is necessary for us to go somewhat into this question. I am not going far into the earlier Acts ; I shall start with the period mentioned by the Hon'ble the Home Member, the year 1715. Members of this Council will remember that that was the year in which James the Pretender came over to England, and wanted to wrest the throne of England. 6,000 Highlanders from Scotland joined his forces and there was a regular invasion, an invasion in which there was regular warfare, there were not merely riots and tumults, but actual war waged against the Crown of England. The Pretender was defeated and it was necessary to justify the acts which had been committed in the suppression of that rebellion ; it was in these circumstances that Parliament passed an enactment, like this, Chapter 39 of George I, says :—

> 'An Act to indemnify such persons who have acted in defence of his Majesty's person and Government and for the preservation of the public peace of this Kingdom in and about the time of the late unnatural rebellion from vexatious suits and prosecutions. ~~And~~ Whereas in the year of our Lord 1715 as well as in the time of, as before the unnatural rebellion, which begun in or about the months of September or October in the same ~~your.~~ And whereas divers Lord Lieutenants, Deputy Lieutenants, Justices of the Peace, Mayors, Bailiffs of Corporations, Constables and other officers and persons well affected to His Majesty and his Government in order to preserve our present happy establishment and the peace of this Kingdom and to suppress and to put an end to the said rebellion apprehended and put into custody and imprisoned several criminals and several persons who they suspected might disturb the publick peace or foment or promote riots, tumults, rebellions or evil designs against the Government; and also seized and used several horses, arms and other things and also pressed divers, horses, carts and carriages for the services of the publick; and did for the purposes aforesaid enter into the houses and possessions of several persons and did quarter and cause to be quartered divers soldiers and others in the houses of divers persons; and did divers acts which could not be justified by the strict forms of law and yet were necessary and so much for the service of the publick that they ought to be justified by Act of Parliament and the persons by whom they were transacted ought to be indemnified.

'Be it therefore enacted,' etc.

"Now my Lord, your Lordship will see and the Council will see that the essential point of this enactment is that there was a rebellion which had to be suppressed and put an end to. Secondly, that Parliament expresses itself satisfied that the acts which had been done and which could not be justified by the strict forms of law were yet necessary and that they ought to be justified by an Act of Parliament, and that the persons who committed them ought to be indemnified. That establishes the cardinal principle which underlies legislation of the character which is now before the Council. It is a principle which was re-enacted in 1745. There was a second Pretender, the late Pretender's son, Charles Edward. He tried to invade England—that was in 1745. This time again 6,000 Highlanders joined his forces and later on the number rose to 9,000. There were regular pitched battles fought. Several members of the Scottish peerage and others joined the rebellion. There was regular war and the King's loyal subjects fought against the enemies of the King and defeated them. That was in 1745. It was necessary after the rebellion had been suppressed to introduce an Act of Indemnity. This Act, Chapter 20 of George II, ran as follows:—

'An Act to indemnify persons who have acted in defence of His Majesty's person and Government and for the preservation of the publick peace during the time of the late unnatural rebellion and sheriffs and others who have suffered escapes occasioned thereby from vexatious suits and prosecutions.

'Whereas during the unnatural rebellion which begun in or about the months of July or August in 1745 and still continues, divers Lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, justices of the peace, mayors, bailiffs of corporations, constables, and other officers and persons well affected to His Majesty and his Government in order to preserve our present happy establishment and the peace of this Kingdom and to suppress and to put an end to the said rebellion apprehended and put in custody and imprisoned or caused to be apprehended, put into custody and imprisoned several criminals and several persons who they suspected might disturb the publick peace or foment or promote riots, tumults rebellions or evil designs against the Government and also seized and used several horses, arms and other things and also pressed divers horses, carts and carriages for the services of the publick and did for the purposes aforesaid enter into the houses and possessions of several persons and did quarter and cause to be quartered divers soldiers and others in the houses of divers persons and did divers acts which could not be justified by the strict forms of law and yet were necessary and so much for the service of the publick that they ought to be justified by Act of Parliament and the persons by whom they were transacted and ought to be indemnified.

'And whereas divers sheriffs gaolers and other persons may be or are in danger of being sued, indicted prosecuted or proceeded against by reason of escapes of prisoners let out or discharged by the persons engaged in the said rebellion.

'Be it therefore enacted.'

"Here again the Council will note that the essential point in the preamble is that it was necessary to suppress and put an end to the rebellion and Parliament was satisfied that acts had been performed that were not strictly according to law acts which were not only necessary but it was necessary that the servants of the public ought to be justified by an Act of Parliament. Now, my Lord, the third time that the English Parliament passed an Indemnity Act was in 1780; that was in connection with the Lord George Gordon riots. This was not a rebellion against the King by enemies of Great Britain, but this time the Catholic Relief Bill having been passed a certain section of Protestants in England could not bear the idea that it should be on the Statute-book, and they constituted a strong party and presented a petition to Parliament signed by 120,000 persons asking for the repeal of the Act. They went and invaded the Houses of Parliament. Sixty thousand persons were there, and the riot had to be suppressed. After the riot had been suppressed, Lord George Gordon escaped, but others got the punishment which the law considered fit for them, but after the riots had been suppressed an Act of Indemnity was passed. That was in the year 1780. The Act ran as follows :—

'Chap. LXIII, Geo. III. An Act to indemnify such persons as have acted in the suppression of the late Riots and Tumults in and about the Cities of London and Westminster, and Borough of Southwark and for the Preservation of the public peace.'

" Now the preamble recited :—

' Whereas on the second day of June, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty a great number of disorderly persons assembled themselves together, in a riotous and tumultuous manner, near to both Houses of Parliament, and possessed themselves of the Avenues leading to the same, the said Houses being then sitting, and there committed great Acts of Outrage and Violence to many of His Majesty's subjects; and afterwards proceeded to attack the Houses of some of the Publick Ministers, of Foreign Princes and States, residing at His Majesty's Court, and to break into the Chapels belonging to such Publick Ministers, and to set Fire thereto, and continued riotously and tumultuously assembled for several Days and Nights; and during that Time attacked and set Fire to the Gaol of Newgate, the King's Bench Prison, the Prison of the Fleet, and set at liberty the prisoners therein respectively confined, and broke other Gaols and Prisons, and set at liberty the prisoners confined therein, and set fire to, and pulled down, the Dwelling houses of divers of His Majesty's peaceable subjects, in several Parts in and about the Cities of London and Westminster, and Borough of Southwark, and burnt and consumed the Materials and Furniture of the same, and did other Acts of Outrage and Violence; and whereas divers Magistrates and others have exerted themselves for the suppression of the said riots and Tumults, and for putting an End to the said Outrages, and for restoring and preserving the Publick Peace, and on the Occasions, and for the Purposes aforesaid, have done divers Acts which cannot be justified by the strict Forms of Law, and yet, were necessary, and so much for the Preservation of the Lives and Properties of His Majesty's Subjects, and the Publick Safety and peace, that they ought to be justified by Act of Parliament, and the Persons by whom they were transacted ought to be indemnified; be it therefore enacted . . .'

" Now, my Lord, these enactments clearly lay down that the legislative body which is to give its sanction to the acts which were performed during a time of trouble were necessary for the suppression of a rebellion or riot which amounted to rebellion and that they were so very necessary that the legislative body ought to justify them and indemnify those who had taken part in them. It is not every ordinary riot which would come in the category of the riots mentioned there. It must be a riot which, as Lord Halsbury points out in his article on the Laws of England, must be a riot or rebellion amounting to war. This is what he says in Volume VI of the Laws of England :—

' As the source and fountain of justice, the Crown may issue such Commissions to administer the law as are warranted by the common or statute law. But it may not, without authority, establish Courts to administer any but the common law, and it may not, it is said, grant the right to hold a court of equity. The Crown may not issue Commissions in time of peace to try civilians by martial law; but when a state of actual war, or of insurrection, riot or rebellion amounting to war exists, the Crown and its officers may use the amount of force necessary in the circumstances to restore order, and this use of force is sometimes termed martial law. When once this state of actual war exists, the Civil Courts have no authority to call in question the actions of the military authorities, but the powers of the military authorities cease and those of the Civil Courts are resumed ipso facto with the termination of the disorder.'

" My Lord, the point on which I wish to lay stress is that there must be either a rebellion or insurrection or a riot amounting to war to justify resort to martial law. These are the general principles which the laws of England have laid down. So far as India is concerned, the matter rests on a more definite footing. The Government of India had empowered under Regulation X of 1804 to establish martial law in certain circumstances. Now it is essential to draw attention to the language of that Regulation, because your Lordship professedly acted under that Regulation in declaring martial law in the Punjab. My Lord, that Regulation was passed in 1810, and it ought to be remembered that it was passed at a time when the British Government was trying to establish its power in this country, when there were many small States trying to prevent its establishment or power in this country. That was the period during which this Regulation was passed. Little did I think, my Lord, I venture to say, that the authors of this Regulation had imagined that this Regulation would be resorted to in the Year of Grace 1919 after the great war had been won. However, the Regulation is as follows :—

> ' WHEREAS during wars in which the British Government has been engaged against certain of the native powers of India certain persons owing allegiance to the British Government have borne arms in open hostility to the authority of the same and have abetted and aided the enemy and have committed acts of violence and outrage against the lives and properties of the subjects of the said Government; and whereas it may be expedient that during the existence of any war in which the British Government in India may be engaged with any power whatever, as well as during the existence of open rebellion against the authority of the Government in any part of the British territories subject to the Government of the presidency of Fort William, the Governor General in Council shall declare and establish Martial Law within any part of the territories aforesaid for the safety of the British possessions, and for the security of the lives and property of the inhabitants thereof by the immediate punishment of persons owing allegiance to the British Government who may be taken in arms in open hostility to the said Government or the actual commission of any overt act or rebellion against the authority of the same or in the act of openly aiding or abetting the enemies of the British Government within any part of the territories specified above, the following Regulation has been enacted by the Governor General in Council to be in force throughout the British territories immediately subject to the Government of the presidency of Fort William from the date of its proclamation."

" Now, my Lord, it is clear that this Regulation can only be justly put into force when there is either a war or open rebellion against the authority of the Government. Your Lordship in establishing martial law by the notification, dated Simla, the 14th April 1919, consequently said that :—

> ' Whereas the Governor General is satisfied that a state of open rebellion against the authority of the Government exists in certain parts of the province of the Punjab; now, therefore, in exercise of the power conferred on him he is pleased to make and promulgate the following Ordinance.'

" Now, my Lord, section 2 of the Bengal State Regulation provided that where the Governor General was so satisfied it was open to him to establish martial law, and that section also repeated that it was during the existence of open rebellion against the authority of the Government, or who may have borne arms in open hostility to Government that martial law should be established. In the notification dated the 14th April 1919 your Lordship was satisfied that a state of open rebellion against the authority of the Government existed in certain parts of the province of the Punjab. Now, my Lord, the public have not been told what were the circumstances which constituted a state of open rebellion in Lahore. I gave notice of certain questions and I wanted to find out what it was that constituted a state of open rebellion. But unfortunately the Government told me that the questions could not be answered in view of the fact that an inquiry had been ordered and that it would not be in the interests of the public that these questions should be answered. Now, my Lord, I submit that it was essential, and it is still essential, first to inform the Council, when the Executive Government have come to the Legislative Council to ask for their support to ratify acts which are done under an Ordinance promulgated by the Governor General or the Governor General in Council, what were the circumstances under which martial law was proclaimed. I asked whether the Government would be pleased to lay on the table the correspondence which passed between them and the Punjab Government leading to the declaration of martial law in the Punjab. I also asked whether the Government would be pleased to state the facts and circumstances which, in its opinion, constituted a state of open rebellion against the authority of the Government in certain parts of the Province of the Punjab within the meaning of Regulation X of 1804 between the date on which the Ordinance was promulgated by the Governor-General and the date on which open rebellion was declared to exist in the part of the Punjab to which the Ordinance had been applied. I am sure your Excellency will recognise that these questions sought to do nothing except what was right in the circumstances: I had heard that the 'Pioneer' had proclaimed that an Indemnifying Bill was going to be introduced in this Council, and I gave notice of a question an answer to which it would be necessary to have in order that I should be able . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, may I rise to a point of order? Is it in accordance with the practice in this Council for an Hon'ble Member to refer in public to a question which has been disallowed? Is it not a fact that the Hon'ble Member has been reprimanded for doing this on a previous occasion?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, I do not know of a reprimand and I do not recognise any such reprimand. I am entitled on a Bill before the Council to draw attention to every fact in the Council. I was perfectly right, I submit, to do what I did.

"Now, my Lord, I asked for information, and, as I said before, in answer to my question I was informed that the Government could not answer these questions and numerous other questions of which I had given notice, as a Committee of Inquiry had been constituted or was going to be constituted and these matters would be dealt with by it. Now, my Lord, I would not complain of these questions not being answered if the Government also recognised the fairness, the wisdom of staying its hand until these facts had been placed before the Committee of Inquiry, and until the public had come to know of them. Your Lordship will kindly remember that since this unfortunate declaration of open rebellion in the Punjab, which among other evils contributed to the Afghan war, since the declaration of this open rebellion and the establishment of martial law in the Punjab, the Punjab Government shut the rest of India and the world out from all knowledge of the events which were happening in the Punjab. My Lord, not only were individuals not permitted to go in and expose the events that were taking place there to the light of day, but even the representatives of many respectable well-established leading papers in the country, and a man, himself a man of peace and of humanity, Mr. C. F. Andrews, when he asked permission—I hear a little laughter. My Lord, I do not know what the laughter is about. If it is to say that Mr. Andrews is not a man of peace and humanity, I am sorry for those who think so. Now, my Lord, I say a man of Mr. Hume's antecedents and character, devoted to the service of his fellow men, who goes to different parts of the world in order to serve his fellow men; who was appointed as the representative of several leading papers, who sought permission to go to the Punjab, even after he had paid a visit to Simla and was on his way to Lahore, was stopped at Amritsar and disgracefully dealt with and turned back from the Punjab. Now, my Lord, other papers were not allowed to send their representatives to the Province and other public men were not allowed to go there. The result was that we did not know what had happened. From the information that we had, the All-India Congress Committee met and sent a long cablegram to His Majesty's Secretary of State in which they drew attention to the seriousness of the situation.

"Now, my Lord, in that cablegram the All-India Congress Committee, which met on the 20th and 21st of April at Bombay, passed among others the following resolutions:—

'Resolved that the All-India Congress Committee deplores and condemns all acts of violence against person and property, which were recently committed at Amritsar, Ahmedabad, Viramgaum and other places and appeals to the people to maintain law and order and to help in the restoration of public tranquillity; and it urges upon the Government to deal with the situation in a sympathetic and conciliatory manner immediately reversing the present policy of repression.

'Resolved that the All-India Congress Committee places on record its strong condemnation of orders passed under the Defence of India Act by the Government of the Punjab, Administrator of Delhi and by the Government of India against a person of such well known noble character and antecedents as Mr. M. K. Gandhi. The Committee cannot help feeling that, if these orders had not been passed, some of the regrettable events which followed them, may not have happened. The Committee requests the Government of India to withdraw its own order and to ask the Local Governments in question to do the same.'

"Then, my Lord, there was a cablegram which I sent to His Majesty's Premier and to the Secretary of State for India. I will read it as it stands without articles, etc.

'All India Congress Committee desire most earnestly to represent to His Majesty's Government intense gravity of present situation in India, real causes and need for change of policy pursued at present While deploring and condemning popular excesses which have occurred in some parts of country and which popular leaders have everywhere used their influence not unsuccessfully to restrain, Committee urge impartial consideration of circumstances which have so aggravated and embittered feelings of people throughout country as to make such outbreaks possible. Resolution of Government of India, dated 14th instant, describing present situation as arising out of Rowlatt Act agitation makes only partial statement of case. Undoubtedly intense universal bitterness of opposition to Rowlatt Act forced through legislature by official votes against unanimous protest of all non official Indian members and in face of unparalleled opposition throughout country was immediate cause of recent popular peaceful demonstrations but subsequent excesses were provoked by needless and unjustifiable action of Government of India, and Punjab and Delhi Governments against so revered a personality as that of Mr. Gandhi and against other popular leaders. For complete understanding, however, of present discontent and its causes other important factors must be considered.'

"Then, my Lord, after dealing with the causes which included India's services during the war, and the attitude of European and Anglo-Indian officials towards the Reforms and the fate of Turkey and the Rowlatt Bills, the Committee went on to say:—

'In such circumstances the two Rowlatt Bills were introduced and the principal one forced through Council in spite of unanimous opposition of non-official Indian Members, appeal for postponements and reconsideration and warnings of agitation that would inevitably follow throughout country which was stirred by this measure and uncompromising attitude of Government in degree unparalleled in history of country. Committee here cannot enter in detail as to justifiable apprehensions caused by passing into law of this Act.

'They are content to represent that it is total distortion of facts that an agitation against a measure placed on Statute-book in time of peace depriving subjects under any circumstances of sacred right of free and open trial and otherwise restricting fundamental liberties and depriving accused persons of normal and essential safeguards designed for protection of innocent persons should be regarded as an unreal agitation engineered by political agitators for their own ends Committee have no authority to discuss merits of passive resistance movement led by Mr. Gandhi but would emphasise that nothing but feeling of high-souled patriotism and intense realisation of injustice involved in passing of this measure could have actuated man of his saintly character and noble record Committee submit that so far as facts are publicly known no violence had anywhere been committed by the people until after the arbitrary restrictions placed on Gandhi's movements leading to his arrest and forcible deportation without any announcement about his destination while he was on his way to Delhi with object of pacifying people after unfortunate episode there on March 30th. Grave allegations were made that authorities in Delhi unjustifiably fired on crowds killing and wounding several. Government of India have ignored demands for inquiry into this and have published exparte statement of Local Government exonerating local authorities on unconvincing statements. Had Gandhi been allowed to proceed Delhi Committee believe he would have restored normal conditions. Government on contrary by his arrest and deportation provoked outbreaks in Ahmedabad and Viramgaum. Outbreak had become imminent in Bombay also, but it was averted by wise action of authorities in restraining police and Military and efforts of Gandhi and other leaders pacified people and restored quiet.

'Committee invite attention to the contrast between the rapidity with which tranquillity was restored in Ahmedabad by presence of Gandhi, his co-operation along with that of other leaders with authorities and continuance of disorders in Punjab where reckless and horrible methods of repression under Martial Law such as public flogging of citizens in streets dropping of bombs from aeroplanes, wholesale firing on people assembled in streets, have been resorted to. These methods of repression have created horror and resentment throughout country.

'Committee recognise need for strong measures to deal with popular violence where occurring and popular leaders and bodies and all public men are ready to co-operate with Government in putting down popular excesses and violent movements against authority, but use of such methods as have been in force in Punjab antagonise feeling of people towards Government and sow seeds of bitterness and distrust.

'Committee most earnestly urge His Majesty's Government to intervene and put an end to these methods, and to order the appointment of commission of officials and non-officials to investigate causes of discontent and allegations of excesses by authorities in repressing popular outbreaks,'

"My Lord, that was submitted on the 28th of April this year and it prayed that the Government should appoint an early Commission.

'Committee strongly urge His Majesty's Government to consider that popular discontent has been provoked by causes set forth above. At Amritsar disturbances followed immediately on Sir Michael O'Dwyer s action in arresting and deporting Dr Kitchlew and Dr Satyapal. Committee most earnestly represent that situation cannot be dealt with alone by repression and attitude of sternness towards people displayed in Resolution of Indian Government of 14th instant which gives free hand to Local Governments to employ every weapon in armoury of repression and is sadly lacking in spirit of conciliation. Situation calls for highest statesmanship which will deal with it in spirit which animated British Government and Indian people in their recent struggle for maintenance of liberty and freedom of peoples from despotic domination and not in a mood of ruthless repression.

"All-India Congress Committee feel that they can appeal with confidence to His Majesty's Ministers to consider this representation with sympathy and to take definite steps forthwith to reverse the policy of repression and to satisfy Indian feeling with regard to the Muhammadan question, the reforms and repeal of Rowlatt Act. Committee respectfully submit this action alone will secure real peace and contentment in the land.'

[At this stage the Council adjourned for Lunch.]

3 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" My Lord, the point to which I was drawing attention when the Council rose was whether there was open rebellion in Amritsar and Lahore and certain parts of the Punjab when this notification was published. Because, my Lord, the Bill starts with saying, it assumes, that there was open rebellion and all the acts which took place subsequent to the declaration that there was a state of open rebellion are based upon and flow from it, so to say. Now, my Lord, I have drawn attention to the general situation which existed in the Punjab and the country at about the time when this declaration was made. I have drawn attention to it in order that a birdseye view may be presented of the situation as a whole, and I have shown that the All-India Congress Committee drew the attention of Government to the fact that the disorders which had taken place had their origin not in anything in the attitude of the people so much as in the attitude of the authorities, who had to deal with the people. Now, my Lord, I want to enter somewhat in detail into the circumstances which existed then. I consider it essential to do so in order that this cardinal fact, this key-stone of this whole unfortunate edifice, which constituted the establishment of martial law and its results, should be fairly and squarely fixed at its proper place.

"Now, what happened was, my Lord, that in the last Session of this Council the Rowlatt Bill was introduced. That Bill was opposed practically unanimously by all the Indian Members, and Government was urged to postpone legislation until another Session. The Government did not see fit to yield to that request. Agitation followed in the country and that agitation took one particular shape by the suggestion of Mr. Gandhi. That shape was that the people should express their dissatisfaction with the carrying out of the Rowlatt Act against the wishes of the people by observing a day of humiliation and prayer. My Lord, it is a pity that this action of Mr. Gandhi was not appreciated by all the Local Governments equally well; there were some, I am thankful to say, which appreciated it at its proper estimate and allowed the people to express their injured feelings in the way Mr. Gandhi had suggested. As a result of that suggestion on the 30th March last a hartal was observed, that is, a general closing of the shops was observed at certain places and also at Delhi. At Delhi somewhat unfortunate events took place. Some people tried to put pressure upon some confectioners at the railway station to persuade them to close their business that day, and a crowd assembled, and what took place there led to firing. I do not want to go into greater detail in regard to this matter, but I want to indicate the general fact that the mob was there and as a consequence of what happened, the firing that took place, people's minds were more embittered. That was the first blunder committed. Then, my Lord, a second time firing took place at Delhi and that also gave cause for more resentment. But notwithstanding this unfortunate firing and the loss of life, and the wounds which it inflicted upon some of the people, it is a fact, which cannot be gainsaid, that the 6th April 1919, which was the great Satyagraha day throughout the whole country, was observed throughout the country peacefully. No untoward incident has yet been alleged to have occurred during the observance of that Satyagraha day. Now, what, my Lord, was the Satyagraha day? Hindus and Mussalmans, and Indian Christians, and generally the whole Indian community agreed unanimously to abstain from doing any business that day, closed all their business shops, undergoing a great deal of loss in order to show the general resentment of the Indian community at the attitude of Government, and as a step which might persuade the Government to reconsider their position. Now, my Lord, that passed off well, as I say, and Local Governments other than the Punjab Government did not find in the demonstrations that took place any occasion for embarking upon a policy of repression. But not so the Government of the Punjab as it was then constituted. On the 3rd and 5th April, the Government of the Punjab issued orders against Dr. Satyapal and Dr. Kitchlew forbidding them from making speeches in public. These two gentlemen submitted to that order and nothing untoward happened in Amritsar in consequence thereof. The 6th of April was observed as a Satyagraha day in Amritsar, as well as in other places, and the day passed off peacefully there too. Three days after, there was the Ram Navami procession in Amritsar, that is the day on which Rama's birth is celebrated. It is a great day with the Hindus, but this time Muhammadans and Hindus united with each other in celebrating that day. That is to say, Muhammadans came forward to express their full fellow-feeling with the Hindus in observing that day, and there were great processions in Amritsar, and the Deputy Commissioner of Amritsar witnessed these processions from the Allahabad Bank, where he was, I am told, sitting at the time. My Lord, there is absolutely nothing against the Government in that procession. I am told that while the people shouted out 'Hindu Mussalman-ki-jai' and 'Mahatma Gandhi-ki-jai' they also shouted out 'King-Emperor-ki-jai'; it was a perfectly loyal demonstration and had absolutely nothing to do with any political feeling.

"But there was one feeling which is very important and which has its political value, and that was that Hindus and Muhammadans acted towards each other in a friendly way in which they had never done before in the history of Amritsar. Ordinary observances and caste restrictions and rules were put aside and their fraternising was a matter upon which every reasonable man, every God-loving man and man-loving man ought to rejoice. But on the following day at about 10-30 A.M. these two gentlemen, Dr. Satyapal and Dr. Kitchlew, were ordered to be deported from Amritsar. Nothing had happened up to the moment of their deportation which the public is aware of which would justify that order. They had been told to abstain from speaking in public; they had submitted to that order; nothing untoward had happened, there was no agitation which might endanger the public peace in Amritsar; and yet the Punjab Government thought it fit to issue this order of deportation against two men who were at the moment idolised by the people because they were honest and honourable men and the people felt that the orders were unjust orders.

"Now, my Lord, that was the second blunder committed in Amritsar. And what was the attitude that was behind that blunder? While other Local Governments noted the fact that public feeling was incensed against the attitude of the Government in the matter of the Rowlatt Bill, they thought it fit to allow that feeling to have its free and full expression.

"The Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, on the other hand, thought he must teach a lesson to those who were agitating. In a speech delivered from his seat in the Legislative Council he threatened action and also expressed his dissatisfaction. He said he would take very severe action and that threat he carried out unfortunately in the order of deportation. What happened? Before news of deportation was received business was going on as usual at Amritsar, banks were open, other public offices were open, in fact business men were transacting business as usual. When the news arrived there was a general feeling of resentment and sorrow. Shops were closed in a short time. At that time Mr. John, the Municipal Engineer, cycled through the city. He found people doing their business as usual, there was nothing to give any indication that trouble was coming, and when he passed through the crowds no one noticed him. He found crowds passing the National Bank, and the Chartered Bank, as also the Town hall and other public buildings. The crowd went in the direction of the Deputy Commissioner's bungalow, as has been stated in the evidence of officials as well as non-officials, their object was to go to the Deputy Commissioner and to request that these men, Doctors Satya Pal, and Kitchlew, should be released. Up to then the mob showed no signs of mischief; they passed several public buildings without any thought of injuring them. When they reached the Amritsar foot-bridge they found that a military picket barred their proceeding further in the direction of the civil station. Now, at that place the mob was fired upon; they were at that time unarmed; I am told that they did not even have a stick in their hands; I am told that there was no attitude of defiance or violence, and at that time it is possible that the mob might have been gently pressed back, gently and firmly pressed back. It was then that firing was resorted to, and as a consequence the people became incensed, and that some persons then died, and some were wounded. News was taken to the city; this fostered the resentment of the people. Firing was resorted to a second time near this bridge and more persons were killed. The Deputy Commissioner, in his own statement, says that before firing took place the mob did not commit any excesses. I have evidence to show that violence was done before the shops were fired. Now, my Lord, Mr. Miles Irving, the Deputy Commissioner, says that the worst that he expected from the deputation was a disorderly demonstration at his house. It is alleged on the side of the people that if this firing had not been resorted to, and if more restraint had been exercised, all the evils that followed might not have taken place. My Lord, what happened was deplorable.

Infuriated by having some of the mob killed or wounded, a portion of the mob went back to the city saying 'they have killed some of our men, let us fight them'. Up to that time the evidence proves that no harm was done, the mob then rushed back to where fuel is stacked, I have myself seen the stack of wood, they picked up pieces of wood near the railings and then lost their temper, returned and committed the foul murders that they did. I submit that these are the circumstances which we should bear in mind in considering what happened. I need not of course express my sorrow for the lives lost; every decent man must regret the fact that Mr. Stuart and Mr. Robinson and that other Europeans at the railway station were killed. The whole unfortunate affair was finished in the course of two hours. The report in the 'Civil and Military Gazette' says that at 5-30 P.M. all was quiet. I shall not go into the question whether the firing was justified or not, but I would draw attention to the fact that the first firing having taken place, and the mob having become infuriated, it went into the city to revenge itself by taking the lives of five European fellow-brethren. In a couple of hours all was quiet at Amritsar. There was no trouble on the 11th. The people brought back the corpses, the Hindus and the Moslems decided that they should accompany the corpses in honour of the men and buried or burnt them according to their religion. They finished the whole job before 9 or 10. Thousands of people came out, to accompany the bier of the unfortunate men who had been killed, and yet not a single untoward incident occurred in Amritsar. After having buried or burnt the corpses the people came back to the city and all was quiet. On the 12th again all was quiet at Amritsar. On the 13th the Seditious Meetings Act was proclaimed in Amritsar. Up to that time all was quiet. I should like any Member on behalf of the Government to cite one single fact or circumstance which would show that after 5-30 on the 10th April, when these unfortunate deaths took place, at the railway station and banks, that there was a single incident at Amritsar which could by any stretch of imagination be construed into open rebellion. My Lord, what happened on the 13th? It is distressing to think of. On the evening of the 12th a certain number of persons tried to have a meeting held in a certain place in the city, very few people attended, but it was announced at the meeting that a meeting would be held on the following day at Jallianwala Bagh. This is a place which is surrounded on all sides by houses, there are three or four exits to it, the biggest exit is on one side and the smaller exits are not larger than the doors of this hall. I am told that between 16,000 and 20,000 persons assembled there. It was given out that Lala Kanhaya Lal, a very old and esteemed pleader of Amritsar, would preside. Lala Kanhaya Lal told me personally that he never was approached and that he never gave his consent to preside, that this was falsely given out.

"That was a ruse to draw the people to the meeting. Hearing that a man of his position and respectability was going to preside, many people came to attend the meeting. That day also happened to be, my Lord, the Bysakhi day.

"The Bysakhi day is one of the most important days in Amritsar, and on that day one of the biggest melas is held there. People come to Amritsar for the mela from long distances, not only from the interior parts of Amritsar, but from long distances, from Rawal Pindi and Peshawar. A number of Sikhs and Jats had come to Amritsar for the Bysakhi day. These people, not knowing that meetings had been prohibited assembled in the Jallianwala Bagh in large numbers, I am told they numbered about 20,000. The 'Civil and Military Gazette' states in its report that the people numbered about 6,000. But whatever the number may be, the gathering was certainly a very large one. My Lord, when the meeting had assembled, when several thousands of people had assembled, an aeroplane passed over the place where the meeting was to be held, and within half an hour or so of this, came the troops, and while the people were sitting down to hear the lecture which was being delivered by one of the men, the troops came and fired upon the people—and the people say without giving them any warning or any time to run away from the meeting. Now, my Lord, it has been stated by the Hon'ble the Home Member, that 'the number of persons who had been killed there has been traced to 300.' But from a letter received this morning by me from a friend, I am informed, that the number of deaths which have been traced already amounts to 530 killed and 190 wounded, and among the 530 killed, he gives me the names of 42 boys whose ages range as follows: 1 from 7 months who was being carried by his father to the place, to 15, 17, 18, 14 and one of 4 years, more than one of 12 years, several of 14 years and several of 15 years. These are the names of the boys who were killed at this meeting. The names of many others might be forthcoming, but even if this list is final as I very much wish and hope it may be, even, then, my Lord, the number is appalling to think of, and it is also horrible to think of the fact that people assembled at a meeting sitting down to hear a lecture should be fired upon by His Majesty's troops, and when they were running for their lives they should still be fired upon, and that so many of them should be killed in a few minutes time. Now, my Lord, I should like the Hon'ble the Home Member with all his reading of history to cite one instance so horrible to think of as the one like the Jallianwala Bagh, and to tell me if any Government has attempted to pass an Indemnifying Bill to justify anything approaching the deeds that were perpetrated in the Jallianwala Bagh.

"My Lord, I will go back to Lahore for a moment. I will come back afterwards to the events that followed at Amritsar. But let me say here that even after this butchery in the Jallianwala Bagh—and the Bagh is now called the bloody Bagh—even after this the people did not show the smallest sign of committing any violence. They submitted to these atrocities, they calmly resigned themselves to it, and there is not one single incident mentioned which would justify anybody to describe the state of things in Amritsar, even after that event and before it was proclaimed, that there was a rebellion in Amritsar, as an act of violence or hostility to Government. This was, my Lord, on the 13th of April. On the same day by a notification, to which I have already referred, it was declared that a state of open rebellion against the authority of the Government existed in certain parts of the Punjab, and by an Ordinance this was extended to Lahore and Amritsar, which were the first which came in for the operation of this declaration. Now, I submit, my Lord, with great respect, there is nothing I know of, and I have taken pains to verify the facts, to justify the declaration that there was a state of open rebellion in Amritsar on the day that your Lordship was advised that there was rebellion. I will go back to Lahore. Lahore observed the 6th of April as a Satyagraha day. The day passed off peacefully. Up to the 10th no untoward event happened in Lahore either. On the 10th owing to the news of Dr. Satyapal and Dr. Kitchlew having been deported, there was all this trouble in Amritsar. The same day news was received in Lahore that Mr. Gandhi had been arrested, and deported to a place unknown, I mean to say, the place where he was deported was not announced. Now, my Lord, Mr. Gandhi, as is probably known, not only to my Indian friends but to every gentleman in this country or at least ought to be known, is a gentleman who is held in the highest reverence by millions of people. By his saintly character, by his desire not to hurt any fellow-man, by his desire to stand up for truth, justice and humanity, he has established himself in the affections and reverence of the people to an extent which is not enjoyed by any other of my fellow-countrymen. Mr. Gandhi having been responsible for the Satyagraha day being observed, he had to issue instructions that the day should be observed without any violence, without causing any hurt to any fellow-men; but certain unhappy events to which I have already referred having taken place at Delhi, public sentiment having been roused by these events, Mr. Gandhi was coming to Delhi to quiet the people and to see that feeling should not be further embittered. While he was on his way to Delhi, the Government of India was advised to issue an order confining him to Bombay, and the Government of the Punjab and the Delhi administration issued orders prohibiting him from entering the Punjab and Delhi. My Lord, that was a gratuitous insult offered to Mr. Gandhi. Any Government ought to feel honoured by the presence of a man like Mr Gandhi within its own jurisdiction, and in asking Mr. Gandhi to keep out from the Punjab and the Delhi province, the administrations of those places showed that they did not take the broadminded view which those at the head of administrations are expected to take in such matters. Well, the result was that as the news was received that Mr. Gandhi had been arrested and deported, the temper of the people was tried. At Lahore, a mob gathered and they were going towards the Government House towards the Upper Mall, in order, I am told, to go up to Government House to make a representation. They passed several European buildings; they passed several European gentlemen without showing the smallest sign of any desire to hurt anybody. The Europeans who have their shops on the Upper Mall did not find any of their shops injured, not even a pane injured. When they were on the Upper Mall at one place the police wanted to prohibit them from going any further and wanted to turn them back. They did not like to be turned back, but eventually they agreed and they did turn back, and their attitude in going back shows that if firing had not been resorted to, there would have been no evil consequence resulting from the presence of the mob at that place for a little while. A little gentle persuasion, a little firmer attitude, if need be, would have succeeded, that is the belief of a lot of people. Now, my Lord, that having happened, when the mob were going back near Anarkali, they were fired upon and certain persons lost their lives. This enraged public feeling, but what happened ? I ask your Lordship to note that there is no people on earth that I know of, that I have read of, or heard of, who would have shown their law-abiding character better than did the people of Lahore and Delhi where the firing had been resorted to. They did not do anything, they went back to their homes. It was all quiet at 8 o'clock. Before the people had returned to their homes, Government House had been seized by panic. Messages were sent to the troops to be in readiness and to take up positions. Ladies in the Club and other places were told to hurry back home. Several of them did, but at 8 o'clock all was quiet, and those ladies who had gone to Government House were permitted to go back to their homes. The people did not do anything to justify the panic. The whole thing was over in a short time. Whether the firing was justified or not, leaving that question apart, the whole thing was over within an hour and a half or two hours, and there was quiet in the city, and that same day the Lieutenant-Governor was entertained at a party. That was on the 10th. What happened on the 11th ? The people here again asked that they should be allowed to carry their dead in procession, and they performed the ceremonies that they had to, but nothing further happened. On the 12th there was a meeting at the Badshahi Mosque. The people had assembled there to express their regret at what had happened, the shops continued to be closed, but no harm was being done to anybody except the poor men, who were suffering for want of food, and Lala Harkishen Lal, to his honour it may be mentioned, said he would subscribe Rs. 1,000 to help to keep the people from starvation. At that meeting there was a Criminal Investigation Department man who went into the meeting and expressed sentiments which people resented. This man was roughly treated, his pugree was thrown aside, but afterwards the meeting passed off quietly; nothing more happened. When the people were going back they say they passed the troops and they say there was something which led the troops to fire. Again some of the people were injured, some killed. Now, my Lord, what happened afterwards ? Even after this unfortunate incident the people kept quiet. There was nothing, not a flower-pot injured in Lahore, not a pane of glass broken by the people—I did not hear what the Hon'ble the Law Member said . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—" The Hon'ble Member was not intended to hear."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" The noise was so great I thought something was said for me. "

The President :—" I am sure the Hon'ble the Law Member would have got up in his place if he had wished to put any question ; that is the usual course."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" Now, my Lord, what are the incidents which the Hon'ble the Home Member, or anybody supporting the Bill, would expect as happening between the evening of the 10th and midnight on the 15th which would justify a declaration that there was a state of open rebellion in Lahore ? The Law Member has not uttered one word to justify that view. Now I submit that there was nothing ; that the people were living quietly ; that whatever action had been taken by the Government in the shape of placing the military and police in positions and everything else was done and there was quiet in Lahore. Whether the quiet was due to the action taken by Government or whether it was due to the innate good sense of the people is a matter which I will not go into. Any way the result was there. There was quiet in Lahore, and all the panic which resulted in ladies being frightened into leaving Lahore and being sent up to the hills seems to be utterly unjustifiable. My Lord, up to the 15th then if this was the state of Lahore and Amritsar, how is this Council being asked to assume that there was a state of open rebellion in those places ? Why should this sweeping Indemnifying Bill be put before this Council and the Council asked to support it ? Let me refer to a few other incidents that happened in the Punjab. It is said that this open rebellion was to be found in other places in a few days. But, my Lord, note the sequence of events. This was up to the 10th of March. I have shown that on the 10th of March what happened at Amritsar was due to the deportation of Dr. Satyapal and Dr. Kitchlew, and after the 10th to the news of the arrest and deportation of Mr. Gandhi and possibly also, though I cannot say, my Lord, to the receipt of the news of what had happened at Amritsar. Now beyond that we have nothing to show that there was a state of rebellion in those places. And what is the next place to which I should invite attention ? It is Gujranwalla. Gujranwalla kept quiet. Up to the 13th we did not hear of any untoward incident there. They had held a meeting ; they had discussed the Satyagraha day ; they had shown their opposition to the Rowlatt Act, but nothing further had happened. It was on the 14th, when the news of the Jallianwala Bagh massacre reached Gujranwalla that the people committed some excesses. But let me tell you what they did. ' There was a complete and spontaneous hartal in the whole town ; everything went off orderly and everything was perfectly quiet in the town ' as the judgment in the Pleader's case shows. Then, my Lord, on the 13th as the news of the arrest of Mr. Gandhi had reached the town and the citizens were thinking of observing a hartal on the 14th, the matter of holding a meeting in case of the proposed hartal was considered at an informal meeting at the house of Diwan Mangal Sen. Please note, my Lord, what happened. Diwan Mangal Sen, one of the most esteemed men in Gujranwalla, who had made his contributions to His Majesty's Government during the war, and considerable contributions too, along with many other respectable men, were hauled up and tried as persons who had waged war against the King. On the 12th when they met to consider the matter, after having decided what they would do, they informed the authorities that the people had decided to close business on the 14th. Mirza Sultan Ahmed, the acting Deputy Commissioner, issued instructions to the Municipal Commissioners asking them to see that everything remained quiet on the 14th. They did not do so in a surreptitious way.

"They did all in a fair, frank and open manner and there was nothing wrong which they had to conceal. The proceedings of the meeting of the Municipal Commissioners and the conversations which took place with the Deputy Commissioner are, I understand, on the record.

"Now the morning of the 14th of April opened well. All was quiet. There was complete spontaneous hartal throughout the city on this day. A big Bysakhi day was held at Wazirabad which is visited by numerous people from Gujranwalla and other places. Hence there was a tremendous rush for Wazirabad in the 7-30 train. Booking was therefore stopped and many people were thus kept back. Out of this arose a general feeling to the effect that either all or none should go to the fair at Wazirabad. The train moved and in the rush the guard was stopped from getting into his compartment. As the guard was left behind, the train stopped at the distant signal. The mob at the station rushed towards the train and succeeded in getting out of the train many of the people. The mob asked the driver to come down and the driver did so. There was thus nobody in charge of the engine. Some of the mischievous hooligans then took some burning charcoal from the engine and set fire to the old rejected sleepers lying near the Gurukula bridge. The happenings were purely accidental being due to the mischief of these very few people and were not at all premeditated. It is worthy of note that no damage at all was done to the bridge and the train passed away safely after some delay. Now, my Lord, as the mob was returning from the Gurukula bridge viá the Grand Trunk Road, which runs parallel to the railway lines, it was increased by hundreds of other people from the town and the railway station. The news was on every lip that a slaughtered calf was hung up from a girder on the railway bridge on the Lahore side. Hindu and Muhammadan relations were perfectly friendly at the time, and people therefore suspected that this was the work of the C. I. D. This idea gained strength from the fact that there is a large number of Hindu temples in that vicinity. The effect of this idea was most unfortunate on the public. Munshi Din Muhamed, a local pleader and a Muhammadan leader, declared that it could not be the work of Muhammadans and that he would himself remove the carcase. This convinced the public that it was not the work of any Muhammadan acting on his own behalf and that it was the work of some police underlings. The excitement reached a very high pitch when people who had seen a slaughtered pig on the other side of the station gave this news to the mob. The mob had now reached the place where the slaughtered calf was hung up. Mr. Heron, the Superintendent of Police, had also reached the place. Some of the enraged mob caught Mr. Heron and managed to throw him down and snatch away his pistol. This they did because they thought the police underlings had done the mischief to which I have referred. These young men were however calmed down by Mr. Din Muhamed, who persuaded them to leave Mr. Heron alone and to give him back his pistol. When Mr. Heron had thus received his pistol he fired on the mob, particularly on those young men who had given it back to him. Now several persons were wounded—vide page 32 'Punjab Disturbances,' published under the authority of Government. Thereupon, the excitement was fanned into a flame. The crowd then returned to the railway station and demanded the blood of Mr. Heron who had so unjustly fired upon them, and one of the men who was so wounded died the following day. The huge crowd faced the police, the municipal commissioners and the magistrates who had all arrived at the railway station, for more than two hours, the Grand Trunk Road alone separating the two. The mob continued to yell, tremendously enraged at the spilling of innocent blood. Mr. Heron wanted to open fire on the mob, although the magistrates and the municipal commissioners were doing their utmost to push the mob back into the town. The latter had just succeeded in persuading some people to go back when a shot was fired,—accidentally or deliberately, I cannot say—by a police constable. This fanned the flame again into a fire.

The crowd, which had so far been passive and sullen, now got enormously enraged at this. They swelled in number. Mr. Heron gave the order to fire. Fire was consequently opened and many casualties occurred. Thereupon the excited mob resorted to many acts of incendiarism, burning the post office, the dâk bungalow, the tahsildar's and the Honorary Benches' Courts, a block of the district courts, the railway godown, and the church. This again is vouched for in the 'Punjab Disturbances' published under authority . . . .

The Hon'ble Mr. J. P. Thompson :—"What authority has the Hon'ble Member for saying that the pamphlet entitled 'The Punjab Disturbances' was published under the authority of the Punjab Government?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"Is that not so? It is compiled from the 'Civil and Military Gazette,' second edition. Does my Hon'ble friend say that it is not published by the authority of the Punjab Government?"

The Hon'ble Mr. J. P. Thompson :—"The cover states by whom it was published."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, if Mr. Thompson will not give me a direct answer I am sorry I cannot say more. I was told it was an authoritative publication. If it is not, I am sorry for the statement, but he ought to tell me whether it was or was not. We want facts. It contains many official Communiqués.

"Now, my Lord, the people who were wounded by the firing of Mr. Heron at the Siddhan bridge where the slaughtered calf was hung up were taken through bazaar to Niyanin where an open air meeting was all the time being held to keep the public engaged. At this meeting, speeches on Hindu-Muhammadan unity were delivered, and the people were advised to be calm, vide instruction given to the Manager of the Islamia School by the acting Deputy Commissioner to deliver a lecture at the meeting. The Manager's statement in the Pleader's case will be quite sufficient for that purpose. The point I am coming to is that this was all the trouble, the regrettable, unfortunate trouble. But it was all over by about 3 P.M. Moreover, there had been no riots in the city proper. The people had kept perfectly quiet in the city, and all these events occurred in the civil station outside the Circular Road. Between 3 and 4 P.M., just about the time when, as was said in the 'Civil and Military Gazette' report, the crowd was dispersing, aeroplanes arrived. Now, my Lord, the crowd had dispersed and the remnants of the crowd were dispersing when the aeroplanes arrived and bombs were dropped from the aeroplanes in several places. I have seen several of the places where these bombs were dropped, and I have learnt on the spot that several lives were lost, five in one place and two in another. When the crowd had dispersed or was going back, I should like the Council to be informed where was the necessity for dropping bombs from aeroplanes upon the town of Gujranwala? It was not in one place that bombs were dropped but in many places, and in places in the centre of the inhabited parts of the city which was all surrounded by houses. One bomb was also dropped in the boarding house of the Khalsa High School, where 160 boys were about the place at the time.

"Bombs were also dropped in the suburbs of Gujranwala where the mob had committed no excesses, and also outside the town of Gujranwala over the house of Lala Amar Nath, pleader, one of the Secretaries of the Home Rule League. A bomb was also dropped in another village close by, where I am told, a woman and child were killed by it. Now, my Lord, I should like anybody to tell me what earthly justification there could be for the dropping of half a dozen or may be more, I cannot say, bombs from aeroplanes over the people of Gujranwala when the mob had dispersed or was dispersing. This happened on the 14th. Everything was then quiet in the town, and a bomb was dropped again in Gujranwala on the morning of the 15th. I should like to know what justification can be pleaded for these actions. Now, my Lord, in spite of all this the people kept quiet. There was no rising of the people, there was no violence committed by the people. What little happened near the railway station was under the circumstances which I have mentioned to you. One European gentleman, an engineer, I think, was living about a mile or so away, I cannot give the exact distance, but sufficiently far away from the scene where the mob had committed any excesses. There was no danger to European life and no insult to any European lady. Why then was this bombing resorted to? My Lord, I should like here to know what was there in the state of Gujranwalla to justify the declaration, to bring it in the category of places where there was proclaimed to be a state of open rebellion?

"Now, it is noteworthy, and I wish the Council to note that the events which took place at Kasur, the regrettable murder of two Europeans there and the cutting of telegraph wires in some places, the derailment of trains here and there; these are the events which took place. The papers gave a list of them and you know them. These unfortunate regrettable events took place subsequent to the 10th of April, when a wrong had been done, when as the people believed an unjustifiable wrong had been done to a number of members of the public by the firing that was resorted to at Amritsar. My Lord, you must make allowances, take note, I mean to say, of the circumstances which surround the case, and the fact that these events took place in these places after the deplorable occurrences at Amritsar is a circumstance to be taken into account. I do not want to extenuate the evil that was wrought. I deplore it, but I think it will not be right, it would not be just to exclude from one's consideration the sequence of events in order in judging where how much blame ought to be allotted to one or other party or two certain parties. Now, my Lord, I leave the main incidents so far as they affect the question of a state of open rebellion at that. I would now invite your Lordship's attention to the second important part. What I have said has reference to the statement in the preamble of the Bill that 'owing to recent disorders in certain districts in the Punjab and other parts of India, it has been necessary for the purpose of maintaining and restoring order to resort to martial law.' I respectfully question the correctness, the truth, of this statement, and I submit that if the Council is not placed in possession of facts that may be in the possession of Government, if the Council is not placed in possession of facts which would justify the statement that there was open rebellion in Amritsar, Lahore and other places, this preamble of the Bill ought not to stand where it does.

"Then, my Lord, the second point to which I would invite attention is, in the preamble also. It says that it was necessary for the purpose of maintaining and restoring order to resort to martial law. Now, my Lord, what are the facts? I have submitted that all was quiet at Amritsar at about 5-30 or so on the afternoon of the regrettable day when several European and Indian lives were lost. On the 11th and 12th there was no violence on the part of the people. On the 13th the violence that took place was on the part of some of the authorities and not of the people. Beyond the 13th nothing took place on the part of the people. How was it necessary, then, for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order to resort to martial law? Order had been restored; the passions, the regrettable passions which had led to certain crimes, had been exhausted, had exhausted themselves. The people felt that there was nothing more to be concerned about. There is one important circumstance to which I will draw attention in this connection. The Hon'ble the Home Member made a fervent appeal to those of my friends who have been blessed with large stakes in the country to reflect what would be their fates and the fates of their property if law and order were not to be preserved. Let me tell the Hon'ble

Member and all who may wish to know it that the police in Amritsar was practically absent after these disorders and that the people themselves organised parties and kept watch and ward over the city and very few unfortunate events occurred; I believe that none occurred at all, so far as I am told. The people finding that the police were not doing their duty in keeping watch and ward and giving protection, organised themselves into parties and protected their town from any mischief either within or from outside. I submit, therefore, that the statement that it was necessary for the purposes of maintaining or restoring order to resort to martial law is not correct, so far as Amritsar is concerned.

"Now, let me come to Lahore. Is it correct in the case of Lahore? I have submitted that while Lahore had a large European population neither at the time of the trouble on the 10th nor at any other time was any European in danger of his life or of his liberty. It is said, as was pointed out by Mr. Chanda, several days after the events that a European police officer had received a hurt and that his head had to be bandaged, but it was also stated that the hurt had been caused to him by a policeman. That being so, my Lord, I ask every Member of this Council to call for information which would convince him that there was any danger which any reasonable man—men who are overtaken by cowardice or who have a craven fear, an indefinable fear may run into panic—but I should like to know any circumstances which could have led any decent man, European or Indian, to think that his life or honour was in danger in Lahore during the days between the 10th and 15th April, when it was declared that Lahore was in a state of open rebellion. I submit it was not. I submit that it is to the credit of Lahore that though these unfortunate events, shooting of some innocent persons, had occurred, it kept its head cool and it did not give its fellow-citizens, its European fellow-citizens, men or women, any cause to think ill of the people of Lahore. It did not give any fellowmen among Europeans any cause to adopt an attitude of resentment much less of vindictiveness towards any fellowman, and yet, my Lord, it was declared that Lahore was in a state of rebellion. I submit it was not, and that is a cardinal point in dealing with this bill.

"My Lord, what are the orders that were issued under martial law, which even by the wildest stretch of the imagination can be said to have been demanded for maintaining or restoring order? What are the facts which made it necessary to issue the orders for maintaining or restoring order in Lahore? I gave notice, my Lord, I tried to elicit facts by a string of questions; unfortunately as I have said before Government have not thought fit to answer them, and I take it, I am entitled to take it by implication, that they have admitted the truth of it; at any rate until on behalf of Government facts contrary to those implied in my questions are stated, I am entitled in dealing with a matter of such grave importance as this Bill to assume that the truth of those statements cannot be impeached. Now, my Lord, what are the martial law orders that were issued? Before I proceed further I should like to refer to the particular martial law order to which the Hon'ble the Home Member drew attention. If in the light of subsequent events the spirit of that order had been observed, we should not now be discussing this Bill to-day. But unfortunately the acts carried out went far beyond and greatly against the spirit of that order. The first question to which I shall draw attention is that of flogging. How many persons were flogged and for what offences? I have looked into the question and I find that there is a provision that flogging should not be one of the punishments to be inflicted by the Martial Law Commission. If I am right, and I think I am right, then it is regrettable that flogging was resorted to to the extent it was during the continuance of martial law at Lahore, Amritsar and other places. My Lord, can anyone tell me that it was necessary to resort to flogging in order to maintain order or to restore order? With the ample military resources of the Empire to which your Lordship referred in your speech on the 3rd instant, did the Government stand in any danger of having their authority upset if they did not resort to this vile form of inflicting punishment on a fellow-man. I should like to know what justification can be pleaded for the flogging that was resorted to in various places. My Lord, leading men were arrested in Amritsar. I will refer to the orders as I find them in order to save time.

"My Lord, I asked the Government to be pleased to lay on the table copies of orders and proclamations, posters, notifications and notices issued by the administrators of martial law in the Punjab . . . .

The President:—"Order! Order!! The Hon'ble Member is entirely out of order. He knows perfectly well that this is a question he put forward to me as President to be allowed or disallowed. I disallowed it for reasons which appear on the face of the rules in regard to the asking of questions. The Hon'ble Member knows perfectly well that no discussion in Council can be permitted in respect of any order of the President under rule 7 or rule 8. I cannot allow the Hon'ble Member to proceed with what is really a discussion of my orders in regard to that matter." 4-7 P.M.

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Thank you, my Lord. I did not propose to discuss your Lordship's order. I wanted information and I was going to explain why I have not got it."

The President:—"You proposed to discuss it in another way."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"True, indirectly that would be the result, my Lord."

The President:—"Quite so I am glad that the Hon'ble Member has made that admission That is exactly what he is aiming at, and I do not intend to permit it."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, the propriety of your disallowing the question was not the point I had in mind; what I wished to explain was, that I was not able to refer to proclamations, etc., which had been issued. I hope, my Lord, that you will feel that that is the correct explanation. I am in the unfortunate position that in discussing a Bill of this comprehensive character which deals with martial law I have to refer to martial law notifications, etc., and if I refer to the difficulties in which I am placed, I have not the remotest idea, my Lord, directly or indirectly, of making a reference to the propriety of your disallowing my question. Many martial law orders and notices were issued. I am unfortunately not in a position to place them all before the Council, because I have not got them. I shall try to show that all could not possibly be justified on the ground that they were necessary for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order. That is the point on which I am asking the attention of the Council. Let me refer to one. I am told that in a lane known as the Durga Koti Wali Lane every Indian irrespective of age or position had to pass through crawling on his belly the whole length of the lane. British soldiers were placed there to see that the order was obeyed. I should like to know if this was necessary for the purpose of maintaining law and order? Then, my Lord, the electric lighting and the water-supply of the whole of the city of Amritsar including the civil lines was cut off for four or five days from the 12th of April last. It is also a fact that a large number of wells in the city of Amritsar had been closed when Mr. King was Deputy Commissioner, because he thought that the water of the wells was not healthy. By the shutting off of electricity and water supply much hardship was inflicted on the people. I should like to know how this was necessary in order to maintain order or to restore order? Then, my Lord, it is said that a number of people, very respectable people, including bankers, lawyers and doctors, were kept handcuffed in pairs for several days. They were kept in an open racket court, where it was very hot in the day, and very cold at night. They were kept handcuffed continuously for 24 hours of the day for several days together and they had to eat, drink, sleep and attend to the calls of nature whilst handcuffed in pairs. I should like to know if it was necessary for the maintenance of law and order to issue such orders or carry out anything of that sort? Further, I am told that when on the 15th April the aeroplanes did their work and frightened the people of Gujranwala as they did, there was not the smallest suggestion that there was any spirit of rebellion or resistance in the town.

"The Deputy Commissioner of Gujranwala, with a strong body of police and European soldiers and with an armoured car marched to the house of Lala Mela Ram, B.A., LL.B., pleader, and arrested and handcuffed him and took him away, without allowing him to dress himself or to speak to his family. The party then met Mr. Labhsingh, M.A. (Cantab), Barrister-at-law, and arrested and handcuffed him and chained him with Lala Mela Ram. They proceeded to the houses of twenty other gentlemen (pleaders, bankers and other respectable citizens) and arrested and handcuffed and chained them all together. The persons so arrested and chained together were marched to the city, two and two, headed by a Hindu and a Mahomedan, to ridicule Hindu and Mahomedan unity as was stated at the time by Colonel O'Brien. Two Municipal Commissioners under the order of Colonel O'Brien walked in front of the procession thus formed and pointing to the aeroplanes hovering overhead kept on shouting to Indian people to make way for the prisoners on pain of being bombed or shot down. After being thus paraded through the principal streets of the town the prisoners were taken to the railway station and put into an open coal truck which was guarded by a number of European soldiers with fixed bayonets and by an armoured engine with a gun directed towards the prisoners. The prisoners were not allowed to leave their places even for the purposes of attending the calls of nature, and some of these gentlemen had to be there and to suffer all the trouble in the condition they were. My Lord, I am further told that on reaching Lahore railway station and before being removed to the jail, the prisoners were kept for about ten hours along with thirty other prisoners in a room which opened by means of an iron barred and panelled door into another room which was used as a latrine. My Lord, I am told that a number of pleaders and other respectable citizens in the town of Shahupura in the District of Gujranwala, were arrested and treated in a manner similar to that adopted at Gujranwala and were subjected to similar inconveniences and indignities when being taken to Lahore. I am told further that almost the entire population of the town of Shahupura above the age of 10 years, irrespective of rank or social position, was summoned by Mr. Bosworth Smith, I.C.S., Joint Deputy Commissioner and one of the Martial Law Officers, and made to sweep a large open piece of ground. I am told, further, my Lord, that a large marriage party of certain Mahomedans of the village of Rajgarh within the Municipal limits of Lahore was arrested and the members thereof were convicted by one of the Martial Law Officers. My Lord, these are some of the allegations which have been made in regard to the unfortunate events at Amritsar and Gujranwala. I should like to know which of these punishments was necessary for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order. Now, my Lord, I will draw the attention of the Council to some more facts, to give them an idea of the indignities perpetrated in other parts. I will draw the attention of the Council to the allegation, among others, that Moulvie Ghulam Mohi-ud-din, pleader of Kasur, who had last year been publicly rewarded for his services in connection with the War and Maulvie Abdul Qadir, a senior pleader of Kasur, were arrested and kept in confinement for some weeks in an improvised lock-up near the railway station, and were then released without any charge or trial. I am told that several school boys at Kasur were flogged, and I should like to know how that was necessary for the purpose of maintaining law and order. My Lord, it has been stated, and the facts cannot be denied, that Mr. Manoharlal, M.A. (Cantab), Bar-at-Law, formerly Minto Professor of Economics at the University of Calcutta and now a prominent member of the Lahore Bar, and a Syndic of the Punjab University, was arrested and kept in jail for nearly a month, including one week of solitary confinement. Will anybody tell me why it was necessary to put this respectable gentleman to this indignity? Will anybody tell me why this gentleman was arrested? I am told his whole sin was that he happened to be one of the trustees of the Tribune paper which had enraged some of the officials, particularly the Head of the Punjab Government. For the crime of being a trustee of a paper which was edited by a gentleman whose name was known and whose articles have been pronounced by most competent and sober Indians to have been written very carefully, this respectable gentleman, a member of the Bar and a Minto Professor, was subjected to this indignity. I should like to know from the Council's own lips how much indignity was inflicted upon him and how much hardship he suffered. I should like to know why this was done? Then Rai Saheb Seth Ram Pershad, a Municipal Commissioner in Lahore, one of the largest house proprietors and bankers of Lahore, was arrested in April last and marched in handcuffs to the Central Jail, a distance of nearly three miles, kept in solitary confinement, and then released without trial after several weeks. Does the Hon'ble the Home Member ask the Council to indemnify these officers who inflicted these indescribable indignities upon their fellowmen as respectable as any Member of this Council? Does the Hon'ble the Home Member mean to ask the Council to indemnify officers against such acts? My Lord, the list is long. I do not wish to take up the time of the Council unnecessarily except to the extent that it may be necessary to impress upon every Member of this Council the necessity of examining carefully the proposals in the Bill and the proposal which is now before the Council before giving its assent. My Lord, there is a case from Amritsar, of Dr. Kedar Nath, a retired Civil Surgeon, aged 60 years, who had been invalided in 1909 on account of heart troubles; he was arrested and handcuffed and marched through the streets with 62 other prisoners to the jail and kept in confinement for a fortnight with two other prisoners in a cell which was meant for one person and then released without trial. Now, martial law notices were posted at the houses and shops of a number of people at Lahore with directions that the occupant must guard the posters, and that if they were damaged, torn or disfigured, the occupants would be severely punished under martial law. My Lord, one of these persons, an English lady, the wife of Pir Taj Din, herself told me that she had to keep a watch to see that the posters stuck to their house were not damaged or torn so that she and her husband might not come in trouble, and all this trouble could not be prevented by the fact of her being an English woman. I should like to know why it was necessary to subject respectable people to all this hardship and indignity?

"My Lord, the manner in which the students were dealt with can be gleaned from another incident to which I will call the attention of the Council. The students of Lahore have been wronged beyond expression, and I should like to know how it was necessary for the maintenance of law and for restoring order to deal with the students in the manner that was done. All the students of the Dayanand Anglo-Vedic College, the Dayal Singh College, Lahore, and the Medical College at Lahore were required to attend roll calls before military officers when they were made to stand in the sun guarded by the military with fixed bayonets and this process was continued for three weeks immediately preceding their University examinations.

"In the case of the King Edward Medical College, the total distance which the students were made to traverse on foot in the summer heat for attending the roll call, amounted to not less than 16 miles a day. Some students actually fainted while going to, attending, or returning from, such roll call parades and it was after that that a nearer place was fixed for taking the roll-call. My Lord, the Principals of certain Colleges in Lahore were coerced by the Martial Law Administrator to inflict very severe punishments on a certain percentage of their students without regard to any evidence of their guilt. Some of them were expelled, some were rusticated, some were sent down one year, and I am told that a number of students were fined. I am told that the total number of students who have been subjected to this injustice and wrong is about a thousand. I should like to know how this was necessary to maintain order.

"My Lord, it has been alleged by some of those who were tried that in the cases tried by some of the officers who were empowered to deal with these cases, especially towards the close of the martial law period, the accused were convicted without the whole defence evidence being heard, even though witnesses were present, on the ground of want of time. For instance, in the case of Lala Gurdasram and Lala Shivaram, pleaders of Hafizabad in the District of Gujranwalla, who were sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment each by Mr. Wace, I.C.S. My Lord, a student, Ramlok, son of Daulatram, aged 17 years, was arrested on the 25th April, and having been detained in police custody for three weeks, was released for want of evidence against him. Several days after his release, his father Daulatram appeared as a defence witness for one Ram Ditta and deposed that the police had asked Ram Ditta to turn an approver but he had refused to do so. On this his son Ramlok was re-arrested on the following day and put on his trial for the very same offences for which he had been arrested and released before. The trial of Ramlok was fixed for the 9th and 10th June, but as martial law was going to be withdrawn at midnight on the 9th June, the trial was accelerated to the 5th June without any previous intimation having been given to the accused or to his father. The accused was tried and sentenced to one year and seven months' rigorous imprisonment for offences under sections 147, 426 and 506, Indian Penal Code, by Mr. A. L. Hoyle, I.C.S., officer presiding over summary courts under martial law, without any chance being given to him to produce his defence.

"And, my Lord, one Bhagwansingh, a meat seller of Lyallpur, was arrested on the 6th June last and placed before the Martial Law Summary Court on the 7th June; on the 8th June part of the evidence was heard, and the case was adjourned; but as martial law was to be withdrawn at midnight on the 9th June, the case was taken up at 11 o'clock that night without any opportunity being given to his counsel to be present, and the accused was sentenced to three months' rigorous imprisonment.

"My Lord, in some of the cases tried by the Martial Law Commissioner constituted under Ordinance No. 1 of 1919, no record of evidence of witnesses, either for the prosecution or the defence, has at all been made, nor judgments recorded, though heavy sentences have been awarded. For example, the case of Crown versus Fazla, son of Gumardi Kakezai, convicted under section 124-A, and sentenced to transportation for life by the Commission presided over by Lieutenant-Colonel Irvine, on the 26th of April 1919, and trials Nos. 20 and 21 of Hansraj and Hariram of Amritsar, before the Commission presided over by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Leslie Jones, I.C.S., Judge of the High Court of Judicature at Lahore, convicting the aforesaid persons to seven years' rigorous imprisonment each under section 412, Indian Penal Code. Now, my Lord, in several other cases examination of outside witnesses for the defence was refused except by interrogatories. In some, no one would like to believe it, but in some cases even the offence with which a man is charged has not been mentioned. I hold in my hand a copy of an order with findings dated 26th May 1919, passed in the Court of A. L. Hoyle, Esquire, Magistrate, 1st Class, of the Lyallpur district at Lyallpur, in Martial Law Cases held at Lyallpur, for Dijkote Tehsil, Lyallpur.

It says :—

'Finding—All accused guilty.

'Penalty or disposal :—

'Accused No. 1, Basant Ram, 2 years' rigorous imprisonment,

'Accused No. 2, Charan Dass, 9 months' rigorous imprisonment,

'No. 3, Jawandar Ram, 9 months' rigorous imprisonment,

'No. 4, Bhagat Singh, 6 months' rigorous imprisonment.

(Sd.) A. L. HOYLE,
Summary Court.'

"My Lord, this is the way in which people have been deprived of their honour and liberty. Is it meant that these cases shall be indemnified?

"There is another copy of an order dated 28th May 1919 with finding, passed in the Court of the same gentleman, Mr. A. L. Hoyle, Magistrate, 1st Class, at Lyallpur.

'Finding.

'Accused 1 to 12 each guilty of rioting (section 147, Indian Penal Code) and offence under section 25 of the Telegraph Act, accused 13, 14, 16 guilty under section 147, Indian Penal Code, accused 15, 17, 18 doubtful.

'Penalty or disposal.

'Accused Sita Ram (1) 2 years' rigorous imprisonment for each offence, accused Ram Dutt 6 months' rigorous imprisonment for rioting and 18 months' rigorous imprisonment for the offence under section 25. Telegraph Act, Amar Nath (2) Kesar Mall, Gyan Chand, Amar Nath (6), Agya Ram, Kaka Ram, Hari Chand, Divan Chand, Girdhari, Sita Ram (12), 6 months' rigorous imprisonment for rioting and 1 year's rigorous imprisonment under section 25 Telegraph Act. All sentences consecutive.

'Kesar Singh, Teja Singh and Bhag Singh 3 months' rigorous imprisonment, Nand Singh, Balwant Singh and Jaimal Singh acquitted.'

"Now, my Lord, this is the way in which havoc has been made of the liberty and honour of many fellow-subjects of ours.

"My Lord, there are other instances to some of which I must invite attention. An order was issued that every Indian who should pass by a European must salaam, and in some places they were told that they must get down from a carriage if they were driving at the time. In several instances unfortunately several Indians were flogged or otherwise punished for not salaaming to Europeans and not carrying out this martial law order. In one case one Gopaldas, son of Deviditta Mal, caste Arora, of Akalgarh, who was a telegraph peon at Lyallpur during the martial law days was arrested for not salaaming a European officer to whom he had gone to deliver a telegram and that he was given five stripes for it in jail, although he protested that he had actually salaamed the officer and was willing to do so again. I should like to know, my Lord, if this was necessary in order to maintain law and order. In some of the districts where martial law was in force orders were issued that every Indian driving in a carriage or riding a horse must get down when he passed by a European, and, further, that Indians carrying open umbrellas must close and lower them when they met a European.

"My Lord, the evil was not confined to these few places and these few cases to which I have drawn attention. There has been much more injustice done, and I shall draw attention to one of these that occurred in Ramnagar. I am reading from the Judgment at Ramnagar, my Lord. There were 28 persons accused. No un-toward event happened at Ramnagar at any time.

"When the news of Gandhi's arrest reached there, I am told that a few boys expressed their mourning for the event and went to bathe in a river in the locality . . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"May I inquire, my Lord, if this is the Ramnagar where the King's effigy was burnt?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"This was alleged but it was an untruth."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"I only wanted to know, my Lord."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, my friend thought that he had scored a great point in mentioning that. I have not less respect for His Majesty the King Emperor than the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent has, but I will show to your Lordship and to the Council that an untrue story was concocted and had to be abandoned, and that the facts would not justify the punishment which was inflicted upon the people. Now, my Lord, at Ramnagar, on the 15th instant, a certain number of boys met together and expressed their grief or resentment, whichever you please, at the arrest of Mr. Gandhi and the Rowlatt Act. They went and had a bath in the river which runs through the locality. The event passed off, no notice was taken of it, and it was reported that there was quiet in Ramnagar. A few days afterwards the Deputy Commissioner, Colonel O'Brien I think it was, went there, certain instructions were given and the Revenue Assistant called a meeting of the citizens of Ramnagar and arrested four men. Several days afterwards, I think it was on the 12th of May or the 28th May, I do not exactly remember which, 23 or 24 other persons were got hold of and also challaned. Another man was subsequently arrested and so the party was made up to 28. The charge against them was that they had burnt the effigy of the King. I will read the judgment to your Lordship. It says :—

'Bhagwan Dass, Kapur Chand and Barkat Ali are eye witnesses to the fact that a mob of Hindus in whom the 28 accused were included burnt the effigy of King George on the bank of a creek of the Chenab near the town of Ramnagar and then marched back through the town. The leader in this was Hari Singh Giani, Headmaster, who produced a small effigy which he burnt on a funeral pyre on the bank and throughout acted as crier, while others answered as chorus. The cry raised was 'Rowlatt Bill Kala Bill Marya' (and His Majesty's name is brought in and abused) 'The Rowlatt Bill, Black Bill is dead' (and abuse of the King Emperor). 'The ashes were cast into the river by Hari Singh and most people bathed as purification. Other witnesses one Hindu and several Muhammadans, give evidence that Hari Singh Giani, Daulat Ram, Balmokand, Karam Chand and Gobind Sahai organised a hartal on the afternoon of the 15th and had called all the Hindus to a meeting near the river. On their return they came through the town headed by Hari Singh as crier, shouting out Rowlatt Bill Kala Bill marya (the Rowlatt Bill, the Black Bill, is dead, and abusing His Majesty—I am translating the words, I do not wish to utter them). 'The crowds are said to have consisted of about 200; but all three principal witnesses united in naming the 28 accused. Some named others but these have been weeded out where not corroborated. The witnesses who saw the crowd return also named the accused though one or two were doubtful in the case of 5 or 6.

'All the accused plead not guilty. Most of them call witnesses for good character or for alibis of no value. It is noticeable that witnesses for the defence do their best to prove their own absence during the period of the alleged offence, which suggests that they are not prepared to deny that such a thing took place.

* * * * * * * * *

'Of the defence witnesses worth noticing, those for Balmokand tried to prove an alibi for him in Gujranwala. He himself claimed to be in Gujranwala up to 1·30 on the 15th.

* * * * * * * * *

'Other witnesses speak of having met Balmokand on the road. But they avoid arguments which might agree and be tested on cross examination On the other hand, it is shown by evidence that Balmokand rode off from Gujranwala and passed Manchor 3 miles from Ramnagar at midday on the 15th.

'It is indisputable that the affair of burning the King Emperor (he says burning the King Emperor but he evidently means the effigy of the King Emperor) took place. There certainly was a hartal and the people went to the river. Although a few witnesses for the defence try to declare that there was no hartal ever, this is disproved by the first report when it was known that anything more serious had happened and also by the anxiety of the majority of the defence witnesses to prove their own absence The evidence that the King Emperor was burnt in effigy by Hari Singh with the plaudits of the mob sitting round him is also ample. Two Hindus and one Muhammadan gave evidence to this, as also to the casting of the ashes into the river and the purification of the Hindus by bathing. Many more witnesses prove the return of the party through the town with Hari Singh chanting in front 'Rowlatt Bill Kala Bill marya, etc.' The case did not come to light for a week and could not be investigated till later, but this was due to the absorption of all officials in the outrages elsewhere and the Sub-Inspector in those of Akalgarh. The story is not one that would have been invented. I find that the case has been well sifted and that the 28 accused are proved by the evidence of the prosecution to have been there * * * *

'The offence is so gross that the accused are lucky in not having been sent up to a Tribunal. Hence the maximum imprisonment must be inflicted on almost all. Many of the accused are wealthy and heavy fines are very suitable. I sentence them as under :—

1. Daulat Ram,
2. Balmokand,
3. Karam Chand,
4. Gobind Sahai,
5. Hari Singh, to rigorous imprisonment for two years, of which three months to be in solitary confinement and to pay fines of rupees one thousand each, or in default rigorous imprisonment for six months in addition.

" Now, my Lord, the people say that if there was a fair trial it would be established that this story was entirely untrue, and that they did not burn the effigy of the King Emperor. Now, these people, as the judgment says, were wealthy and respectable, and for that reason they were sentenced to such heavy punishment and such large fines, which, in the case of such people, is a very serious matter. These respectable people had no reason to indulge in such foolish and wicked mischief, but you subject them to trial in a summary court, where their honour is concerned, and you do not give them an opportunity to establish their innocence, and they are sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment. These are the cases in which the Bill seeks that the sentences shall be confirmed. I submit, my Lord, that nothing could be a grosser wrong than to ask the Legislative Council to confirm sentences of this nature, where men have not been given an opportunity to have their defence properly put and where they have not been given an opportunity to appeal to a higher tribunal.

" Now, my Lord, I will not deal with any more cases. I think what I have submitted is sufficient to show how great is the need for having the facts of these unfortunate times sifted and well established before an Indemnifying Bill should be dealt with by this Council. As I have submitted before, there are two points essential in asking for an Indemnifying Act. One is, that there should have been either open rebellion or war against the King or riots or insurrection which amounted to war, and, secondly, it should be necessary to show that, even if such a necessity arose and that the acts done were such as in the language of the three Statutes which he quoted were so much to the good of the public, so much for the benefit of the public, that those acts ought to be justified by the Legislature, and that the officers who did them ought to be indemnified. I submit, my Lord, that this has not been shown to be the case. Now, the Hon'ble the Home Member tells us that the question whether martial law was necessary will be discussed and settled by the Committee of Inquiry, but he says 'Go further. Take the fact that martial law was declared. Then I ask you to consider the case, the position, the pitiable position, of those officers who were ordered or directed or commended to do certain acts. We promised them in our Resolution of the 14th of April 1919 that we would give them our ample support. We are bound in honour to protect them from the results of actions which they undertook upon that assurance.' My Lord, that is begging the whole question. If you are not right in giving them that assurance, that assurance will not stand them in good stead. You ask that the Council should pass this indemnifying measure, and you say that the question whether martial law was necessary or not shall be determined by the Committee of Inquiry. I submit that this is a preposterous proposition to put forward before this Council. What will be the effect of the decision by the Committee of Inquiry as to whether there was open rebellion in Lahore or Amritsar or not? In the quotation to which I have referred Earl Halsbury has made it clear that the Crown may not issue commissions in times of peace to try civilians by martial law; but when a state of actual war, or of insurrection, riot or rebellion amounting to war exists, the Crown and its officers may use the amount of force necessary in the circumstances to restore order.

"The cardinal point is, whether there were circumstances which justified the declaration of martial law. You cannot go on to deal with this Bill without first dealing with that cardinal point. If you think that you owe it in courtesy to the Inquiry Committee which you have constituted to leave the decision on that important matter to them, I say in fairness to every one concerned, including the Government, stay your hand, do not proceed with this Bill. Wait for the result of that inquiry. Let the facts be sifted out and when the facts have been sifted out, indemnify officers for all acts done in good faith with reasonable care and caution, for restoring order or maintaining it, wherever it might have been necessary. No sensible man would for a moment object to His Majesty's officers or those acting under their instructions being indemnified and protected against the consequences of acts done by them in good faith with reasonable care and caution in circumstances where the existence of martial law would be justified. But where the existence of martial law is not justified, where the very foundation upon which martial law rests is non-existent, I submit, these officers have to take their chance of having their cases adjudged and determined in the light of equity and justice by ordinary Courts in the country.

"Now, my Lord, the Hon'ble the Home Member said he did not want to prejudice the inquiry that the committee is going to make. But I am sorry to say his observations read outside this Council and in England will leave only one impression, though he may never have meant it. His speech could not be better framed if the object was to prejudice the inquiry than it was framed. My Lord, the Hon'ble the Home Member says: 'Well, I do not want to go into the facts—that is a matter for the Committee of Inquiry. But the Committee of Inquiry are not going to censure any man for performing any act in good faith.' What is this, my Lord? Why raise the question now? When you say the Committee of Inquiry is not going to pass any censure upon Government, what, I ask, is the Committee going to be allowed to do? Either state things frankly and fairly and leave the matter to the Committee's decision, or say frankly, as you have the power to say it, that you do not want any inquiry into these dark deeds and that you want to throw a veil over them. Throw it if you can; in this country you can do it, but of course the fear of the English public and Parliament might deter you from doing so. In that case I say stay, wait, do not proceed with this Bill until you have the report of the Committee of Inquiry. The Committee of Inquiry will certainly be prejudiced if they read the speech of the Hon'ble the Home Member. They might well take it as their instructions from the Government, because the Hon'ble the Home Member does represent your Excellency's Government in all these matters, even more perhaps than your Excellency does. Therefore, with this speech before the public, the public at any rate will consider it very remiss on that part of the representative of the Government to give expression to the opinions and remarks to which the Hon'ble Member has given expression to-day. The Hon'ble Member also said that he did not want to prejudice and points to a provision in the Bill, particularly guarding against the effect of this Bill upon any judgments which the Privy Council may wish to pronounce. But, my Lord, if you indemnify acts in the manner in which you are doing with the provisions in this present Bill, well may their Lordships of the Privy Council complain that you have done what no ordinary citizen is expected to do, namely, to pronounce judgment on some important aspects of the case, before they have had time to deal with them. My Lord, I wish here to make it very clear that I have done all that I could as an individual Member of this Council to postpone the discussion of questions of fact and law relating to the events that have occurred. I gave notice of questions—I do not refer to them now—I am only showing how I gave notice of these questions with a view to elicit facts which might postpone the introduction of the Bill. Many Members of this Council, if not all, were anxious and they expressed their desire to the representatives of Government that the introduction of this Bill might be delayed until the Committee of Inquiry had submitted their Report. My Lord, we are not anxious for any particular verdict. God knows I am not anxious that the fault or guilt shall fall upon any particular individual. I only want the facts to be proved; I only want that the facts being proved whosoever may have been responsible for these facts should stand a trial before the public opinion of this country and the public opinion of the Hight Court of England. We are only anxious that if you adopt a particular course, if you appoint a Committee of Inquiry to go into those facts, we only think it fair that a discussion upon facts which the committee has to deal with or the law which the committee may have to consider should be avoided. I should have been very glad to avoid such a discussion--it has been forced upon me and I wish this to stand on the record of the proceedings of this Council. But, my Lord, we are driven to this. The dead men of Amritsar and of other places, their souls appeal to us to point out to your Excellency's Government the facts which are cardinal, of vital importance, in a consideration of this affair. The men who have lost their sons, the men who have lost their brothers, the women who have lost their husbands, the mothers who have lost their sons who are mourning the deaths of these persons who have met an untimely end, they call for the most careful consideration of this affair. They call that no decision should be arrived at and that no Act should be passed which would prejudice a proper consideration of their case. The Government cannot say that the delay of a few months will really prejudice their position. If the Hon'ble the Home Member, advised by the Hon'ble the Law Member, felt that if a Bill like this is not passed every moment of detention of numerous persons who have been condemned by the Martial Law Commissions and the Martial Law Summary Courts in jail is an unjustifiable detention of such persons, why did the Government not introduce the Bill earlier? Why did you not call a meeting of the Legislative Council earlier to deal with this matter? If they have allowed so much time to pass, if it is only now that public opinion is forcing attention to those questions, to what has happened in the manner in which it is doing, that they now sit down and consider what they should do, and if they now want to introduce provisions to safeguard them, I say they might well have waited, they might well wait another few months until the Committee have reported.

"My Lord, there is a provision giving retrospective effect to the Bill; that provision might be of some use to those who want this Bill in order to prevent any evil result which they do not desire in cases which they may institute. I do not know of any case which has been instituted. I believe the Punjab has been frightened out of description; the Punjabis have been terrorised in a manner in which I have not known the people of any other part of the country to have been terrorised. In spite of the presence of Sir Edward Maclagan in the Punjab that terror has not yet entirely been removed from the minds of the people. In this state of things they are not anxious, I do not know that many are anxious, to institute any suits. I do not know that any suits have been instituted and that many are anxious to rush forward with cases into the Courts. All that they desire at present is, to know what has happened and to have it established and then to consider what should be done. Indeed, they might well expect the Government to take such action as the Government might think fit. Because you cannot expect that where the number of persons to whom injury has been done is so large and many of them are poor, it is hard to expect that they will be able, that many of them will be able, to seek redress and to obtain it. It is only if the conscience of the Government, to which the Hon'ble the Home Member referred, if the conscience of the Government should be stirred by the recommendations of this Committee of Inquiry, if the Government should think it that they owe it to His Majesty's Government and to the name of Britain and to British justice, to bring certain persons, they may be Indians, they may be Europeans, to bring certain persons to justice, it is only then there would be a chance of justice being done.

"My Lord, there is no reason why the Government should be in a hurry to proceed with the Bill.

"Now, having said this much on the general aspect of the Bill, I shall now address myself to some of its provisions and to the remarks which the Hon'ble the Home Member made in regard to it. The Hon'ble the Home Member said that, when martial law is introduced, the officers of Government have no time to wait, to examine things that they must take action, that they may perform acts which are illegal, but so long as they perform acts which are moral and proper they should be protected. From what I have said it will appear that it is very important to find out which acts come under that category, which though not legal are right and proper. Then he said that an Indemnity Bill of some character is the inevitable sequel of the introduction of martial law. I have myself said in the early part of my address that an Indemnity Act of a certain character may be inevitable, but this involves two important questions. What are the circumstances in which an Indemnity Act is passed? and what would be its nature? The Hon'ble the Home Member quoted Dicey, who himself says that the time the Act is passed must be one of national danger. I have shown that there was no national danger. In a few cases individuals lost their reason, were carried away by passion and committed acts, but we cannot say that these constituted national danger. My Lord, in this connection I wish to draw attention to the contrast furnished by a case I shall cite, and to which reference was made in the cablegram of the Indian Congress to which I alluded before in Council. At the time there was trouble at Lahore there was also trouble at Ahmedabad and Viramgam. His Excellency the Governor of Bombay allowed Mr. Gandhi to go to Ahmedabad and see the people and to work freely among them. He was able to satisfy the people and to quiet them, also to censure them for the outrages they had committed. Martial law was gone in a few days. That was all that was needed at places like Amritsar and Lahore at the utmost. I say there was no justification for martial law in Amritsar, because it was stated to be quiet after 5-30. Assuming even that there was justification for martial law on the 10th April, it should have been withdrawn by the 12th or 13th. The action taken in Ahmedabad forms a happy contrast and affords an instructive lesson in the light of what has happened here. The Hon'ble the Home Member says that there must be a period of national danger when martial law is introduced. I agree with him, but I submit that there was not a period of national danger in the Punjab to justify the introduction of martial law. The other point that he referred to in the quotation from Dicey was, that the acts done must be bona fide and solely in the public interest. It is only in such cases that the persons can be indemnified. I ask the Council, in view of what I have said, to judge whether a Bill of such a sweeping character should be placed before the Council in the light of events that exist now, at a time of non-ascertainment of facts and of the allegations which have been put forward on behalf of the people. Then he referred to various Colonial Legislatures including the South African which have passed Indemnity Acts.

"I may mention here that members of this Council are put to great inconvenience for want of a good library for ourselves. We have at times to borrow books, not only from the library of the Legislative Department which perhaps causes a little inconvenience, but also to get them from distant places in order to carry on our work. I am indebted for a copy of the Cape of Good Hope Act to the Hon'ble the Law Member, who at my request allowed me to refer to it. The absence of such books hampers our work; if we had such books we might be able to save the time of the Council. In the case of this Cape of Good Hope Act the question was considered by a Commission consisting of the Lord Chief Justice, General Ardagh and Judge Bigham of His Majesty's High Court. It consisted of a court of gentlemen of the type I should like to have seen here. It would support some other points to which reference was made in a previous Resolution. Now to come to this Act, VI of 1900. This was passed while the Boer war was going on. It set out the circumstances under which the Act was introduced. It was to punish those persons who had taken up arms against Her Majesty the Queen or otherwise assisted her enemies. It was for the suppression of hostilities and for the maintenance of good order. My Lord, this Act cannot afford any parallel for the legislation which is now under consideration. The Act passed in 1902, No. 4 of 1902, is also important. It was an Act to indemnify the Governor of the Colony and the officer commanding His Majesty's forces in the Colony and all persons acting under their authority and in good faith in regard to acts done or committed during the existence of martial law, to validate certain sentences passed by courts-martial or military courts and to confer certain powers on Commissioners to inquiring as to, and reporting on such sentences being still unexpired. And it promised indemnity in respect of certain acts, matters and things whatsoever that were ordered as necessary for the suppression of hostilities or the establishment and maintenance of good order and government in or for the public safety of the Colony between certain dates.

"Now, my Lord, I submit that here again it had reference to the suppression of hostilities or the establishment of good order and government. It has to be shown that this was necessary.

"Secondly, my Lord, this Act which, I think, has been taken as a model for the Bill which is now before the Council points out that it is only acts done or committed during the existence of martial law which can be indemnified. The Bill in the Statement of Objects and Reasons does say that 'the object of the Bill is to indemnify officers of Government and other persons for acts done bona fide in the course of martial law during the recent disorders, and to provide for the continuance of the sentences passed by courts established under martial law.' Yet, the Council will see that the provisions of the Bill go far beyond it. Whether this was deliberate or unintentional, I cannot say, but the Council will see that the Bill says in clause 2 'No suit or other legal proceeding whatsoever, whether civil or criminal, shall lie in any court of law against any officer of Government, whether civil or military, or against any other person acting under the orders of any such officer for or on account or in respect of any act, matter or thing ordered or done or purporting to have been ordered or done for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order in any part of British India on or after the 30th of March 1919 and before the commencement of this Act.'

"Now, my Lord, martial law as we all know was proclaimed in Amritsar, and it came into force in Lahore on the midnight of the 15th or rather at 12 o'clock of the night between the 16th and the 17th. By what justification events which took place from the 13th March to the date on which martial law was proclaimed have been included in this draft of the Bill, I am unable to understand. Ordinarily such a Bill should be confined to the period during which martial law prevailed, but this Bill goes beyond that period, and the second terminus which it fixes is the commencement of this Act. I should like to know what justification there is for that either.

"My Lord, the second point to which I would refer is this. This Bill says that 'provided that such acts, matters or things were ordered or done in good faith in a reasonable belief that they were necessary for the said purpose.' This, my Lord, is very objectionable. All that you ought to provide for is, that action should be done in good faith and were in fact reasonable, necessary or expedient. You cannot say that if a man were to shoot his fellowman he has acted in a reasonable belief or in good faith. Now, is that man to be indemnified ? In this matter I would draw attention to a few observations of Mr. Justice Chamberlain in one of the State trials which took place in 1799. It was the case, my Lord, of Wright vs. Fitzgerald. Wright brought a suit against Fitzgerald for assault and battery. He had been flogged by the order of Fitzgerald. 50 lashes had been given to him and in addition 50 more. Now, in disposing of that case, Mr. Justice Chamberlain proceeded to charge the jury as follows :—'His Lordship said that the jury were not to imagine that the legislature, by enabling Magistrates to justify under the Indemnity Bill, had released them from the feelings of humanity, or permitted them wantonly to exercise power, even though it were to put down rebellion. No ; it expected that in all cases there should be a grave and serious examination into the conduct of the supposed criminal ; and every act should show a mind intent to discover guilt, not to inflict torture. By examination or trial he did not mean that sort of examination and trial which they have been then engaged in, but such examination and trial, the best the nature of the case, and the existing circumstances would allow of.' That was what Mr. Justice Chamberlain said. He said that 'every man, whether Magistrate or not, was authorised to suppress rebellion, and was to be justified by that law for his acts, it is required, that he should not exceed the necessity which gave him the power ; and that he should show in his justification, that he had used every possible means to ascertain the guilt which he had punished ; and above all, no deviation from the common principles of humanity should appear in his conduct.'

"My Lord, the Legislature is asked at this moment . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—"Will the Hon'ble Member kindly give me the reference ?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"It is State Trials, Vol. XXVII, 1820. Now, my Lord, I submit that in these remarks of Mr. Justice Chamberlain, we get a great guidance for our work in which the Council is at present asked to engage itself. We are not a Court sitting here to consider whether a person charged for having committed any particular act during the recent disturbances should have a decree passed against him or should be exempted. The Legislature is sitting at present to lay down the principles and the provisions under which the case of such a man should be tried and considered, and, I submit, the remarks of Mr. Justice Chamberlain are therefore of peculiar help and guidance to us here.

"In the Bill what is provided is that—

> 'It is expedient to indemnify officers of Government and other persons in respect of acts, matters and things ordered or done or purporting to have been ordered or done for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order, provided that such acts, matters or things were ordered or done in good faith and in a reasonable belief that they were necessary for the said purposes.'

"Now, my Lord, my particular objection is to the expression 'in a reasonable belief.' I submit that would make it impossible for any plaintiff, ordinarily speaking, to succeed in any suit which he might institute against any individual who had wronged him. And that is particularly so when you look at section 2, for it says that no suit shall lie against any officer of Government who may have done certain things, 'provided that such officer or person has acted in good faith and in a reasonable belief that his action was necessary for the said purposes.'

"Now, my Lord, I submit that the officer must not only show, even apart from the rules of evidence in section 3, to which I shall refer later, that he had not only done the act in good faith, but he should have done it with reasonable and proper care and consideration. In the words of Justice Chamberlain 'he should not have deviated from the common principles of humanity which should always appear in his conduct.' Now, I submit, my Lord, that the Bill goes much further than this and gives a protection which is not justified by previous enactments, or by considerations of reason and justice. In that case, my Lord, the charge was that Fitzgerald had been wrongly flogged. In this case we have many cases in which flogging was resorted to rather freely. In that case, in concluding the judgment of the case, Lord Elverton, speaking of the defendant, for whom it had been pleaded that he had done many acts of loyalty, said: 'he had indeed manifested his loyalty most fully for he had manifested it in blood and written it in blood on the plaintiff's back'. My Lord, here too the backs of many persons bear evidence of the deeds that have been done, and they should be allowed to ask those who so injured them to prove that they had acted with reasonable care and caution in the interests of public peace and good order, and not deviating from the principles of humanity.

"My Lord, these provisions to which I have drawn attention become much more objectionable when you come to clause 3 which says:—

> 'For the purpose of section 2 a certificate of a Secretary to Government that any act was done under the orders of an officer of Government shall be conclusive proof thereof, and all action taken for the aforesaid purposes shall be deemed to have been taken in good faith and in a reasonable belief that it was necessary therefor unless the contrary is proved.'

"My Lord, what is given with one hand is taken away by this clause in section 3 of the proposed Bill, because if a certificate from a Secretary to Government that any act was done under the orders of an officer of Government shall be conclusive proof thereof, and all action taken for the aforesaid purposes shall be deemed to have been taken in good faith and in a reasonable belief that it was necessary therefor, I submit you are shutting out all chances of success for any plaintiff who may wish to have a suit instituted, to have an injury done to him investigated. You say, unless the contrary is proved, an action shall be deemed to have been taken in good faith and a reasonable belief that it was necessary. Let us assume—I may be doing an injustice to the gentleman, but I have him as an illustration—that Mr. Mani Lal, Barrister-at-law, instituted a suit, brings an action for compensation, for damage for the wrong done to him in his being confined in the manner in which he is confined, in a cell and otherwise, why should he be asked to prove that the person who caused him the injury acted without good faith and without a reasonable belief? Why should not the burden of proving that he acted in good faith and reasonable belief be cast upon the defendant? It ought to be sufficient for the purpose of a fair trial of a character like that in any Court that the plaintiff should state before the Court on oath the facts of the case, and if the facts of the case did not show that he was either a criminal or had been condemned, or that he was guilty of any act for which he should be locked up, then it should be for the defendant to establish that the facts were such that he could not but act in the manner in which he did, and that therefore he should be excused for having so acted. It is a double wrong, my Lord, a double wrong to plaintiffs, to persons who are subjected to all these humiliations and wrongs, that they should be called upon to prove that those who oppressed them had acted without good faith and without reasonable belief. I submit, my Lord, this clause should be deleted, and it is only possible for anybody to think of having a chance of success if it should be deleted. Then, my Lord, in this connection I may say that to require the plaintiff to prove that he has acted in good faith and reasonable belief is entirely wrong. How can the plaintiff exercise an attribute of omniscience, how can he search into the heart of the defendant and show an intimacy with the motives of a stranger only known to him by his tyranny and oppression, and prove that the injury he received has been the consequence of malicious intention, a thing which it is impossible for him to prove, or that the act has been done in the suppression of rebellion. Motives can only be inferred from actions, and it is for the defendant to show that his motives were such as to justify his actions being excused. It will be entirely difficult for the plaintiff to prove things specially within the knowledge of the defendant. My Lord, I submit therefore that this portion of the Bill is open to grave objection, and that it takes away in one clause what it appears to give in another.

" Now, my Lord, there are other objections to which the Bill is open. I will go back to the preamble:—

> 'Whereas owing to the recent disorders in certain districts in the Punjab and in other parts of India, it has been necessary for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order to resort to martial law.'

" Now, my Lord, this would bring in other places. I do not know how this wide wording will affect acts done in Delhi, for instance, and in Calcutta. The object of the Bill should be clear and the language that is used should be modified in order to make it clear. I am not sure, as the preamble stands, whether it does not also cover places where no martial law was established.

" Then, my Lord, I come to clause 4, confirmation and continuance of martial law sentences. This Bill provides that :—

> 'Every person confined under and by virtue of any sentence passed by a court or other authority constituted or appointed under martial law and acting in a judicial capacity, shall be deemed to have been lawfully confined. And, my Lord, it goes on to say : and shall continue liable to confinement until the expiration of such sentence, or until released by the Governor General in Council or otherwise discharged by lawful authority.'

" My Lord, I must say that this provision of the Bill has shocked me most. I think, my Lord, that the statement of the Hon'ble the Home Member made it clear that the Government of India are conscious that, unless an Indemnifying Bill of the nature now before the Council, that is to say, unless a legislative provision of the nature embodied in clause 4 is passed by this Legislative Council, the detention of men who have been sentenced by martial law courts will be illegal. I take it, my Lord, that that is the position. That being so, I submit it is wrong to these people that the help of the Legislature should be invoked, not for remitting or wiping off the convictions or sentences, but for confirming them and continuing them. My Lord, it seems to me that the Bill was not conceived with sufficient care and deliberation ; that the various acts and provisions which were necessary were not fully considered at one time ; and it seems to me that, if the model of even the Acts of South Africa had been kept fully before the mind of the Government, the Bill might have been drafted, might have been cast, in a different mould, might have consisted of different provisions. The Hon'ble the Home Member, and, I suppose, the Hon'ble the Law Member, perhaps on referring to the South Africa Act, Act IV of 1902 of the Cape of Good Hope, have noticed that there was a provision made for a revision of the sentences of those who had been convicted or sentenced by the martial law authorities. Now, my Lord, perhaps to make up for that omission, the Hon'ble the Home Member has to-day announced the decision of the Government of India that two Judges of the High Court will be appointed to revise the sentences passed by summary courts. I welcome that announcement, but it only strengthens my suspicion that the matter was not considered in all its aspects when the Bill was drafted. Now, my Lord, I want to draw attention to the provisions of the Act of the Cape of Good Hope. May I ask the Hon'ble the Law Member for a copy of that Act, Act IV of 1902?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—"It might save the Hon'ble Member trouble if I were to inform him that that was not the Act which we took as a model at all, but the later Act of 1915, of which he does not appear to know."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"I thank the Hon'ble the Law Member. I did not know of the Act of 1915 or, at any rate, I did not remember it in the midst of the Statutes which were noted by my friends who have been working for me in this matter and helping me. But I am thankful to the Hon'ble the Law Member for informing me of it, and I shall feel thankful to him if he will let me have a copy of that Act also."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—"Certainly, after the Hon'ble Member has finished."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My friend, the Law Member, need not be so afraid of letting me look at the Act before I finish; I might find some help from it. However, I shall be content for such courtesy as he thinks fit to extend to me.

"Now, my Lord, this Act, Act IV of 1902, contains a very important provision regarding the confirmation of sentences passed by military courts. I beg to draw your Lordship's attention and the attention of the Council to this section, which runs as follows :—

'The several sentences pronounced by Courts-Martial constituted and convened by proper authority, and holden in districts of this Colony in which martial law was proclaimed or imposed, and during the existence thereof, upon persons not ordinarily subject to Military Law tried by such Courts for acts of high treason, murder, or for all or any other crimes or offences whatsoever or for all or any contraventions of any Regulations expressed or purporting to be issued under martial law and commonly termed Martial Law Regulations are hereby confirmed : and all such persons confined in any prisons or other legal places of confinement within the Colony under or by virtue of such sentences shall be deemed to have been and to be legally confined there, and shall continue to be so confined, there or elsewhere, as the Governor may direct, until the expiration of the sentences respectively passed upon them or until they are discharged by lawful authority, and such sentences shall be deemed to be sentences duly passed by duly and legally constituted Courts of this Colony and shall subject in each and every case to the provisions of the ninth and tenth sections hereof be carried out or otherwise dealt with in the same manner, and sentences of such Military Courts as aforesaid shall be followed by the same disabilities, if any, as sentences of the Courts of this Colony.'

"The second part of this goes on to say :—

'Each and all of the officers of the prisons or other legal places of confinement mentioned in the preceding sub-section who have, or had at any time in good faith received into, or kept in confinement any of the persons mentioned in the said preceding sub-section shall be deemed for all purposes to have acted legally.'

" And the third part is also important. It went on to say :—

'All persons in this Colony who have been deported without the limits thereof under and by virtue of any of the foregoing sentences referred to in the preceding sub-section shall be deemed to have been and to be legally deported without the limits of this Colony, and such acts or cases of deportation as aforesaid shall be deemed to be among, and shall be included under the acts, matters and things referred to in the second section of this Act.'

"Now, my Lord, the object of this, I submit, was to legalise the sentences which had been passed no doubt, but there was the important fact that there was a war waged against the Queen, I think it was then. Secondly, my Lord, it was to confirm the sentences, particularly in the case of persons not ordinarily subject to military law tried by such courts for acts of treason, murder or for other crimes or offences or for any contraventions of any Regulations expressed or purporting to be issued under martial law and commonly termed Martial Law Regulations. Now, my Lord, this provision was made and the object was that the punishments which had been inflicted should be regarded as legal and that a suit should not lie against persons because they had confined these men in imprisonment or deported them. Your Lordship will have noted that in section 2 jailors are indemnified, in part 3 certain acts are validated, and, therefore, I submit, the object was more to legalise the acts which had been done and the punishments which had been suffered and which might be suffered as a matter of necessity until they were remedied later on. And this was accompanied, my Lord, by a very salutary provision, because your Lordship will be pleased to note that while this General Indemnity Act was passed on the 15th September 1902, there was a Commission appointed at the same time, dated the 2nd of August 1902. Edward VII, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, appointed a Commission. That was in the first schedule of the Bill. It was not an extraneous announcement by the Hon'ble the Home Member that the Government of India would be pleased to appoint two High Court Judges—and here I may say that the public have come, my Lord, not to have the same confidence in High Courts after the troubles in the Punjab—to revise sentences passed by summary Courts. My Lord, this ought to be a part of the Bill so that the public might know that there is sufficient and adequate provision made for a revision of those sentences.

"The first Schedule, my Lord, sets out the Commission passed under the Royal Sign Manual and Signet appointing the Right Hon'ble Baron Alverstone, Sir John Charles Bigham and Major-General Sir John Charles Ardagh, to be Commissioners to inquire into the sentences imposed by the military courts established under martial law in the South African Colonies and Protectorates and appointing Gilbert Mellor, Esq., to be Secretary to the Commission. Your Lordship will see that the Lord Chief Justice of England was the President of the Commission and Justice Bigham 'one of the justices of our High Court of justice' was a member and also General Sir John Charles Ardagh, K.C.I.E., was a member. Now, I draw attention to certain provisions of this Schedule. It runs :—

'WHEREAS in consequence of the war declared by the late governments of the South African Republic and Orange Free State against Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, it became necessary to proclaim martial law in our colonies and protectorates in South Africa; and whereas certain persons have been by military courts established under martial law in the said colonies and protectorates sentenced to terms of penal servitude and of imprisonment and to the payment of fines and are now undergoing the said sentences and have not paid but are liable to pay the said fines;

'AND WHEREAS the aforesaid war having now ceased it is expedient that inquiry should be made with regard to the aforesaid sentences with a view to ascertaining whether we might properly and without danger to the public safety of our said colonies and protectorates extend our grace and mercy to any of such persons and where such sentences and any and which of them might properly be by us remitted or reduced

'Now, know ye that we considering the premises and reposing great trust and confidence in your fidelity and discretion and integrity, do authorise and appoint you the said ..... (three persons) to be our Commissioners to inquire into the said sentences imposed by military courts established under martial law in our said colonies and protectorates and with as little delay as possible to report to us in writing under your hands and seals respectively whether in the case of the said persons and of which of them respectively who shall be at the date of your report then undergoing any such sentence or who shall not have paid but shall then be liable to pay any such fines, it is expedient, having regard to all the circumstances relating thereto, that such sentences of fines should be remitted or reduced.'

"Now, my Lord, your Lordship will please note the expression 'and to report with as little delay as possible.' That, my Lord, was incorporated as part of the Bill. I shall feel grateful to the Hon'ble the Law Member if he will kindly give me Act VI of 1900 also . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"I was in hopes, my Lord, that I had not got it, but I have."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" Now, my Lord, there is an important provision in this Act of 1900, to which I invite the attention of Council and the Government. My Lord, the whole attitude of the Government as disclosed in the case of these two enactments and as disclosed by the Bill presented to this Council shows, I am sorry to say, a regrettable difference. Now, my Lord, in the case of this Act of 1900 (VI of 1900), there was a provision to confirm sentences, merely to legalise, as I have pointed out already, what has been done. This is what it says :—

> ' All actions, indictments and legal proceedings whatsoever which might be brought or instituted in any of the courts of this colony against His Excellency the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope or the officer for the time being in command of His Majesty's Forces in this colony or against any person or persons acting under them or either of them respectively, in any command or capacity, civil or military, for or on account or in respect of any acts, matters, and things whatsoever in good faith advised, commanded, ordered, directed or done as necessary for the suppression of hostilities in or the maintenance of good order and government or for the public safety of this colony between the date of the commencement of a state of war between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of the South African Republic and the Orange Free State and the date of the taking effect of this Act, shall be discharged and become and be made void.'

" Then, my Lord, it is said in section 5 :—

> ' In all cases of convictions for high treason or other crimes of a political character during the period specified in section 1 of this Act, where such convictions have taken place before courts-martial or military courts constituted, convened and held as in the last preceding section set forth or where they have taken place before the ordinary criminal courts having jurisdiction over them, it shall be lawful for the Governor, should he consider that any such case would, had it been dealt with after the taking effect of this Act, have been a case proper for the consideration of the Commissioners appointed under section 33 hereof, to order that the said sentences imposed upon such persons shall be altered into the sentence laid down in section 50 of this Act. The person affected by any such sentence shall thereupon become liable to suffer the penalty imposed by the said fiftieth section and no other.'

" That is to say a sentence under section 50 has been substituted for the one already imposed. Section 50 says :—

> ' The said Commissioners shall, after hearing the evidence, if any, for and against the accused, decide whether he is guilty or not of the charge brought against him, and in all cases in which an accused person shall be found guilty, the said Commissioners shall adjudge that he shall be, for the period of five years and no longer, disqualified from being registered as a voter or from voting for the election of members of Parliament, or of a Divisional or Municipal Council, or of a Village Management Board or from being or continuing to be a member of Parliament, or from holding any public office, or continuing upon the Commission of the Peace or from serving upon a Jury in civil or criminal cases, anything contained in any Law or Act of Parliament to the contrary notwithstanding; and thereupon such person shall be in Law absolutely disqualified, in regard to all the aforementioned matters and his name, if upon any existing voters' list, shall be and is hereby removed therefrom, and the vote of any such person given at any such election shall be null and void and may be struck out in any proceeding in which the result of such election is challenged in any competent court. Save as hereinafter provided the findings or decisions of the said Commissioners shall not be subject to appeal to or review by any Court whatever.'

" Now, my Lord, you will see what an important difference of outlook and aim these provisions of the indemnifying Acts to which I am referring show as compared with the provisions of this Bill. My Lord, these Commissions were appointed as part of the Bill, and they were given power to wipe off all other sentences and to substitute a municipal disqualification. It was not in ordinary trifling cases, cases of not salaaming a European, but it was in cases of high treason and in all cases of convictions for high treason or for other crimes of a political character during the period specified in section 1 of that Act.

"The other day, my Lord, I brought forward a Resolution and urged that the Government might consider the advisability of the Committee of Inquiry (or the commission which I suggested) being empowered where they thought fit to recommend to His Majesty's Privy Council that convictions by Martial Law Commissions and Martial Law Summary Courts might be annulled or modified. My Lord, this Act to which I make reference shows further reason in support of my proposition. It is said by the Hon'ble the Home Member that he Government of India are going to appoint two High Court Judges to revise these sentences. My Lord, the Government of India cannot constitute a court. The Government of India cannot constitute a regular court. The Governor General can no doubt introduce martial law and constitute certain courts under martial law, but the Government of India cannot constitute a regular court.

"If these two High Court Jugdes are to revise the sentences that will not be a court. They will only be advisers, very honourable advisers of the Government of India in respect of the cases which the Government of India may deal with. I submit with confidence, notwithstanding what the Hon'ble the Law Member may say to the contrary on this point, that the Government of India cannot by appointing two High Court Judges to revise sentences passed by martial law invest them with the authority of a legal court . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"I never suggested anything of the kind."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"I thank the Hon'ble the Home Member for removing my doubts on the point. I should like to know what will be the position of the two Judges. I should feel grateful to the Hon'ble the Home Member if he will make the point clear, it will save time. I do not know if they are merely to advise, whether their opinions will be merely recommendations to be considered by the executive Government, or whether they will have power to deal with sentences, wipe out convictions, reduce sentences or whatever else they would like to do. I should be very grateful if the Hon'ble the Home Member will enlighten me on that point."

At this point the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya resumed his seat.

The President:—"The Hon'ble Member will proceed with his speech."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, I take it, in the absence of any explanation from the Hon'ble the Home Member that the matter is left vague. I submit that in the absence of further information these two Judges will be merely advisers to the Government. I submit that that will not be a satisfactory position. Next, I should like the Government to consider the propriety of including in the terms of reference some direction such as that contained in Act VI of 1902 of the Cape of Good Hope. By this time, in view of what has happened and that has not been contradicted or controverted, it is time for the Government of India to make up its mind to release these persons who are undergoing imprisonment from further humiliations and hardships. I submit that this is a suitable moment for the Government to consider this matter. If the Bill proceeds as it is, then, I submit, the position will be this. We do not know how long these High Court Judges may take to deal with the cases of these men, the procedure has not been indicated, and therefore no one can form any idea of the time and therefore 'every person confined under and by virtue of any sentence passed by a court or other authority constituted or appointed under martial law and acting in a judicial capacity shall be deemed to have been lawfully confined and shall continue liable to confinement under the expiration of such sentence or until released by the Governor General in Council or otherwise discharged by lawful authority.' I submit that that is not a satisfactory position, particularly in view of the remarks which the Hon'ble the Law Member made. He said he had consulted the Government of the Punjab, and it was of opinion that it would be dangerous to let off any of the men who were undergoing imprisonment at present and who were under sentence passed by martial law. I suggest that if it should be pointed out to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab that if there are persons who are considered dangerous, there are provisions under the existing enactments by which they can be taken up and judicially proceeded against and confined. There are many provisions under the existing enactments which enable the executive Government or any Government to proceed against persons of doubtful character or dangerous and bind them over to keep the peace and to be of good behaviour. It is open to the Government to have them tried in the regular courts in the ordinary way. Great complaints have been made that these convictions and sentences are illegal. The Hon'ble the Home Member has practically admitted the truth of this contention and, unless some provision such as I am referring to is enacted, these unhappy men will continue in jail. That being the position I submit that there should be some provision by which these men should at an early date be set free to enjoy the liberty to which they are entitled, and if they are not entitled to that liberty by a reason of any act of wrong doing the ordinary courts of the law should be allowed to deal with them. I need hardly draw attention to the remarks of Lord Halsbury, but it is my duty to refer to certain information which has been printed and reproduced in an excellent volume by Sheikh Nabi Bakhsh, a Vakil of the Punjab High Court. Your Lordship and the Council have noted what Lord Halsbury states in the 'Laws of England' that the powers of the military authorities cease, and those of the civil courts are resumed ipso facto on the termination of disorder. Disorder terminated long long ago and martial law was also discontinued partly in May and partly in June, and finally last month. I think it was about the 25th or 28th of August. Therefore the course I am suggesting is the right course to be pursued ; let there be such a provision enacted as that to which I have drawn attention, unless it be a case of murder or arson ; let the men be proceeded against in the ordinary way. They have the right to choose in the matter and some may not choose that course. This question of martial law has been very carefully explained in various places. For instance, Justice Sir James Fitz James Stephen, a Judge of the High Court of the Queen's Bench Division, in his book the History of Criminal Law of England, says. I will read only his summing up to save time. He says, "I will sum up . . . . .

The President :—"I understand it is your summing up also."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"No my Lord, I am reading the summing up of Sir James Fitz James Stephen."

The President :—"All right, proceed."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"He says :—

> "I may sum up my view of martial law in general in the following propositions. Martial law is the assumption by officers of the Crown of absolute power exercised by military force for the suppression of an insurrection and the restoration of order and lawful authority. The Officers of the Crown are justified in any exertion of physical force extending to the destruction of life and property to any extent and in any manner that may be required for the purpose. They are not justified in the use of the cruel and excessive means but are liable civilly or criminally for such excess. They are not justified in inflicting punishment after resistance is suppressed, and after the ordinary courts of justice can be re-opened.'

The principle by which their responsibility is measured is well expressed in the case of Wright versus Fitzgerald. Wright was a French Master at the schools in Clonmell who after the suppression of the Irish rebellion in 1799 . .

The President :—"The Hon'ble Member really must not repeat himself. We have already had the case of Wright versus Fitzgerald for half an hour."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, I am quoting the summary of Sir James Fitz James Stephen . . . .

The President :—"I am quite aware of that. But we have all heard the case of Wright versus Fitzgerald for half an hour this afternoon, and I do not propose that we should hear it again."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"Very well, my Lord. Then Sir James Fitz James Stephen proceeds to say :—

> 'The Courts-martial as they are called, by which martial law in this sense of the word is administered, are not properly speaking, Courts-Martial or courts at all. They are merely committees formed for the purpose of carrying into execution the discretionary power assumed by the Government. On the one hand, they are not obliged to proceed in the manner pointed out by the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War. On the other hand, if they do so proceed they are not protected by them as the member of a real court-martial might be except so far as such proceedings are evidence of good faith. They are justified in doing, with any forms and in any manner whatever is necessary to suppress insurrection, and to restore peace and the authority of the law. They are personally liable for any acts which they may commit in excess of that power, even if they act in strict accordance with the Mutiny Act and the Articles of War.'

"Therefore, my Lord, after the resistance has been suppressed the ordinary courts of justice can be re-opened and cases of persons who cannot be released entirely might well be referred to such courts. I will refer to one other opinion, namely, that of Mr. Justice Spankie. Writing on this subject,—this is a written opinion, dated the 27th April 1818 :—

'The manifest intention of Government in its legislative capacity was, that none but cases of the simplest and most obviously criminal nature should be the subject of trial by the courts-martial ; the fact, whether a person was taken in the actual commission of an overt act of rebellion, or taken in the act of openly aiding and abetting the enemies of the state or taken in open hostility, might safely be tried by such courts ; and such a provision for trial was calculated to prevent military severity in the field becoming absolute massacre. But all complex cases depending upon circumstantial proof and requiring either a long examination of facts or a discriminating inference from facts in themselves equivocal were purposely withdrawn from the cognizance of these tribunals. It never was intended that courts-martial should try, as those have done, acts even of criminal nature, in which the prisoner was not taken and unless the acts were open overt acts and of the most material palpable quality.'

In another portion he says 'that the moment the order is ceased the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts can be resumed '. Now, my Lord, I submit that the provisions of the Bill as they stand are unsatisfactory, and leave should not be given to introduce the Bill in its present form. Now, if the Bill is not introduced, my Lord, in its present form, as I have said before, not much harm will be done, and the Government will be in a position to deal with the matter after the report of the Committee of Inquiry. I wish, my Lord, to point out the grave injustice and disadvantage which is likely to result if the Bill is passed at present. Of course it is in the power of your Excellency's Government to pass the Bill. We know it. We have had recent experiences to convince us of it. You do command a large official majority in this Council. The representatives of the people are few. But I submit, my Lord, in this matter it would be right and proper that your Excellency's Government should consider what the public opinion of the country is. Shall we stop now ?"

The President :—"Is the Hon'ble Member concluding his speech ?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, I should like to conclude to-morrow."

The President :—"The Council will now adjourn till 11 o'clock to-morrow. We shall sit from 11 to half-past 1, and we shall sit again from 3 until we finish."

The Council then adjourned to Friday, the 19th September 1919, at 11 A.M.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

(5 & 6 Geo. V, Ch. 61.)

The Council met at the Council Chamber, Viceregal Lodge, Simla, on Friday, the 19th September, 1919.

PRESENT:

His Excellency BARON CHELMSFORD, P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., G.C.M.G., G.C.B.E., Viceroy and Governor General, presiding, and 52 Members, of whom 44 were Additional Members.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked :— 11-5 A.M.

1. "To what extent have the cultivation and production of cotton increased during the last five years in each province, and what action do Government propose to take on the report of the Cotton Committee?" Increase of cultivation and production of cotton.

"A statement* giving the area and yield of cotton in each Province (including Indian States) in India for the five years ending with 1918-19 is placed on the table.

The Resolution of the Government of India in the Revenue and Agriculture Department, on the Report of the Indian Cotton Committee, which was published in the Supplement to Part I of the Gazette of India, dated the 9th August 1919, indicates broadly the lines on which it is proposed to deal with the recommendations in the Report of the Committee."

2. "What are the causes of the high prices of food grains, and how far, if at all, is profiteering or any other remediable factor responsible for the same, in each province?" Causes for rise in prices.

*Vide Appendix

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"I would refer the Hon'ble Member to what I said in the debate on the Resolution moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda on the 15th instant."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked :—

Action contemplated for checking the rise in prices.

3. "Will Government be pleased to indicate the lines on which action is contemplated for checking the upward course of prices of foodstuffs, and for affording adequate relief against the same?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"I would refer the Hon'ble Member to the same debate. I may add that the Committee which Council recommended the Government of India to appoint to consider this question will meet to-morrow at Gorton Castle."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked :—

Taking over of rice intended for England by Government.

4. "Has the attention of Government been drawn to a statement appearing in the 'Rangoon Times' that the Royal Commission on wheat supplies holds in Burma large quantities of rice bought last year and apparently not needed in England, and that the same might be taken over by the Government of India for meeting the demand of Bengal and Madras? Are Government making inquiries in the matter?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"Yes. The unshipped balance of old crop rice held in Burma by the Royal Commission on Wheat Supplies amounts to 18,800 tons. The statement that this rice is not needed in England is not correct. The Royal Commission recently asked to be permitted to purchase an additional quantity of 25,000 tons of rice in Burma, but this request was refused."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

Improvement of stocks of food supplies throughout the country.

5. "What proposals, if any, have been resolved upon to improve the stocks of food supplies throughout the country?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"I would refer the Hon'ble Member also to the reply which I have just given to the Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

Indian traders in East Africa.

6. "(a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a statement made by the Indian Merchants' Chamber in their representation to the Government of Bombay regarding East African trade to the effect that colour prejudice which is responsible for a great deal of mischief in South Africa has begun to make itself felt even in East Africa, and that the segregation campaign is in full swing there too?

"(b) Have any steps been taken, or are any steps intended to be taken, to safeguard the rights and privileges of the Indian trading community in that country?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"The attention of the Government of India has been drawn to a statement which was published in the Press made by the Committee of Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau regarding East African trade.

I regret to say that the statement of the Committee that colour prejudice has begun to make itself felt in East Africa, appears from the information which we received from various sources, to be not unfounded. In March last we received a deputation of Indians from East Africa, headed by Mr. Alibhai Jeevanji, and were much impressed with the sober and convincing way in which they stated their grievances. His Excellency the Viceroy at once telegraphed a summary of their grievances to the Secretary of State and urged strongly that their claims should receive sympathetic consideration. The memorial presented by the deputation was subsequently forwarded to the Secretary of State with a despatch, in which the Government of India urged that there was no justification in a Crown Colony or Protectorate for assigning to British Indians a status in any way inferior to that of any other class of His Majesty's subjects resident in the Colony. The Government of India further urged not only that the more galling disabilities of Indians in East Africa should be removed, but also that their claims to a share in the government of the country, by adequate representation on the Legislative Council and on local bodies, should be sympathetically considered.

The Committee's statement also refers to another grievance, which was not mentioned by the deputation, namely, that an attempt is being made to remove Indian ginneries from leading industrial places like Kampala. It had already been brought to the notice of the Government of India that the cotton policy of the Uganda Government was likely to injure Indian trade interests. We have more than once addressed the Secretary of State on the subject, protesting most strongly against restrictions on trade which particularly affect the Indian owned ginneries at the ports. The Hon'ble Member will be glad to hear also that a meeting of the Uganda Chamber of Commerce, at which only one Indian was present, passed a resolution that the proposals of the Uganda Government, if carried out, would constitute a very grave injustice to the ginning industry and would be a serious interference with the freedom of trade.

Regarding the policy of segregation to which the Hon'ble Member specifically refers, we have received papers from the Secretary of State from which it appears that a Report on Sanitary Matters in the East Africa Protectorate, Uganda and Zanzibar, by Professor W. J. Simpson, C.M.G., M.D., F.R.C.P., has recommended the division of residential areas into separate zones, in which different building regulations should be enforced by the sanitary authorities. The Secretary of State has already protested against any such division being based on racial discrimination, and has pointed out that Professor Simpson himself has observed in his Report that the division into separate zones would not prevent any European, Asiatic or African from owning land or buildings in any zone, provided they conformed to the provisions relating to these zones. The Secretary of State for the Colonies has promised to give further consideration to the question."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha asked :—

7. "Have Government formulated any definite proposals regarding the report of the Indian Industrial Commission? If so, what are the proposals?" Report of the Indian Industrial Commission.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

" I have nothing to add to the statement made on this subject by His Excellency the Viceroy in his speech at the opening of this Session of the Council, which gives all the information at present at our disposal."

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur, asked :—

The Indian Majority Act.

8. " (a) Are Government aware of the decision of the Madras High Court in S.A. No. 1277-1916, regarding the right of a Muhammadan girl to release her dower ?

(b) Has their attention been drawn to a letter on 'The majority of Muhammadan women', which appeared in the 'Madras Mail' of the 5th March 1918 ?

(c) Do Government contemplate a change in the provisions of the Indian Majority Act, 1875, so as to exempt Muhammadan women of sixteen years of age and over, (who according to Muhammadan Law have attained majority) from the operation of the Act ? "

" (a) Yes.

(b) No.

(c) Government will examine the question of the desirability of amending the Act of 1875. "

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur, asked :—

Measures taken to control and check the growth of food prices.

9. " (a) What measures have been adopted and what further measures are proposed to control and check the growth of food prices in the different provinces ?

(b) Will Government lay on the table a statement for each province, describing the steps taken so far to mitigate the sufferings of the poor on account of the high prices of foodstuffs ? "

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

" The Foodstuffs Commissioner has been instructed to write a report on the operations of his Department in the past year, and this report will be published. It will contain information in general terms on the questions referred to by the Hon'ble Member. Local Governments will no doubt consider the advisability of obtaining, for publication, similar reports from their Directors of Civil Supplies. "

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur, asked :—

Pension of Mahomed Hayat of Kurnool.

10. " (a) Have Government received any petitions from Mahomed Hayat, Khan Bahadur, a political prisoner at Kurnool, regarding the increase of his pension ?

(b) If so, what action do they propose to take in the matter ?

(c) Do they propose to grant substantial allowances to the Khandans at Kurnool ? Are not these Khandans now in receipt of small pensions ? "

The Hon'ble Lieutenant-Colonel R. E. Holland replied :—

"(a) A petition dated the 17th October 1911 was received direct from Muhammad Hayat Khan and was sent to the Government of Madras with the request that the petitioner might be informed that his representation could not be entertained by the Government of India unless submitted through the local authority. Further direct petitions were received in December, 1911, January, 1913, and February and August 1919, and were similarly forwarded to the Local Government for disposal.

(b) The Government of India do not propose to take any action in the matter unless they are addressed by the Local Government.

(c) The Kurnool pensions are administered in accordance with principles formulated by the Government of Madras in 1890 and approved by the Government of India. The Government of India have not received from the Madras Government any proposals for the increase of any of the pensions now granted, nor have they any recent information as to the amounts disbursed to individual pensioners."

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur put a supplementary question which was inaudible.

The President :—"I think if the Hon'ble Member would let Colonel Holland hear his supplementary question, he would be able to reply to him."

The Hon'ble Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur :—"Regarding this third part, I should like to know whether the Government of India will ask the Local Government for their opinion on account of the scarcity and high prices of grain?"

The Hon'ble Lieutenant Colonel R. E. Holland :—"I understand that the Hon'ble Member wishes to know whether the Government of India will ask the Local Government whether, on account of the high prices of grain, some increase might not be made in the pensions. I have discussed the matter with the Hon'ble Mr. Marjoribanks, and I propose to go through the file with him and, if I may answer the Hon'ble Member privately afterwards, I think he will be satisfied."

THE INDEMNITY BILL—(Contd).

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, I would like to draw attention to two other matters relating to the Bill which are to my mind of great importance. One is that clause 6, the savings clause, says :— 11-13 A.M.

> 'Nothing in this Act shall prevent the institution of proceedings by or on behalf of the Government against any person in respect of any matter whatsoever.'

This no doubt reserves to the Government the right of instituting any proceedings by or on behalf of the Government against any person. But, except for this, the right of private individuals to bring any suit or to institute any legal proceedings against any individual are restricted by the provisions of clauses 2 and 3. Now, my Lord, I have already submitted that clause 2 of the Bill bars a suit and says :—

> 'No suit or other legal proceeding whatsoever, whether civil or criminal, shall lie in any court of law against any officer of Government; * * * * * provided that such officer or person has acted in good faith and in a reasonable belief that his action was necessary for the said purposes.'

" And then comes clause 3 which says:—

> 'For the purposes of section 2 a certificate of a Secretary to Government that any act was done by the orders of any officer of Government shall be conclusive proof thereof, etc., unless the contrary is proved.'

" Now, my Lord, the result of these two clauses taken together is, as I submit, practically to make the chance of success for any private individual very very small; and I submit this is not right. I want to illustrate how very unjustly the provisions of this Bill will operate to make it difficult for any individual who may have been injured to obtain justice. I would like to draw attention to one concrete case which occurred at Amritsar. That case is the case of Mr. Gurdial Singh Salariya, Barrister-at-law. This gentleman was in the District Court along with several others on the 10th of April, 1919, when he heard that there had been firing resorted to and that there was trouble owing to the deportations. He and other pleader friends consulted together and resolved to inform the Deputy Commissioner that they thought they might go and help, and, with his consent, went to try and quiet the trouble. They did go there, and this gentleman and his friends who were with him laboured for a long while to quell the mob and to turn them back. He succeeded also to a large extent in sending back part of the mob from the railway overbridge, and, in order that he might do his work better, obtained the loan of a horse from a policeman with the help of the Deputy Commissioner and rode about appealing to people to go back. While he was doing this, the military fired upon the mob. There was a crowd near the overbridge; he found the military ready to fire and he shouted out at the top of his voice to stop. He requested the Deputy Commissioner to give him some time to persuade the crowd to go back, and, while he was doing so, they began to fire all at once without warning this gentleman that they were going to fire. Luckily, he escaped. The Deputy Commissioner in his statement before one of the Martial Law Commissions said that this gentleman, Mr. Gurdial Singh, 'went with his permission to push back the mob and that he was genuinely trying to do so.' He further says that 'owing to a dangerous rush of the crowd, it was necessary to fire, while Gurdial Singh was trying to keep them back, and that he had been pointed out to the soldiers as a friend. He ran serious risk of being shot and deserves credit for having tried to quell the mob in a brave and determined manner.' This was the statement made by the Deputy Commissioner of Amritsar in the case when Mr. Gurdial Singh was tried. Now, my Lord, having done this, this gentleman went home. This was on the 10th of April. On the 23rd of May a policeman, a constable in white clothes, went to him in court and asked him to accompany him to the Kotwali, where he was wanted by the police. He went there and was placed before the Deputy Superintendent, I think. He was asked a few questions and was politely told that he was to go to jail where he was to be confined. Now, my Lord, this gentleman was kept in Amritsar for two days or so and then he was removed, handcuffed, to Lahore. On the morning of May, the 26th, he was made to walk on foot from the railway station at Lahore to Montgomery Hall, was kept there the whole day sitting on the ground. Then, my Lord, he was removed to the Central Jail and was put in an iron cage, seven feet by 2½, although his guardian had paid Rs. 30 in order that he might be put in another place. Now, my Lord, he was removed the next morning to that other place. He was not long there and was sent on to another jail. This gentleman was arrested on the 23rd, was put on his trial on the charge of having taken part on the 5th April, 1919, to bring about hartal on the 6th. It was proved that he was lying ill at home on that day by the evidence of a surgeon, I think a civil surgeon. The second charge was that he was a speaker at the meeting of the 6th April, the great Satyagraha day meeting. He did admit that he did take part, and all glory to him for having taken part in that meeting. The third charge against him was that he had incited the mob at the railway bridge on the 10th April, when he had at the risk of his life tried to send back the mob to the city, and further that he had on horseback gone down to the city and delivered an inflammable speech. Now, my Lord, the Deputy Commissioner was examined and he deposed to the fact that this gentleman had honestly endeavoured at the risk of his life to quell the mob, and to send them back to the city. The question put to the Deputy Commissioner was 'Do you know as a fact that Gurdial Singh Salariya did his best to keep the mob back on the 10th April 1919?' The answer was 'Yes, this is the only conclusion to be drawn from the action I saw.' Then the question was 'Did you actually see him shouting and entreating the mob on the carriage bridge to disperse?' and the answer was 'Yes, I remember him distinctly as he swarmed up a lamp post to address the crowd better.' Then he was asked 'Did his attitude and efforts against the mob appear to you genuine?' The answer was 'Yes, I certainly think they were genuine.' Then again 'Was Gurdial Singh in danger of being shot when he was roaming about facing the mob and telling them to get back and thus did real service?' The answer was 'Yes, owing to the dangerous rush of the crowd it was necessary to fire while he was trying to keep them back and though he had been pointed out to the soldiers as a friend he ran serious danger of being shot. He deserves credit for having tried to keep the crowd back in a brave and determined manner.' Now, my Lord, this gentleman was put on his trial and kept in jail from the 23rd May for nearly a month and a half. He was subjected to all these indignities and to all the humiliation and trouble of being kept there. In the judgment in his case the Martial Law Commission said: 'This accused was present at the meeting of the 6th April. (That of course was a crime in the eye of the Commission.) But we are not satisfied that he had joined the conspiracy. His actions on the 10th April as deposed to by the Deputy Commissioner indicate that he was supporting the authorities to the best of his powers and at some risk to himself. Hans Raj (the approver) does not attribute any acts to him, merely saying that Gurdial Singh had told Bashir that he had done what he could on the 10th. Mr. Herbert (the Crown Advocate) did not press the case against him and we acquit him.' Now, my Lord, I should like to ask what would be the position of Mr. Gurdial Singh if he was to seek some compensation, some remedy for the gross, unjustifiable wrong done to him. Here is a man who at the risk of his life rendered service to the Government and the public at the time of the disorder, while the Deputy Commissioner and the Police Superintendent who saw him work at the railway bridge were still in Amritsar, this gentleman was arrested and challánned in a humiliating manner and kept in jail for a period of a month and a half, had to undergo all the anxiety, trouble and indignity and humiliation of arranging for his defence and had to be acquitted after all. Is he, if this proposed Bill is passed, to be defeated in a suit, unless he can swear that there was in the minds of his assailants and persecutors a malicious intent? Or is it right that he should be able to go into the Court, state the facts and ask his persecutors to plead whatever excuse or justification they may have to plead? Which will be the right course? Which will be the fair procedure? I submit, there can be only one answer. The man has been obviously unanswerably wronged. You want by this Bill to shut him out from having a chance of success in a suit for damages, by the provisions you seek to incorporate in this Bill. He goes with his suit or plaint into the Court, and the answer is that no suit will lie unless it is proved by the plaintiff that the defendant had not acted in good faith and in a reasonable belief that the steps that had been taken against him were necessary for the purposes of maintaining or restoring order. I submit, my Lord, I cannot imagine a grosser perversion of what should be the right procedure than what is incorporated in this Bill. I have drawn attention to this case for two reasons, first, that the provisions of clauses 2 and 3 are entirely unjust and ought to be entirely deleted, I mean so far as the proviso to clause 2 is concerned and so far as the new rule of evidence incorporated in clause 3 is concerned. I would also refer to it to show that though clause 6 of the Bill gives to Government the power to proceed against any person against whom they may

> 'For the purposes of section 2 a certificate of a Secretary to Government that any act was done by the orders of any officer of Government shall be conclusive proof thereof, etc., unless the contrary is proved.'

The third charge against him was that he had incited the mob at the railway bridge on the 10th April, when he had at the risk of should have power to decide what compensation should be given to those who have suffered loss of life or limb, for many have suffered in limb, as well as those who have suffered loss of property. In this respect the Bill is defective, and for this reason also I submit that the Government should reconsider the situation. The Council will have noted that my proposal is not that no Indemnity Bill should be introduced and passed, but that such a Bill should not be introduced at present, that it should be kept back until the Committee of inquiry has reported. I would point out in this connection that this is not such a wide suggestion as it may seem to some people. After the dark days of the Mutiny the Government was in no hurry to pass an Indemnity Act. The Indemnity Act was passed in the year 1860; it received the assent of the Government of India on the 2nd August 1860; that is two years after the mutiny had been suppressed. I submit, my Lord, that the Government would not be unwise, and that no interests would be jeopardised if the Government do not proceed with the Bill at present. I am strengthened in urging this before Council by the reports which I have received, both telegrams and letters have been coming from different places expressing the deep sense of dissatisfaction among the general Indian public at the Government proceeding with this Indemnity Bill. I will first read a telegram I have received from Lahore. It runs—'Members of the Indian Association, Lahore, respectfully enter their emphatic protest against the statement made by the Hon'ble Malik Umar Hyat Khan at the recent meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council that the people of the Punjab do not want a Commission of Inquiry into the happenings of April last. As a matter of fact, the entire province demands a searching investigation by an Imperial Commission, unconnected with the administration of the country; the fact that public meetings of protest cannot be held owing to Ordinances and official orders should not be misconstrued. They wish further to give expression to strongly felt public opinion of the Punjab that passing of the proposed Bill at the present stage will not only be premature but also prejudicial to the conduct of proper inquiry. There will be ample time for enactment of a law for the protection of officials after the Commission of Inquiry has pronounced its verdict as to the necessity of a declaration of martial law and suggestions of measures and methods adopted in its working. The Punjab Association feel in any case that there is absolutely no necessity for validating sentences illegally passed by Martial Law Commission and officers. They pray that the Government will be pleased to abandon the Bill at present.' This is one of several telegrams received. I also wish to show how the public have expressed themselves. Sir Narayan Chandarvakar, Vice-President of the National Liberal Association, cabled to the Secretary of State and to your Excellency a few days ago praying among other things that the Indemnity Bill at the present stage should be abandoned, as its necessity depends on the result of inquiry by the already appointed Commission. Then again, my Lord, 'Ditcher' in 'Capital' has said that it is obvious that the passing of the Indemnity Act and the findings of the Committee will be purely academic. The 'Daily News' of London has observed in referring to the proposed Commission that 'the provision for a complete whitewashing of the official policy of the Punjab is made doubly certain by the resolve to protect officials by the Act of Indemnity before the inquiry is entered on. This policy, for which there is no defence, recalls the direct action taken after the Ceylon disturbances in the first year of the war. By such un-British tactics the British name is besmirched.' The Indian papers have almost without exception written strongly against the policy of proceeding with this Bill before the Committee has made its report. There is hardly time for me to refer to the opinions of the 'Leader,' the 'Bombay Chronicle,' the 'Nation,' the 'Bengalee' and other papers. But what, I think, is better is to invite attention to a very valuable article from the pen of Sir Narayan Chandarvakar which has been published in the 'Indian Social Reformer.' The other day the Hon'ble the Home Member relied upon a letter published by an anonymous 'Indian student of constitutional law' for support of his view in introducing this Indemnity Bill. I was rather taken aback; it seemed to me to be a great fall for the Hon'ble the Home Member of the Government of India to refer to an anonymous writer for support of the policy decided upon by the Government of India. However, that is the concern of the Hon'ble the Home Member. I now present as a contrast a very valuable contribution to the discussion of this Bill, the opinion of a gentleman who has acted for years as an honoured Judge of the Bombay High Court, officiated as Chief Justice for some time and was also Chief Justice in Indore for several years. On important occasions he has laid the Government of India under an obligation by expressing well-considered opinions on constitutional questions. Writing in the 'Indian Social Reformer,'' Sir Narayan Chandarvarkar writes: 'Surprise is expressed in some quarters that Indian politicians of all shades of opinion have opposed the decision of the Government of India in introducing an Indemnity Act in the Imperial Legislative Council at the earliest convenient moment for indemnifying all the officers in respect of their acts in connection with the recent disturbances.' Then he cites the authority of Mr. Dicey in support of the principle which is enunciated in Mr. Dicey's book, called 'A leap in the dark.' My Lord, I may mention that this book—'A leap in the dark'—was published in 1893. The purport was to examine the leading principles of the Irish Home Rule Bill which was introduced in that year in Parliament. In Mr. Dicey's opinion one of the most important defects of that Bill was, that its provisions relating to the restrictions on and safeguards against the legislative power of the contemplated Irish Parliament contain no prohibition against the passing of an Act of Indemnity by that Parliament. Mr. Dicey said:—

> 'Of all the laws which a legislature can pass an Act of Indemnity is the most likely to produce injustice. It is on the face of it the legislation of illegality, the hope of it encourages acts of vigour, but it also encourages violations of law and of humanity. The tale of flogging Fitzgerald in Ireland, or the history of Governor Eyre in Jamaica, is sufficient to remind us of the deeds of lawlessness and cruelty which in a period of civil conflict may be inspired by recklessness or panic and may be pardoned by the retrospective sympathy or partizanship of a terror-stricken or vindictive Legislature.'

Further on he writes:—

> 'An ex post facto is the instrument which a legislature is most apt to use for punishing the unpopular use of legal rights. There is not a landlord, there is not a magistrate, there is not a constable in Ireland who may not tremble in fear of ex post facto legislation. There is no reason as far as the Home Rule Bill goes, why the gaoler who kept Mr. William O'Brien in prison or the warders who attempted to pull off his breeches, should not be rendered legally liable to punishment for their offences against the unwritten law of Irish sedition. No such monstrocity of legal inequity will, it may be said, be produced. I admit this, but the very object of prohibitions' (against the passing of an ex post facto law) 'is the prevention of outrageous injustice. The wise founders of the United States prohibited to Congress and to every State legislature, the passing of ex post facto legislation.'

"Now, my Lord, going further and dealing with the particular Home Rule Bill and commenting upon the absence from it of a prohibition against the passing of an Indemnifying Act, Mr. Dicey says that it was necessary that there should be a prohibition. He says:—

> 'Circumstances no doubt may arise in Ireland, as in other countries, under which the maintenance of order or the protection of life may excuse or require deviation from the strict rules of legality. But the question whether these circumstances have arisen will always be decided far more justly by the Parliament at Westminster than it can be decided by the Parliament at Dublin. Can anyone really maintain that a Parliament in which Mr. Healy, or, for that matter, Colonel Saunderson might be leader, would be as fair a tribunal as a Parliament under the guidance of Mr. Gladstone or Lord Salisbury for determining whether an officer, who, acting under the directions of the Irish Government and with a view to maintain order at Belfast or Dublin, should have put an agitator or conspirator to death without due trial had or had not done his duty.'

"Now, my Lord, as Sir Narayan Chandarvarkar says, substitute India for Ireland and substitute Simla for Dublin and so on, and it would appear that the passage applies very much to the proposal now before the Council. I submit that in view of these very weighty expressions of opinion, the Government would be wise in postponing action in this matter of an Indemnifying Bill. My Lord, it is open to the Government, it is in the power of the Government, as I said yesterday, to pass the Bill by the official majority which it commands. But I would appeal to your Excellency that your Excellency may reconsider this question and not flout public opinion which has been so widely expressed in this matter. My Lord, (it may be that the Government can carry on the administration of the country without paying heed to public opinion, but it is not the right thing to do. The right thing to do would be to act in accordance with all the principles for which the blood of Britons and of Indians was shed in the last great war, to do that which is right, to do that which truth, justice and honour demand, and in this matter truth, justice and honour demand that where so many deplorable acts have been committed, where so much illegality has been committed, where so many indignities have been offered, when there are such serious allegations regarding the action of His Majesty's officers, civil and military, when there are serious allegations regarding the attitude of the Government of India itself in the matter of the Punjab administration during the last few months, I submit, my Lord, the right thing to do would be to stay your hand and to let this matter lie over until the Committee of Inquiry has reported.) When the Committee of Inquiry submits its report, I venture respectfully to say that the right course for the Government of India would be to submit that report to His Majesty's Government and ask them, in view of the facts which may then be established, to consider which acts of the officers of His Majesty's servants, civil or military, should be indemnified, and to also consider what compensation should be offered on behalf of the public, that is the Government, to those who have suffered unjustly during these disturbances and riots. I ask, my Lord, for an attitude of greater sympathy, an attitude of greater desire to do justice between man and man, between Indian and European, between one subject and another, not in any vindictive spirit, not in any revengeful spirit, but purely with a desire that justice should be done, and that right should be done. For these reasons, I most earnestly appeal to your Excellency and to your Excellency's Government to reconsider the matter and not proceed with this Bill. If this is done, my Lord, the whole country will feel grateful; in England and in India public opinion will feel that your Excellency's Government have at the last moment even recognised the force and weight of public opinion and bowed to it. My Lord, the mightiest Government has to bow to public opinion. It so happens that in this matter the public voice is not strong, but, I submit, we must always appeal in this matter to what we find in England, and I submit with great respect that no Government in England would have dared to bring forward a Bill of this character in the circumstances which have been disclosed in this debate, and I submit, my Lord, that the Government here, though it has the power, it ought not to exercise that power, and ought to wait until the Committee of Inquiry has reported. I make this appeal in the name of those who have lost their lives, in the name of those who have lost their limbs in these recent disturbances, in the name of those who have suffered indescribable indignities, in the name of those who are undergoing imprisonment at this moment unjustly in His Majesty's jails, in the name of those women who are in mourning by the loss of their husbands, their relations, or sons, in the name of all those, my Lord, I appeal to your Excellency's Government to stay the hand of Government and to wait for the Committee of Inquiry, and then to decide what should be done. When the Committee of Inquiry has reported, the public can see what are the facts, and what is the right course to pursue in those circumstances. Every reasonable man in this Council will then offer his support to the measure that may then be proposed.

"My Lord, I submit this is what the situation demands. I hope tha your Excellency's Government will not judge this matter merely by the opinion of a few members who have the privilege of sitting in this Council. I hope in deciding this matter, your Excellency will have referred to the vast multitude of Indian opinion outside this Council and also to the opinion in England If you decide having regard to that opinion, I have no doubt that you Excellency will come to only one conclusion, and that is, to postpone th introduction of this Bill till the Committee of Inquiry have reported."

The Hon'ble Mr. J. P. Thompson:—"With your Excellency' permission, I should like to make a few remarks on the amazing speech, t the last quarter of which we have just been privileged to listen. I do no propose to touch on the legal questions, or questions of constitutional law whic have been raised by the Pandit. They will, no doubt be dealt with by th Legal Member, if he thinks there is anything in them that merits a reply. Nor do I propose to deal with the details of the administration of martial la by military officers; that is a matter for one of my military colleagues t deal with. Nor again shall I touch on the general questions of the justification for the introduction of martial law, the alleged provocative action of th Punjab Government in deporting Kitchlew and Satyapal and excluding Mr. Gandhi from the Punjab, or such other matters of a general nature. I propose to confine myself to the specific allegations which have been made by the Pandit of misconduct and mal-administration on the part of civil officers who were responsible for the administration of justice during the period of martial law. Before I start with the allegations made by the Hon'ble Pandit, there were two remarks which fell from the speaker who preceded him which, I think, require a passing notice. The first point was the statement made by Mr. Chanda that on the 11th of April orders were issued by the Punjab Government prohibiting the publication of any accounts in the newspapers. The order that was passed, my Lord, was an order requiring any newspaper, whether English or Indian, to submit any accounts which it proposed to publish of the events which had taken place for precensorship before publication. It was an order which, as I have said, applied both to the English and the Indian press, and there was nothing whatever to prevent any newspaper which desired honestly, and for the public good, to publish true information from publishing it.

"The second point in Mr. Chanda's speech on which I wish to make an observation is, his allegation that it was out of revenge for the fraternisation between the Hindus and Muhammadans at the festival of Ram Naumi on the 9th of April that Sir Michael O'Dwyer excluded Mr. Gandhi. Now, my Lord, I have the greatest admiration for Sir Michael O'Dwyer, but I do not think that any one here would claim for him that he was a prophet. The fraternisation at the Ram Naumi took place on the 9th of April; the orders for the exclusion of Mr. Gandhi were passed, so far as I remember, some 48 hours before that fraternisation took place.

"I now come, my Lord, to the allegations which have been made by the Hon'ble Pandit. I am afraid my remarks must of necessity take rather a discursive form, but I do not see that I can deal with the allegations which have been made in any better form than by taking them in the order in which the Hon'ble Member has made them, and I think in all the cases with which I shall deal I shall be able to show the Council that the story which has been given by the Pandit is a distortion or an exaggeration, or a misunderstanding of the facts. The first case he mentioned was that of the exclusion of a gentleman from the Punjab who was so well-known that the Pandit could not even give us his correct name; he called him Mr. Hume . . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Mr. C. F. Andrews."

The Hon'ble Mr. J. P. Thompson :—" His real name was Mr. C. F. Andrews, but the Pandit called him Mr. Hume. Now, my Lord, the facts in regard to the exclusion of Mr. Andrews are these. On the 5th of May the Punjab Government received a telegram from the editor of the 'Independent' newspaper at Allahabad saying that he, along with the editors of the 'Bengalee', 'New India,' the 'Amrita Bazar Patrika,' the 'Hindu' and the 'Leader' proposed to depute Mr. Andrews to the Punjab with a view to report to the Indian press on the condition of affairs in the Province with special reference to the administration of martial law. Now, my Lord, at the time when that request was made, two of the papers on whose behalf it was made had been excluded from the Province—one more of them has been excluded since—and almost all of them have distinguished themselves by the bitterness of their attacks on the Punjab Administration. Now, my Lord, I put it to the Council, if these papers wished to obtain the good offices of the Punjab Government with the military authorities in order to enable Mr. Andrews to enter the martial law area, was this quite the most tactful way of doing it ? Could the Punjab Government be expected to use their good offices on behalf of newspapers whose bitter criticism, whose unfair criticism of what had been done had earned for them exclusion from the Province ? I do not think there is a single Member here, my Lord, who will answer that question in the affirmative.

"I now pass on to the Pandit's allegations about the Jallewalian Bagh. I do not wish to dwell on this extremely painful incident, but I merely wish to offer one or two remarks in regard to the number of casualties. The Hon'ble Member has hinted that more than a thousand persons were killed there. He told us yesterday that his latest information was that 530 had been traced. Now, my Lord, I daresay we shall never know the exact number of persons who met their deaths in that garden But what the Punjab Government have done is this. We made a proclamation in Amritsar and in the surrounding villages inviting all persons who had any information in regard to the names of those who had met their deaths there to come forward and give that information to Government. We knew that private organisations were at work collecting information on the same subject. We gave instructions to the local authorities that they were to see that this proclamation was brought to the notice of those persons so that they might have no excuse for not coming forward and giving us any information that they possessed. I make no doubt, my Lord, that that proclamation also came to the notice of the Pandit. Our enquiries show that the total was 291, and I claim that any information which asks us to accept figures beyond this must be received with the gravest suspicion.

" I now come, my Lord, to the case of the Badshahi Masjid. In this case an Inspector of the C.I.D was assaulted in the Badshahi Masjid in Lahore on the 12th April.

The facts as given in the judgment are as follows :—

> 'On that day,'—on the 12th of April,—'a meeting with political objects was held in the Badshahi Mosque, Lahore, which was to be addressed by leading Hindus. Many Hindus were present and many people armed with sticks. Maulvi Abdul Hai, having recognised Chaudhri Ali Gauhar, C.I.D. Inspector, who was present in plain clothes, made an inflammatory speech against the C.I.D. in general saying that no progress with their objects was possible until the C.I.D. were eliminated. He pointed out Ali Gauhar as an object of immediate attack and the others then set upon Ali Gauhar who was beaten with sticks on the body. His assailants had him at their mercy but did not kill him.'

"Now, what is the story to which the Hon'ble Member gives the weight of his authority, in regard to the origin of that attack. He tells us that that Inspector had drawn on himself the resentment of the crowd by certain remarks that he had made. I have before me, my Lord, the record of that case. I have been through the whole of the evidence from start to finish, and there is not a suggestion anywhere, neither in the statements of the witnesses for the prosecution nor in the statements of the witnesses for the defence; nor in the statements made by the accused themselves; nor is there any hint in the cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution, of this story which the Hon'ble Member has told us.

"Now, my Lord, I do not wish to use hard words about the Pandit, but I put it to the Council that the suggestion that he has made is not one which comes within the limits of fair controversy, stretch them how far you will. In this Council, my Lord, we are all supposed to be Hon'ble Members. It is a title that is given to us on account of the position we occupy, and not with regard to the moral character of Members who occupy that position. But I do claim, my Lord, that that title justifies the public in expecting from Members who speak in this Council a standard of honour and fair dealing, straight dealing, which, I think, the Pandit has failed to reach in the present instance . . . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" I am sorry for that."

The Hon'ble Mr. J. P. Thompson :—" The next allegation with which I will deal is, one to the effect that the electric and water supply of the whole city of Amritsar, exclusive of the Civil Lines, was cut off for about five days, about the 12th of April last, and that a large number of wells in the city of Amritsar had been closed under recent orders when Mr. King was Deputy Commissioner there. I understand that six wells were so closed. As regards the stoppage of the supply of electricity, on the 10th of April the mob attacked the power house and stopped the electric light plant working. On the 11th they prevented repairs being done and power was cut off that evening by order of the General Officer Commanding and remained cut off until the 19th. As regards the water supply, I am informed that on the night of the 10th the water supply was cut off by the Municipal Engineer, as there was a rumour in the city that the supply had been poisoned, though who published that rumour I cannot say, but it was found necessary to shut off the supply again on the following day, and it remained shut off until the 14th by order of the General Officer Commanding.

"The next incident that the Hon'ble Member dealt with was another Amritsar incident. He told us that several very respectable people, under-trial prisoners, including bankers, lawyers, doctors and so on—the class of people, in brief, who always 'rot' when sent to jail—were handcuffed in pairs and confined for several days in the racket court at Amritsar where they were subjected to several kinds of inconvenience. Temporary arrangements were made for the confinement of prisoners in the racket court in Amritsar; they were provided as soon as possible with shelter, but they were not handcuffed, so I am informed, for more than two or three days. And the picture which the Hon'ble Member has drawn of the inconveniences to which they were put is very largely exaggerated. I would remind the Council that at the same time at which these honourable gentlemen were confined in the racket court English women and children were also confined in the Fort because of the violence of the people outside. They remained there some days deprived of all the comforts and conveniences that they had in their own houses, and in some cases without even the decencies of ordinary life. Is this Council going to condemn the temporary arrangements which were made for these respectable gentlemen of Amritsar, when it finds that English women and children were subjected to not dissimilar inconveniences within a few yards of the place where these people were confined?

"I now come on, my Lord, to the case of Gujranwala. The Hon'ble Member told us that on the 15th of April last Colonel O'Brien, Deputy Commissioner of Gujranwala, with a strong body of police and soldiers and an armoured car marched round the city arresting people right and left; that the persons so arrested were chained together and marched to the city two and two, headed by a Hindu and Muhammadan, with a view to ridiculing Hindu-Muhammadan unity, and that, 'in the words of Colonel O'Brien,' two Municipal Commissioners marched in front of the procession so formed and, pointing to the aeroplanes hovering overhead, kept on shouting to the people to make way for the prisoners; and that, after having been paraded through the principal streets of the town, the prisoners were taken to the railway station and put into an open truck guarded by a number of European soldiers with fixed bayonets, and so on. Let me read to the Council a description which is based on information supplied by Colonel O'Brien himself to explain what it was that happened. I should tell the Council that the outbreak in Gujranwala in which such a vast amount of damage was done to Government property took place on the 14th. On the morning of the 15th, Colonel O'Brien felt himself in a position to make arrests. He did not think it safe to lodge the prisoners in the local jail. In order to make certain that there would be no trouble, he asked by telephone that an aeroplane and a special train should come out in the afternoon. It was essential that no warning should be given to those who were to be arrested. He laid his plans accordingly. A list was prepared and a route arranged. He then started with the police to make arrests, as well as a party of British soldiers to prevent resistance. There was no armoured car. Pleaders, barristers, and others believed to be concerned in the outrages were arrested and handcuffed. As the party pursued its route, a Muhammadan and a Hindu, both members of the Municipal Committee, went well in front to warn the people against resistance. There was no intention of ridiculing Hindu-Muhammadan unity, and, if a Hindu was linked with a Muhammadan, it was by accident and not by design. The party arrived at the station within a quarter of an hour of the time fixed to find that the only accommodation for the escort and the prisoners was an open truck. It was nearly 5 o'clock, the journey to Lahore would take two hours, and there was no time to be lost. It is possible that all concerned may have been put to some inconvenience. It is not alleged that there was anything more than this, and the essential thing was to get the prisoners into Lahore as soon as possible.

"The Hon'ble Member's statement went on to deal with what happened at Shekhupura, where, he said, Colonel O'Brien had committed very much the same atrocities. The arrests at Shekhupura were made with equal celerity as he had to visit on the same day Chuharkhana, Moman, Dhaban Singh and Sangla, at all of which places outrages had occurred. The Shekhupura prisoners were taken to Lahore by an armoured train which Colonel O'Brien found at Chichoki Mallian.

"The next atrocities to which I turn were those which were committed at Kasur. Kasur is a small place about 35 miles from Lahore where two British warrant officers were killed on the 12th. I cannot lay my hands at this moment on the statement which was made by the Hon'ble Member in regard to the outrages on respectable persons at Kasur; but it related, I remember, to two pleaders, Ghulam Mohiyuddin and Abdul Kadir; it was stated, if I remember aright—the Hon'ble Member will correct me if I am wrong—that these two persons were confined for a long period, many weeks, in a lock-up at the station. The facts as given by the Sub-divisional officer are as follows:—

'Ghulam Muhiyuddin and Abdul Kadir were arrested and were confined in the police station; and once or twice they were detained by the military in the temporary lock-up near the station when brought from the police station with other prisoners for evidence or identification. They were released after a few days at my request in my presence by the officer commanding when I had decided that the evidence as to their being rioters was not true.'

"The other Kasur case to which the Hon'ble Member referred was the case of certain boys who were said to have been flogged there. The story is true. Six boys, three of them belonging to the Municipal Board High School and three belonging to the Islamia School, were caned at Kasur. The headmaster of the Municipal Board High School had invoked military assistance to deal with the boys who had acted very insubordinately and joined hands with the pupils of the Islamia School. The officer commanding directed the headmaster to choose the worst offenders and sent them up for punishment. In addition, two school-boys sent by the commission for summary trial were caned—three strokes each—by the martial law officer after trial.

"The next case to which the Hon'ble Member referred was that of Mr. Manohar Lal, a distinguished graduate of Cambridge University and a barrister-at-law. He was one of the trustees of the 'Tribune' as the Pandit told us, and the question had been raised as to whether, when the editor of the 'Tribune' was being prosecuted, it would be possible to prosecute the trustees too, or at any rate the resident trustee who happened to be in Lahore at the time and was believed to have taken considerable interest in the management of the paper. It is true that Mr. Manohar Lal was arrested and that he remained in confinement for the space of about a month. It is not true, as the Hon'ble Member stated, that his family were kept out of his house for a week; his house naturally was locked up after his arrest as it might have been necessary to make a search, but his family were allowed to return and did return, I understand, the very next day.

"The Hon'ble Pandit then went on to tell us that hardship was inflicted on respectable persons in connection with the custody of martial law notices. Now, my Lord, that is a matter primarily which concerns my Hon'ble friend on my left. But it is a matter of such vital importance to the civil population that the meaning of these punishments which were inflicted in regard to martial law notices and the procedure that was adopted in order to safeguard them should be properly understood, that I make no apology for making a few remarks to the Council on the subject. Martial law notices are a most important part of the machinery of martial law. If you create new offences you must advertise them; otherwise well-meaning people have not a fair chance. The man who tears down a martial law notice may be the cause of an honest man being shot. When such notices were first put up, it was found that they were torn down and defaced. Colonel Johnson interviewed the leaders of the people and they promised to arrange for the publication of the orders in the different quarters of the city. They failed to fulfil their promise. Colonel Johnson accordingly decided to impose on selected owners of property the duty of protecting them. It is true that a number of persons connected with public movements or interested in persons who had been arrested were selected because they were prima facie the persons in whose custody the notices would be safest. My Lord, I can say with regard to this policy that its success was ample justification for any hardships that might have been inflicted. After this class of property owner had been made responsible for the safe custody of the notices, I believe hardly any were torn down or defaced.

"The Hon'ble Member then went on to state that in some cases tried by martial law officers, especially towards the close of the martial law period, the accused were convicted without the whole of the defence evidence being heard, and even that witnesses who were present in Court or attended the Court for that purpose were not heard. He gave the case of two pleaders, Lala Gurdasram and Lala Shivaram, of Hafizabad in the district of Gujranwala. Well, my Lord, I have not had time to make inquiries from each Deputy Commissioner as to what happened in his district, but I have made inquiries from the district in which this particular case occurred, and the answer I have received is as follows:—

'It is not the fact that martial law courts refused to hear witnesses for the defence who were present in court or attended the court for that purpose. In the case mentioned, as in some others, the court exercised its discretion in not summoning certain witnesses named by the accused when such witnesses lived in distant places and the accused could allege no real reason for producing them as witnesses and it appeared they were named as such merely for purposes of vexation and delay.'

"From Gujrunwala, the Hon'ble Member went to Lyallpur and he stated that there was a man named Ram Lok at Lyallpur, son of one Daulat Ram who was arrested on the 25th April, was detained in police custody for over three weeks and then released for want of evidence; that after his release his father appeared as a defence witness for one Ram Ditta and was asked to become approver but refused to do so; that on this his son Ram Lok was re-arrested on the following day for the offence for which he had been arrested and released before. He then went on to say that the trial was unduly expedited at the end owing to the approaching termination of martial law. Now, my Lord, Ram Lok was not arrested on the 25th April, he was arrested on the 28th May. He was not detained in custody for three weeks; he was convicted on the 5th of June. His arrest had nothing whatever to do with the evidence given by his father on behalf of Ram Ditta and indeed, the police at the time, I am assured, did not know what evidence his father had been giving in the case against Ram Ditta. Finally, my Lord, the accused pleaded guilty.

"The Hon'ble Member then went on to speak of men who had been sentenced to long terms of imprisonment without any evidence having been recorded or any judgment having been written. Well, I can quite understand the Hon'ble Member feeling a little bit disoriented when he deals with cases in which there are not full records. Full records are what he has been accustomed to, and it gives him something of a shock to find that a man has been sent to jail on a scanty record. I need hardly perhaps tell him that a scanty record does not mean scanty evidence; but it may be news to him to know that no court martial ever gives any reasons for its findings, and the procedure of these courts was much more that of courts martial than of the ordinary courts of law. The particular cases which the Hon'ble Member has selected are not very fortunate ones. He has taken the case of a man named Fazla, tongawala, who, he says, was sentenced to transportation for life for waging war against the King, without any evidence being recorded.

"I have seen the record and the Judge's notes. Two sides of foolscap are covered with the notes . . . .

(At this point the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya got up.)

The President :—"Order, order. The Hon'ble Member must not interrupt. He has had his say and Mr. Thompson now has the ear of the house."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"The Hon'ble Member is wrong. I did not refer to the case of Fazla."

The Hon'ble Mr. J. P. Thompson :—"The record is in the possession of Sir William Vincent. I am certain of the facts I have stated.

"The other case the Hon'ble Member mentioned was that of Hari Ram and Hans Raj. These two men were prosecuted for being in possession of Amritsar loot. It is true that in this case no evidence was recorded, but it is not true that there was no judgment. There was a judgment, which sets out the facts of the case and the reasons for the finding.

"Then the Hon'ble Member passed on to a consideration of what is known as the salaaming order at Lyallpur. The justification for this order is not really a matter for me, but I happen to have the record of the case he referred to; so I think perhaps I am justified in making a few remarks about it. I do not wish to justify, it is no part of my business to justify, the infliction of sentences of flogging for the non-salaaming of British officers. But in the particular case which the Hon'ble Member mentioned, the man who was convicted had previously been warned that he was committing a breach of martial law in not salaaming British officers and the offence for which he was punished was his second offence.

"My Lord, the Hon'ble Member read out to the Council the judgment of Colonel O'Brien in the Ramnagar case, in which the King was burned in effigy. This case has engaged the attention of the Punjab Government. We made some further inquiries with a view to ascertaining whether the facts were as found. As the Council will gather from what the Hon'ble Member has said, the case is one which has attracted a certain amount of attention. The case was examined by two officers independently of Colonel O'Brien, and both reported, after going through the case, that there was no ground for distrusting the conclusions arrived at by the officer who had tried the case. The Hon'ble Member tells us that some of the accused were not arrested till the 28th May. He then said that the people were of such position that it was impossible for them to have committed the offences that were alleged against them. My Lord, we have adduced against the reasoned judgment of an officer who had heard the evidence, an officer of long experience, who must, I think, have been in charge of one district or other in the Punjab for nearly twenty years, we have adduced a misstatement and an opinion. I claim that that is not sufficient to justify Government in remitting the punishment of these men.

"The last cases with which the Hon'ble Pandit referred were certain cases tried by Mr. Hoyle. He said that the particulars in the judgments were scanty. The records I hold in my hand (shown to Council). This is the record of one case, 5 pages of evidence written in a small hand, and this is the record of the other case, 8 pages of evidence. The cases tried by Mr. Hoyle were, as a general rule, tried with great care, and I should not be afraid to show the records to the most hostile critic.

"That concludes the examination of the detailed allegations of the Hon'ble Pandit. I trust I have succeeded in convincing the Council that the allegations made by the Pandit show a degree of credulity, not to say gullibility, lack of proportion and a power of closing his eyes to everything that can possibly be said on the other side, that justify me in saying that it is difficult any longer to have any confidence in his power to appreciate any political situation, or his willingness to admit that there is anything whatever to be said in favour of those who are unfortunate enough to differ from him. As regards the Hon'ble Pandit's credulity, I should like to tell the Council a story. The Pandit has recently been paying a number of visits to Amritsar, in the course of which he has been making those inquiries the valuable results of which he has indicated to the Council in his speech. During the course of one of these visits he paid a visit to the Jallianwala Bagh. After his visit there he reported to the Municipal Committee that there were corpses down the well and that they constituted a grave danger to the health of the locality. On examination it was found that he had mistaken an earthen pot for the head of the corpse and a bundle of cloth that had been looted for the body . . . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"There was one corpse, several of us saw it."

The Hon'ble Mr. J. P. Thompson:—"I adhere to my statement of fact. If the Hon'ble Member believed in his own story, I am sure he would have found one little minute during the 4½ hours he addressed the Council to bring in that picturesque touch. This is an example of the Hon'ble Pandit's credulity. He tells us that he had the evidence of two of his senses, his eyes and his nose, as regards the presence of the corpse. I ask the Council whether we are to take statements which he has only on hearsay and to rate them at any higher value than the evidence of his own senses. I have mentioned this story because, I think, it is important for the Council to realise what a terrible enemy we have had to contend against in the rumours spread about the country during the past troublous months. I think it will help the Council to correlate the intelligence and mentality of the Hon'ble Pandit with that of the lower orders of the people among whom these rumours find credence and have currency. I should like to give the Council some examples of these rumours, because, I believe it is only in this way that it will understand what an unrivalled field the agitator in this country has if he chooses to set about sowing false rumours in the countryside. The rumours in regard to the Rowlatt Act are known to everybody here and I need not do more than refer to them; such rumours as that no one should be allowed to possess more than 10 bighas of land, that 50 per cent. of the produce was to be taken as Government dues, that no marriages were to be allowed until the parties had been examined by a Government medical officer and so on. I do not wish to say anything more about those rumours, nor do I wish to deal with those rumours which dealt with things which are not inherently impossible. For instance, there was a rumour going about which, I believe, found wide credence that at one period of the disturbances a personal attack was made on Sir Michael O'Dwyer, and his Private Secretary drew out his revolver and shot not his assailant, but the Hon'ble Mian Muhammad Shafi. No, it is another kind of rumour to which I want to draw the attention of the Council, they illustrate better the difficulties of the situation with which we have to deal, rumours which savour of magic or faerie. We had stories that the Germans had signed the peace with an ink which would fade and that there would soon be no evidence that the treaty had been signed at all. We had stories that Mr. Gandhi was distributing magic emblems in the shape of miniature swords which would inspire the holders with an undying hatred against the British Government. We had stories that the Amir during the recent hostilities had called to his aid a regiment of paladins from Samarkand, against whom no mere human force could stand. But perhaps the most extraordinary of all rumours which got about was a rumour which gained wide credence in the district of Muzaffargarh. It is a district which lies along the Indus in the extreme south-west of the province. It is inhabited mainly by Mahommedans. A rumour got about that on the night of the Shab-i-barat all those who had died in the influenza epidemic at the last autumn would rise from their graves. The Shab-i-barat is the night on which Mahommedans believe that God records the actions which will be performed by all human beings in the coming year, and the names of all those who are to die or to be born. Pious Moslems keep awake all night in the hope of catching a glimpse of the glory of the Almighty. The rumour, as I said, spread and with it went an order to the women of the district that they should be ready that night in the graveyards with clothes for the dead, against their expected resurrection. The rumour was contradicted before the night arrived, but I believe that there were many poor women who watched by the graves that night, in the hope that at midnight the graves would open and their lost ones would rise again.

"I have nothing more to say, my Lord. I do not propose, as I told the Council, to deal with the question of the causes of the recent discontents. But there is one statement which I do not feel I can let pass unchallenged. The Hon'ble Mr. Chanda and the Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya have both told us that the Satyagraha movement was innocent in connection with these disturbances. My Lord, I should like to tell the Council a story. It came to my notice a few days ago in connection with an appeal for mercy for an unfortunate man who had been condemned to death. There were in Lahore two brothers, Indian Christians. They were both in service and they lived with their families in the same compound. The master of one of them went to Bombay and took his servant with him, and he went away leaving his wife and two little children, aged six and three, in charge of his brother. While he was away his wife died. His brother sent word to him to return. He was very poor and so borrowed a few rupees for the funeral in the absence of his brother. A few days later his brother returned. When he returned, it was the days of the hartal in Lahore and the shops were all closed. He found both of his children ill; it was partly illness and partly starvation. Milk was what he wanted for them and milk he could not get. All day long he tried to obtain it, but without success. The shops were shut and none would sell. In the evening he returned in despair. Late at night his brother who had been out on the same errand like him returned with empty hands, and when he opened the door of the hut where the children slept, he found there two little bodies lying on the bed with their throats cut. At whose door, my Lord, will those two lives be laid?"

12-39 P.M. The Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan:—"My Lord, a telegram has just been received, and I believe two or three pleaders sitting together have drafted it in the name of the whole of the Punjab to delay this Bill. Of course, all the other subjects of His Majesty, who form about 99 per cent, have also to be kept in view. I had agreed, some of the members had agreed, if Government did not bring forward this Bill, to remain silent; but now that the Bill is before the Council, I wish to say what I originally wanted to.

"While welcoming the Bill which is a very ordinary measure and always follows disturbances and martial law, I am of opinion that it has come rather late, and now that it has come it should be passed at once. It is a good thing that hitherto no one has sued any of those subordinates who acted under orders of their superiors and who in turn acted with the best of intentions to speedily quell a fire, the flames of which would have spread to the rural population from which the Army is recruited and that, plus the Frontier troubles at a very critical time of the year, may have proved disastrous for a while. I hope that the loyal soldiers and other officials will not be left a minute more without the protection of this most urgent Bill and that it will be passed into law.

"Before the Bill was introduced we had many consultations, and the main objections to the Bill were that it would prejudice the Committee of Inquiry and hamper its work and that the unwarranted acts of various individuals and officers would go unpunished. It looks as if the Government of India had deputed a spy with us because they have framed the Bill in such a way that they have met all the possible objections which one could raise. This could be seen from the Statement of Objects and Reasons where it is clearly pointed out that 'It gives protection only to acts done in good faith and in a reasonable belief that they were necessary,' etc. It continues further:—'It thus leaves open the question of fact in any given case to be considered by the intended Committee of Inquiry, and does nothing to prejudice the Committee's findings or the action which Government may take upon its report.'

"Now coming to the preamble of the Bill in which it is said:—'It has been necessary for the purpose of restoring order to resort to martial law.' I would like to offer certain observations to show the state of various places in the province where martial law was necessary.

"Apart from the section which was responsible for the disturbances the general population deplored it and positively knew that this was all due to an organised conspiracy, and it will not be out of place to quote a portion of the address presented by the Muhammadan community of the Punjab on the eve of Sir Michael's departure. This community form the majority of the population. On that occasion representatives of nearly all the districts of the Punjab were present. It runs as follows :—

> 'Although towards the conclusion of your Honour's brilliant régime the enemies of law and order as a result of an organised conspiracy which may be the outcome of a foreign influence succeeded in deluding a section of the people into riots and disturbances, yet it is a standing tribute to your Honour's far-sighted statesmanship and firmness that the situation was soon got well in hand and by using the speedy and effective method of martial law peaceful life is once more possible for the law-abiding citizens of our chief towns.'

"Later on when all the spiritual leaders met to condemn the action of the Amir of Afghanistan in declaring war against India and thus naturally against His Majesty's Muhammadan subjects and to say farewell to Sir Michael they said :—

> 'We condemn the actions of those enemies of the country whose conspiracy has brought about disturbances in the country.'

"So from this it will be seen that the general public apart from evil-doers recognised that there was a conspiracy at the bottom of all these affairs.

"The Hon'ble the Home Member held an inquiry into the doings of the Gadhr Party, i.e., those who wanted to bring about mutiny in the beginning of the war and what were their methods ? They intended to cut the telegraph wires, break the railway lines, derail the trains and plunder the public, etc. What did the recent conspirators do ? They took exactly the same line and the whole thing was very cleverly managed. Meetings were convened in the mosques to unite Muhammadans. It was known that the Muhammadans had strained feelings about the Turkish affairs, and if their mosques were bombed or fired upon, it would infuriate them. Such meetings were held in Delhi, Lahore and various other places. The same thing was planned in Amritsar with regard to the Sikhs in which they succeeded to a good extent and spread all sorts of rumours about the Durbar Sahib, the Golden Temple. But it was owing to the loyalty and far-sightedness of the Sikh nation that their designs were frustrated. The similarity of action which I explained the other day in various centres at one and the same time illustrates that the origin was the same. The time of a great fair chosen to spread the propaganda with much ease was cleverly fixed where people from all the rural parts of the country assemble so that they may carry it with them to the villages. The columns of the extremist newspapers were engaged for propaganda and though we may now satisfy ourselves that the editors of some such papers were punished they had done their work.

"On the 5th of April last every thing was so ripe that all sane thinkers knew the trouble had arrived. Though this was also known to the authorities and though some arrangements of police and troops were made as a safeguard, I am sorry to say the authorities were yet doing things in a half-hearted manner. Knowing that there would be trouble, I offered my services with my men and sowars to help the Police which were accepted, and from that time onward I continued to work throughout the disturbances helping the Police, Publicity Board and the military authorities.

"From this it will be clear that everyone knew perfectly well the impending danger. Although the Lahore authorities prohibited the forming of any procession next day, the 6th of April, all such orders were disregarded and though the facts were reported and later on they saw it for themselves, they were weak in not enforcing their orders. This weakness so encouraged the mob that from that date onward no man with a title or one considered to be of the Government party could appear among the public. The war cries of 'Hindoo Mussalman ki Jai' meant that both the communities had joined in a common cause by eating and drinking together. The excitement of the public went on increasing while the prestige of Government went on decreasing. When on the 10th things reached their climax, all this time the Punjab Government was hesitating and minimising the gravity of the situation.

"As the martial classes of the Punjab were about to give a farewell party to the Lieutenant-Governor, and as most of the leading men including the members of the Provincial Council were present, a deputation waited upon a high official to impress the delicacy of the situation just before disturbances had broken out. When the disturbances had broken out on the 10th, the Punjab Government summoned all the representatives of Lahore, as well as those of the other parts of the Province, to discuss the situation, and out of thirty or forty members representing all sections and classes, except two, were all unanimous in advising the Government to be firm and take strong and immediate action so that the disturbances would not spread to the rural areas. But I am sorry to say that the Punjab Government did not follow the advice and still hesitated to take any proper action. This was interpreted by the people as inability of the Government to do anything, and disturbances at various places like Gujranwala, Kasur, etc., were the result. Had martial law been introduced earlier it would have saved many lives and disastrous results. I have dealt with this at some length to show the state of affairs. Most of the students who were approached by some of their teachers were wearing the black badges of martyrs and did not attend the schools and colleges. The Railway employees had also been approached and had struck work. Apart from the various strikes a Danda Battalion with heavy clubs was in charge of Lahore city who terrorized all the peace-loving people who wanted to assume normal conditions. Free food was supplied to all these and other evildoers while the rest of the population could not get sufficient to eat, many having reached the point of starvation. The Council will have heard the sad story which Mr. Thompson has just related of those children who could not get food.

"A regular agency of exaggerated rumours against the Government was opened. The emissaries reached Peshawar and then further on to Kabul. This will prove, I hope, the necessity of the preamble of this Bill.

"It will be admitted on all hands that acts committed by the soldiers under orders of their superiors are bona fide. But if it may be considered that the higher officials are to be blamed for harshness I have already stated the case of some at Lahore for so delaying action.

"In Gujranwala, the rebels the whole day burnt building after building belonging to the Government as well as the records, church and station, and the authorities took no action till evening, when some aeroplanes turned up. If the night had fallen before their arrival none can foretell what would have happened during that time.

"The excuse that the local authorities have put forward at Gujranwala that they did not fire and allowed everything to be set on fire all the day long was that young children were put forward as a shield, and had they fired upon the mob the children would have been killed. But this was no novelty as the same thing was tried at Malakwal and even at Amritsar, which fact you would have heard and seen when a photo was shown in a debate the other day. The law clearly provides in section 106 I. P. C. for it.

"Thus the authorities cannot hold it as a good excuse. It is said one of the bombs was thrown intentionally on a Boarding House at Gujranwala, and the officer in the machine is accused for it It will not be out of place if I say this from my experience that bombing by aeroplanes is not always very accurate and generally does not hit the target one wants to. At an Arab village we had a camp scattered in about a mile square. A famous Turk came to bomb us in an up-to-date German machine. In all his attempts he missed the whole camp and hit a mule at a good distance away from the camp.

"In many other places all the Government stacks of fodder were being burnt and all the grass preserves were used as common property. Even His Majesty's effigies were made and burnt.

"It was not only in Gujranwala that this was done, but I know of certain cases in Lahore where students and a few others did this. The evidence was not sufficient to prosecute, but it is a fact that this was done. All attempts were made to approach soldiers to detract them from their allegiance, but thanks to God, owing to their staunch devotion and loyalty as well as their knowledge of the strength of the British Arms, all attempts were frustrated on which mostly the conspirators depended and all their calculations went wrong as those of the Kaiser William, and law and order was restored. All of those who were trying to quell disturbances and at the same time had to meet the Frontier troubles, faced a critical situation, and no one for a moment could predict that all this dark cloud and storm would pass away in such a short time. So provision had to be made for all eventualities.

"If all this does not show that it was a conspiracy of waging war against the Crown and the necessity of martial law, no one can understand what more was needed.

"My Lord, when all are accusing the Punjab Government for hasty steps, we who know the facts complain of their over-cautiousness which has been mostly the cause of some of the mufassil disturbances and maintaining martial law for such a long time. Had martial law been introduced three days earlier it would not have been necessary to continue it more than a week or two, and there would have been no necessity of constituting courts under the law nor would so many people have gone to jails.

"My Lord, I have patiently heard my friend the Hon'ble Pandit Sahib and I not only praise his endurance but congratulate him on his masterly speech in defence of those accused in the recent disturbances. It is simply natural that in so doing he should advocate their cause and theirs only. But this is only one side of the shield. The accused that he has pleaded for are a fraction of a class which in itself is a fraction of the population of our province. The dumb masses of the rural population were never counted an asset in politics, but now they have become such so as to be reckoned. The acts of some of these criminals brought restrictions on the free movements of this overwhelming peace-loving population and the inconvenience that they had to undergo for the acts of the above-mentioned few made them come out of their general silence. Their feelings could be only known to those who live among them and know their language. In the village Daras as well as in trains abuses were levelled on the class which brought about the troubles in the Province, through which they were suffering so much. But as they do not possess an organ their prepondering voice is lost.

"Though a case has been made out minimising the gravity of the situation and certain challenges have been thrown out, I accept some. It has been said in the debate by my Hon'ble friend who sits on my left that the Government Communiqué said everything was quiet at Lahore.

"The feelings in Lahore, though were at the highest which could be ascertained from many acts, had to be minimised when a Communiqué for the general public in the Punjab was prepared. Any intimation of gravity to the public would have brought about disastrous results in the rural masses.

"There was a question of joint press telegram not coinciding with the Government Communiqué. The reason was that one of the criminals was responsible for so wrongly reporting, who has been brought to book and is now in jail.

"I would now like to state some questions of fact not in a form of speech but taking them one by one.

(1) It is said that of the cases where the Indemnity Act came into operation in England there were sixty thousand people who demonstrated against the Law. I can safely say that the mob in Lahore was well over a lakh and perhaps even two.

(2) It has been discussed that one of the acts to justify martial law was in the case where jail birds were set free. This was being attempted in Gujranwala that evening, if the aeroplanes would not have arrived.

(3) There is no denial about the fact that when the Gadhr Party started its operations there were widespread disturbances in the rural places like Jhang and Muzaffargarh, etc., and if not nipped in the bud by the Punjab Government, things might have resumed exactly the previous course even this time.

"Jhang and Muzaffargarh disturbances were in rural parts and it was possible that such could occur in that connection all over the country.

"On the 6th, many of the students in defiance of law went to the River Ravi and formed a procession which was strictly prohibited by the Government authorities. When I first met them, as I had volunteered to do, there was no policeman in uniform so as to stop them. Their demeanour in forcing the shops to be closed and keep away people from their business was such that it was essential that they should be forbidden to take part in politics, and I hope the authorities responsible will be called on for not exercising better control.

"During this time when there was a grave danger that the rural population might be affected I was deputed to go to my district for two days. I found that a campaign of false statements was being carried out in trains as well as in the mufassil. Some of these were that Lahore and Amritsar were lost to the Government, and that they were rapidly losing other places, the army was out of hand and the Europeans were being killed wholesale. The rumour was that all the communications were being cut and parties had started for doing so in each district. In my district I had to raise within a day three hundred horsemen to look after a long Railway line and the authorities had to raise some more men to guard various other portions of the Railway line.

"A reserve had to be kept in hand at the Headquarters to rapidly move to any site of disturbances. It was owing to these precautions that nothing happened there and the same sort of measures had to be taken in nearly all the districts.

"It has been said that Jai of King Emperor was also repeated by the mob. I am sorry to say that it was not the word 'Jai' but it was 'Hai, Hai.'

"From Delhi came letters and men to press on the shopkeepers to suspend business. Some of those who used to buy cloth from the big firms and were given latitude to pay money after it was sold, the demand came that if they would not suspend business they would be required to pay money immediately. If this was done their bankruptcy was sure and certain. Thus they were forced into the arena.

"Some poor men who were in debt to these people had also to join them.

"Then it is said that nothing serious happened in Lahore. The reason is that later on ample arrangements were made; the army was on the spot and the evil-doers were absolutely helpless to be able to do anything. As long as they were not checked some heads were being split in the language of my Hon'ble friend on my left.

"The Western Punjab next to the Frontier was so frightened by the disturbances in the east and declaration of war in the west that they all collected to form organizations to save themselves.

"I only put forward these few remarks at the end to throw some light on the real state of things, and with these remarks I support the Bill."

12 P.M. The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi:—"My Lord, I have read in the newspapers and in pamphlets and have heard many things, and received also telegrams about the disturbances of the Punjab, and I quite realise the gravity of the situation in the Punjab that necessitated the adoption of special measures. I would not be true to the traditions of my house, if I were not to view with the profoundest regret and abhorrence the loss of European lives and the other outrages committed by the mob. But I venture to doubt whether it would be expedient now to pass this measure, in view of the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry, and also in view of the strong expressions of opinion even on the part of the sober and moderate section of the public and the Press in India urging its postponement.

"My humble opinion is that the inquiry should be expedited as much as possible, and the Bill suspended for the time being."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—"My Lord, I rise with no wish to prolong this discussion, but rather in the hope that what I have to say may possibly persuade members that there is very little use prolonging it and talking in the strain we have heard so far. The Hon'ble the Home Member in the speech with which he opened the discussion made the point very clear indeed, that we were here not to discuss the question as to whether martial law should or should not have been ordered, but that we were here to discuss the question as to whether those officers who have been acting under martial law and who have committed possible offences against civil law, as to whether Government who has promised those officers protection should protect them or not. Now, my Lord, the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda and the Hon'ble Pandit have spoken for a very long time in this Council, and for some time I was at pains to discover what the object of their speeches was. I do not think that they could possibly pretend that their intention was to persuade this Council that we were here for a discussion as to whether martial law was justified or not; and it seems to me that the only object and certainly the only effect that their speeches could have would be to persuade people outside this Council that Government had done wrong in ordering martial law, and therefore prejudicing not only the people, but also the Committee of Inquiry which is about to sit. Well, my Lord, they have had their answer. I doubt whether this Council has ever listened to a more convincing or a more crushing reply than that of the Hon'ble Mr. Thompson. The original speeches of the two Hon'ble Members and the reply will go out to India, and the original speeches and the reply will be weighed in the balance, and I should not at all be surprised if the Hon'ble Pandit was not sorry that he had ever touched upon the subject as to whether martial law should have been ordered or should not have been ordered. 1-4 P.M.

"Now, my Lord, there was one point which I must say puzzled me for a considerable time in the speeches of the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda and the Hon'ble Pandit, and that was the question as to what would happen to these officers of Government who had obeyed the orders of the Government and had thereby possibly exceeded civil law, if it was eventually decided that Government were wrong in ordering martial law, and therefore, if as I understood the Hon'ble Pandit to suggest, indemnification could not be allowed. As far as I could make out the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda made no reference to this subject. The Hon'ble Pandit said that these officers must take their chance.

"Now, my Lord, I can conceive of no more dishonest, no more ridiculous, no more piteous attitude for any one to take up than to suggest that, when Government had told its officers that they would be protected, they should not be protected; and to my mind it is upon this point, and this point alone, that the discussion to-day should continue. Government have said that they will protect their officers. Are Government going to protect them or not? I wonder if the Hon'ble Member realises, I wonder if other members of this Council realise what would happen to India, to any country, if when Government has given a promise it goes back upon that promise. The result would be nothing but chaos; from the highest officer in Government service down to the latest-joined sepoy and the lowest village chowkidar, every one would be afraid to do his duty; and, my Lord, I do press this upon non-official members of this Council, that the point before them is that we are not here to discuss whether Government were right in ordering martial law or not, that we are not here to discuss whether this man was rightly put in prison or was not rightly put in prison, but that we are here only to discuss one point, namely that Government have given a promise—are they to fulfil that promise or are they not?"

1-10 P.M. The Hon'ble Rai Sita Nath Ray Bahadur:—"My Lord, in rising to support the amendment proposed by my friend the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda, I have no desire to minimise the gravity of the situation caused by the recent events in the Punjab. But now that Your Excellency's Government have been pleased to appoint a Commission to inquire into the matter I fail to understand what harm will come if the introduction of the Bill is postponed till the Commission have submitted their report.

"I fully realise the paramount duty of Government to protect their servants who have acted under orders and acted bona fide and in good faith in the discharge of their duties. And had not the special circumstances in the Punjab and the popular demand induced Your Excellency's Government to appoint a Commission of Inquiry I am sure my friend would not have been justified in pressing the amendment. But as matters stand I think there will be no harm in acceding to his request. True, in the meantime suits may be instituted against Government officers. But suits of a contentious nature in which written statements have to be filed and witnesses examined cannot be disposed of before four or five months, i.e., before the Council meets at Delhi. Even if urgency is felt the Government of India which will move to Delhi in about a month's time can call an emergency meeting of the Council at Delhi and have the Bill passed into law. As the Bill is to have retrospective effect, the interests of the officers of Government will in no way be prejudiced by deferring the passing of the Bill till the Commission of Inquiry have submitted their report.

"I beg to reiterate that it is the paramount duty of Government to protect its officers who in an emergency are called upon to act and who act under orders and in the discharge of their duties, and I have no mind to say that Government should not protect its servants nor any mind to minimise the gravity of the situation created in the Punjab."

2-47 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. W. M. Hailey:—"My Lord, if I rise to address the Council it is not with any desire to add to the number of the Punjab champions. It is perfectly true that I have spent more than half of my official career in that province. I have every affection for it, I owe every obligation to it; but I have been away from it long enough, not to believe that the Punjab is always above criticism, just, my Lord, as I also possess a very strong disinclination to join that band of thinkers who seem to consider that everything that is done in the Punjab is wrong, and that the Punjab service must be inevitably and invariably condemned, without benefit of clergy.

"My Lord, I rise simply because I have had the opportunity of studying closely many of the facts in connection with these disturbances, and although I think the Council is very well able to judge of the value of the arguments adduced by the Hon'ble Pandit in defence of his case, yet there remain a number of facts, of which the Council should, I think, be put in a position to learn the truth. I hold they have not all been represented by the Hon'ble Pandit in their actual light, and that is my reason for rising to address the Council now. The first thing, my Lord, on which the Hon'ble Pandit dwelt at some length, and I take it that this was the salient point of his case, that martial law was unnecessary. If it was introduced without justification, then he argues that the whole case for this Bill falls to the ground. I take it, and I think I have interpreted him rightly, that he holds that constitutional practice will alone justify the introduction of a Bill of this nature if martial law was in itself justifiable and introduced in a good cause. Now, he first of all drew a picture of what the state of things was before the 30th March. He said that nowhere at that time was there any inclination or any intention of rebellion. In fact, if I may say so, the only sinister aspect in the picture was a Government which persisted in passing the Black Act, and that there was somewhere in the dusty background of the North a reactionary Lieutenant-Governor who was determined to pounce upon and punish agitation. I think, my Lord, we must admit that those who originated the agitation which we hold led to these disturbances, those who originated that agitation, had no intention of producing rebellion. When in this Council we were threatened with an agitation which would disturb the good relations between the Government and the people, and when that threatened agitation was followed up in the Press and on platforms throughout the country, then I think those who promoted it had no idea of producing an open rebellion against the Crown. But I maintain they produced an atmosphere which was in itself dangerous and liable to bring about a rebellion. If they did so, it was not without warning from their own friends. As early as January last the Bengalee newspaper, and I quote the Bengalee because the Hon'ble Pandit also referred to it with approval, warned them that they were playing with fire. Later on, and I am glad to quote another of their friends, Mrs. Besant—even if she no longer ranks as such—warned them that an agitation of passive resistance would only lead to riot and bloodshed. Bengal, which knows something of the meaning of prolonged agitation, refused to have anything to do with the particular form of agitation which they originated and supported. I maintain, therefore, that those who promoted this agitation were fully warned of what was likely to happen, and I maintain that Government, if it had expected that trouble was likely to arise from that atmosphere, was justified in that expectation. However, the hartal came off in certain places of the Punjab on the 30th March, and I freely admit that up to that time there was no disorder. Now let me go to the second stage, that which ends on or about the 6th of April. There again there were nowhere signs of open disorder. It is true at Amritsar there were inflammatory posters put up, one of which called on the people to 'die and kill,' but the attitude of the crowds was not such as to lead anybody to suppose at that time that any disorder was contemplated. Now I go a step further, and I take the events that followed on the 6th April, the universal hartal of the 6th April. The Hon'ble Pandit has taken us in some detail into those events, and I must follow his narrative in detail. He first of all takes Amritsar, and he says that Amritsar was all peaceful, was all quiet, up to the 10th April, and that subsequently if any trouble arose it was due to the action of Government in first of all forbidding Dr. Kitchlew and Dr. Satya Pal to speak in public, and, in the second place, in deporting them. I realise the action of Government in deporting Dr. Kitchlew and Dr. Satya Pal needs justification. The justification is this. When subsequently a Martial Law Commission sat to decide the case of these gentlemen, it found that they had from the 30th March indulged in language which was not only likely but which was intended to bring the Government of the country into contempt. It found that on the 8th April, following the hartal, they had held private meetings, the sole object of which was to keep up the excitement. But what was the population in which the excitement was to be kept up, the population of the Central Punjab?

"I yield to no man in my admiration of the sterling virile and martial qualities of the men of the Central Punjab. We owe much to those qualities in many a hard contest, but they have some of the defects of their virtues. When the Rowlatt Commission was writing of men of this class, it said that in their case the interval between thought and action was very short, and if once they gave way to the appeal of inflammatory addresses, they were likely to take speedy action such as would be subversive both of law and the future of the constitution. And these were the men among whom the excitement was to be kept alive. There were moreover local causes at work at Amritsar. That is to say there had some time before been very keenly contested municipal elections, and the candidates and their enemies had engaged bands of hooligans, who, we know, were subsequently largely instrumental in perpetrating the atrocities on the 10th of April. There were besides a very large number of Kashmiri Muhammadans to whom vigorous appeals had been made to show sympathy for the cause of Turkey, and these appeals had not been without effect in inflaming their feelings. Now, a Government faced with a situation like that has to take its precautions. It would be blameworthy if it did not take such precautions, and I maintain that anybody with a knowledge of administration, with an interest in the maintenance of law and order, could come to no other conclusion than that the men who were mainly instrumental in keeping alive that excitement should be removed from the scene of their activities. That decision was announced to the Deputy Commissioner on the evening of the 9th April. On the 10th morning he took certain precautions. I do not desire to take up the time of the Council with too much detail, but I am obliged to follow the narrative of the Hon'ble Pandit in this respect. He was afraid of a demonstration by an excitable and inflammable people, a demonstration mainly directed towards the release of Dr. Satyapal and Dr. Kitchlew, and he therefore put out pickets to prevent the crowd from crossing into the civil lines. When the news of the deportation was known in the city, his anticipations were justified; a crowd collected and attempted to go to the civil lines, and it was at this point that the first conflict occurred. This is what happened. I think anybody would assume from the Hon'ble Pandit's narrative that this was more or less a peaceable crowd,—I admit that it was unarmed—that it was a peaceable crowd and could have been dealt with by peaceable methods. The words at all events, I think, that he used were that all it required was a gentle pushing back. Now, my Lord, I daresay there are some here who have had some experience of crowds. If they have, they will bear me out when I say that, if you have a picket of a few mounted men, it is exceedingly difficult to indulge in moral suasion of that kind. At all events what happened was that, so far from the crowd being gently pushed back, they violently pushed the picket back. It was reinforced by a small body of infantry. When it was further pressed back, it was then, and then only, that the order was given by a First class Magistrate to fire. Now that was the beginning of all the trouble, and the Hon'ble Pandit, I think, will have us believe that if that picket had not fired, none of the subsequent troubles of the Punjab would have ensued: I maintain that the subsequent events afford perfectly good evidence that something would have happened if that picket quietly let the crowd go past. What did happen in Amritsar is unfortunately too well-known to everybody. And with every desire to avoid embittering feelings by reciting the events, I must refer to some portion of them. It was not only that Banks were burned, that Churches were burned, that a number of Europeans were murdered; it was not only that. The fact was that the whole thing was done with the utmost ferocity; that Europeans were not only murdered but that indignities were heaped upon them. I do not say this with any desire to embitter feelings; I only say it as showing the temper that the crowd was in; I only say it as showing that even if that picket had not fired there, trouble would have arisen elsewhere. And it seems to me that it is unreasonable to say to this Council, that you must look on the previous provocation given to this crowd, as affording—I do not think the word 'justification' was used; I do not think the word palliation was used—but I think it was said that you must look on the action of the picket's firing as some sort of explanation of the subsequent action of the crowd. Disorder did not stop there; and this is a dangerous feature to which I wish to call attention; it did not stop at murder and arson; it did not stop at showing the utmost cruelty to a woman and searching out another woman with every intention of murdering her. It did not stop there. The crowd went on afterwards seeking to destroy communications. It burned Bagtanwala station; it attacked and looted Cheharta Railway Station. I find it curious that the Hon'ble Pandit omitted to call any attention to this dangerous tendency of the crowd. The Hon'ble Pandit left Amritsar for a time and went to speak of Lahore. Now at Lahore he equally said that the atmosphere between the 6th and the 10th was quiet and peaceful, and the only reason that trouble arose in Lahore was that the Government excluded Mr. Gandhi from the Punjab. First, as to the exclusion of Mr. Gandhi from the Punjab. I think that also requires explanation, and, if possible, justification. I have described something of the atmosphere that there was in the Punjab at the time, and the Hon'ble Mr. Thompson has referred to the extraordinary rumours which were set on foot regarding the operations of this Act. These were rumours which did not appeal primarily to educated people; the bulk of the rumours were such as appealed with exceptional force to the land-owning classes. He has told us, and there is every evidence to support what he said, that people were circulating rumours that the land-owning class was to lose its status; that men who had previously been proprietors were to become tenants; that land-revenue was to be raised; that produce was to be taken instead of cash; and these are exactly the type of rumours which are likely to produce among a vigorous population and cultivators trouble the end of which no man can foresee. The population at large then had been told that the Act involved such consequences, and they had learnt that there was only one man in India that could help them in the situation. I do not think Mr. Gandhi was known personally in the Punjab, but he had acquired there the reputation, as somebody said (I think it is mentioned in one of the judgments), the reputation of a rishi and a wali. I certainly have read one speech in which the coming of Mr. Gandhi was compared to the coming of Christ, to the coming of Muhammad and to the coming of Krishna. Now, that was the man who, if I should use the words of a speaker at Amritsar, was to break the power of the bureaucracy; that was the man around whom the whole of the agitation centred; that was the man who by his new device of passive resistance was to relieve the people of the burden with which they were threatened. They understood nothing of the real meaning of passive resistance. So little did they understand the meaning of this peaceful movement of Mr. Gandhi's that, as Mrs. Besant afterwards said, people who committed arson and assaulted women did so with the name of Mr. Gandhi upon their lips. We have been told—I have seen it stated in the newspapers—that Mr. Gandhi's action in coming to the Punjab was a peaceful one, that had he gone there he would have stilled all angry passions, and restored tranquillity. My Lord, I think I am right in saying that Mr. Gandhi could not even address a Punjab crowd in a language which would be understood by them. How then was he to still those angry passions? What possible effect would Mr. Gandhi's arrival in the Punjab have had except to make people believe that there was truth in these sinister rumours to make people believe that he had come there to continue the fight against Government? With a population such as that which I have described, a belief of that sort would have been bound to lead to fresh disaster. I maintain that no one with any feeling for the security of the Province could have safely allowed Mr. Gandhi to have arrived in the Punjab at that juncture.

"I have been obliged to interrupt the course of my narrative, and I will now continue it. The attitude of Lahore, the Hon'ble Pandit said, was open to no exception. There had been no trouble, there had been no disorder, everything was peaceful. Well, my Lord, a gentleman who was subsequently prosecuted, an editor of one of the newspapers, himself admitted that at this juncture the atmosphere was highly surcharged, and that the people at large were in a state of very unusual excitement. The Commission which subsequently sat to judge the facts, in what is known as 'the Lahore Leaders case,' were of opinion that the fraternisation at the Ram Naumi on the 9th was used for a seditious purpose. We know that Honorary Magistrates and members of the Municipal Committee, who were believed to have taken the part of Government and attempted to dissuade the people from closing their shops, were threatened; we know that many of them were practically confined to their houses. Then, again, we also know that the feeling of the people was being worked up by a variety of literature in the shape of posters. Let me proceed now to the actual incidents of the 10th. It has been very widely stated that all that the crowd intended to do, when it went up to the Upper Mall on the 10th, was to make a peaceful demonstration in front of Government House. It has been insinuated in various quarters that it was a small crowd of students. The best authority we have so far on the nature of the crowd and on the nature of what it did, is the judgment of the Commission. These Commissions may be attacked as having no legal authority, their sentences may be attacked as being too severe, but is this Council going to believe that these judicial officers would perjure themselves by misstating the facts on which they have founded their judgment? That is an impossible supposition. They state the case as follows, and I must quote at some length:

> 'Towards evening a large and excited mob collected in Lahore City. Leaflets were distributed to it and some of its members were heard shouting both in English and in vernacular that Amritsar had been taken and the situation was well in hand in Lahore, as three gates were already held and a fourth would soon be closed. Headed by a man carrying a black flag, the mob proceeded with shouts of 'Gandhi ki Jai', and 'Shaukat Ali ki Jai' from the Lohari Gate through Anarkhali to the Upper Mall. Some of its members entered the compound of the Government Telegraph Office, but turned back on seeing a detachment of the Royal Sussex which were guarding the building with fixed bayonets. By the time the mob had got as far as the Lawrence Statue it numbered some thousands. There it was intercepted by two Indian Police officers, with a handful of armed constables who were brought up at the double from Anarkhali Police Station through the High Court grounds. These police lined the road in front of the mob but they were pressed back for a distance of about 200 yards as far as the Soldiers' Club. It was then getting dusk.
> 'At this juncture Mr Fyson, the District Magistrate, Mr. Cocks, Deputy Inspecor-General, Criminal Investigation Department, and Mr Clarke, Deputy Superintendent of Police, arrived on the spot. Mr. Fyson ordered the mob to retire, but they pressed round him. One of them seized him by the shoulder from behind and they began to go through the thin line of police. They also attempted to get round them by going through the compound of the Soldiers' Club. After some minutes Mr. Fyson, who, owing to the uproar, had difficulty in making himself heard, ordered the police to withdraw a little further up the Mall in order to prevent them being overwhelmed by the mob, and then, as there was no other means of stopping its progress, gave the order to fire About a dozen rounds were fired and then the mob was pressed slowly back to the city. Near the Bank of Bengal Mr. Clarke was thrown down, but his assailant escaped.'

And now comes what I consider the salient point of this judgment:

> 'It is beyond doubt that the Lahore mob which marched on the Civil Station of Lahore was actuated by the same motives as that of Amritsar It was essentially part of the same insurrection, and it was fully aware of what had happened to the neighbouring town the same day. It was rapidly becoming more threatening, and had already displayed its contempt of the authority and person of the District Magistrate. A collision was inevitable, and had the mob proceeded a little further up the Mall, it would have found a supply of deadly weapons ready to hand Had it not been checked where it was, there was the gravest danger that it would have hurried on, in the confusion and darkness, to the commission of awful crimes.'

That is the opinion of the Commission which had heard both sides of the case, and it is their deliberate opinion that, had the mob not been checked then, it would have committed grave disorders similar to those which occurred at Amritsar. There was a subsequent incident on the same day which the Hon'ble Pandit minimised in the same way as he minimised this. I find myself under the necessity of referring to this also at some length. I might say that the military had by this time arrived and were ready to assist the police.

> 'When the mob was driven back from the Mall it did not dissolve, but was slowly pushed back by a small force of police into the Nila Gumbaz Chauk and up the Anarkhali towards the Lohari Gate. There it was reinforced by a crowd issuing from the city, and the police under Mr. Clarke, Deputy Superintendent of Police, were held up at a point a little short of the cross-roads where the Circular Road cuts across the Anarkhali. Mr. Broadway, Superintendent of Police, came up with a small body of police and cavalry, but even so the forces of order were unable to disperse the mob which showered brickbats upon the police and sowars. Two or three rounds of buckshot fired at the roofs of some houses from which the shower of missiles was most persistent failed to do more than check the attack from that quarter. A message brought Mr. Fyson, Deputy Commissioner, to the spot: he went forward into the crowd to reason with Pandit Rambhajj Dutt or Lala Duni Chand (he does not remember which) who were there, but all efforts to disperse the mob failed, and at last some half a dozen rounds of buckshot were fired. The mob was then dispersed without further firing.

'We commend to the notice of Government the admirable conduct of all concerned in dealing with the mob.'

"Now, those who listened yesterday to the description of this particular incident from the lips of the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda are at liberty to compare the two narratives, and are at liberty to attach their own weight to the statements made by him. He dwelt on this incident at some length, based his description merely on certain statements in the newspapers. He did not refer to the judgment of the Commission, although he had then, I assume, in his possession a copy of it, because later on he alluded to it. Now those were the incidents of the 10th. By 8 o'clock, as the Hon'ble Pandit says, the troops were in the city, and everything was quiet on that night and during the 11th. So peaceful was the city, says the Hon'ble Pandit, 'that a meeting was held at the Badshahi mosque.'—I have his words here—'to express indignation at what had happened.' He merely mentions an incident on the 12th to which the Hon'ble Mr. Thompson also referred, namely that a C. I. D. Inspector, Ali Gauhar, was assaulted. Now what really happened was this. I take it from the reports of the various judgments of the Commission. On the 11th all shops were closed and an enormous crowd of Hindus and Muhammadans, said to number 25 thousand people, collected at the Badshahi mosque, inside which a banner was hung with the inscription 'The King who practises tyranny cuts his own roots underneath.' This is the meeting which the Hon'ble Pandit says passed over quietly. Well, let us see the facts. After the speech of Lala Rambhuj Dutt Chowdhry, an incident occurred which will show exactly what kind of meeting it was. This incident is described in the judgment of the Commission, dated the 29th April 1919. An ex-sepoy, named Balwant Singh, was brought in. He shouted a false story that Indian Regiments had mutinied in Lahore Cantonment and were marching on Amritsar and Lahore. He also stated that they had killed about 200—250 British soldiers and that he himself had killed six. He claimed to be a soldier and was dressed as one. He was garlanded and carried in triumph to the pulpit—he, a Sikh, was carried in triumph to the pulpit—of the mosque, and there he was called upon to make a speech. This he was unable to do and he shortly afterwards disappeared. Then, states the Commission, as a result of an orgy of oratory, the rabble left the mosque, led by hooligans who carried sticks, and shouted seditious cries and destroyed pictures of His Majesty. The allusion to the band of hooligans requires some explanation. It was an organised body, described as follows by the Commission:—

'They marched two-deep carrying their sticks as if they were rifles at the slope or trail. At constant halts they knelt, by numbers, as if in a firing position. On numerous occasions Chanan Din made inflammatory speeches proclaiming that he and his band were rebels and looked, not to His Majesty the King, but to Germany, Turkey and Kabul as their suzerains. He invoked the assistance of God and of these powers to overthrow the British Government. He also made reference to the Rowlatt Bill. Chanan Din's speeches were applauded by the mob, and the 'Fauj,' as it passed along, was joined by recruits who were supplied with sticks.'

"Now, what the feelings which actuated the people who got up this affair is very well shown by a poster, which, I will not say was issued on this date, but which certainly issued either on this date or a day or two afterwards. I will read some extracts from it:

> 'When Mahatma Gandhi arrived at Palwal, the English monkey informed him that his entry into the Punjab was forbidden, and that he should please go back. He replied that he would never go back; then that big monkey arrested him. Reports of his arrest reached here at once.'

The first part is merely abuse—that matters little; but the second part is noteworthy.

> 'When the news reached Amritsar, the Danda Fauj of the brave Sikhs set fire to the Bank, the Railway Station and Electric Power House. They cut the telegraph wires and removed the railway line. The Danda Fauj of Amritsar bravely killed a number of European monkeys and their Sikh regiments have revolted and deserted. Oh Hindu, Muhammadan and Sikh brethren, enlist at once in the Danda Army, and fight with bravery against the English monkeys. God will grant you victory. Do not apprehend that God does not help us. Cast away such a notion out of your heart. God helps us at all times and hours. Conquer the English monkeys with bravery. God will grant victory. Leave off dealings with the Englishmen, close offices and workshops, fight on. This is the command of Mahatma Gandhi.'

And there is a good deal more, very much to the same purport:

> 'Oh Hindu, Muhammadan and Sikh brethren, do you know of the incident that took place at the Mall Road on the night of the 10th April? The Hindus and Muhammadans who were martyred that day were your own and they sacrificed their lives. Does not this incident excite you? What is the reason? Were not those who were made martyrs in Hira Mandi on the 12th April your own brethren, and died at the hands of the tyrants? Does the Prophet of God command you not to fight against the tyrant? No, never, the Prophet himself fought, and has commanded us too to destroy the tyrants as he did. Should we not be ashamed ourselves that while the tyrant is up to all sorts of cruelty, we are sitting quiet? Oh Hindu, Muhammadan and Sikh brethren, raise the cry of Allah Akbar and kill the Kaffirs. Get ready soon for the War and God will grant Victory to India very soon. Fight with enthusiasm and enlist yourselves in the Danda Army.'

That was the spirit which actuated this quiet and peaceable city on the 11th and 12th. But even if on the 11th and 12th there was nothing beyond what I have described in Lahore city itself, what about the state of Lahore district? On the 12th a violent outbreak occurred at the neighbouring town of Kasur, the headquarters of a sub-division in the Lahore district. The Kasur outbreak will be particularly interesting to Council because it had to be quelled entirely by Indian officers. What happened there? The crowd, excited, inflamed, went to the railway station. It attacked a train in which there were a number of Europeans. It attacked, but fortunately did not injure owing to the bravery of an Indian gentleman, a European woman and her three children; but it killed two British warrant officers and injured two commissioned officers. In that case at least I claim that no one can say that there was either justification or 'explanation' for the violence of the mob; none of that crowd had been fired on by the police or military; the only firing was the discharge of the revolvers by the two unfortunate warrant officers when they were in danger of their lives. After murdering the two Europeans, the mob continued its course through the small town and burnt all the Government property that came within their reach. That is an incident which, I think, will disprove entirely any suggestion that the action of the crowds in the Punjab where they broke out into violent excesses was due to any sort of provocation or had any sort of justification.

"I have carried the narrative up to the 12th. The date is important because it was on the 13th that a reference was made to the Government of India on the subject of the declaration of martial law. I ask the Council to note the state of things in the Punjab as a whole on the 13th, when that question came up for consideration. You cannot take these incidents as isolated; you cannot say 'After all the military had got possession of Amritsar; there were large forces in Lahore; no further trouble was to be anticipated.' You cannot say that. You have got to look at what was happening not only in those two cities, not only at what had happened in Kasur, but at what was happening all round. It is very easy to sit in this Council Chamber, my Lord, in that atmosphere of protection of life and property which is the outcome of our rule; it is very easy to sit here and threaten us with agitation; it is equally easy, again, to sit here after the atmosphere of law and order has been restored and to minimise the magnitude of the events which took place in the Punjab. Some Members of this Council may have fallen into the first mistake; I hope that none will fall into the second. Let me state, as briefly as I can, the nature of the problem as it presented itself to the Government of India when they decided to introduce martial law. There had been outrages at Amritsar, outrages which showed a strong and very bitter racial feeling. At Lahore the crowd had, at the Badshahi Mosque, openly welcomed the false news that the Sikhs had mutinied in Amritsar, had destroyed portraits of the King, had supported the formation of an organized force of hooligans, had attempted to force the closure of the railway workshops. At Kasur they had murdered Europeans and destroyed all the Government property within reach. But it goes further than that. Everywhere attacks had been made on the communications. Bhagtanwala station had been burnt, Cheharta station looted, Khem Karan and Patti stations had also been attacked, the communications had been so far impaired that, as your Excellency reminded us, it was impossible to communicate with Lahore from Simla except by means of wireless. There was every proof then that disorder was spreading outside the cities. In cities it is a comparatively simple problem to deal with disorder; you can send troops and isolate them; but when you have communications attacked, and the telegraphs cut all over the province, how are you to meet the situation? You are dealing with a warlike, virile, martial people, suddenly filled with a spirit of disorder. We know that in a number of villages in the Punjab the people had begun to believe that law and order had completely broken down. I would cite the case of the attack on the Treasury at Tarn Taran, the attempt made by villagers on the line at Gumanpura, or better still the case in which a mob of villagers burnt the records at Aulakh. I maintain that, in the circumstances, there was every proof that rebellion had broken out, and not only broken out, but was spreading through the Central Punjab. It was in these circumstances that your Excellency agreed to martial law. I will go further and say that you cannot judge of the justification of the order merely by the antecedent circumstances and facts; you ought to take into consideration also what happened immediately afterwards, since that also shows what the state of the Punjab was. The Hon'ble Pandit has referred to what happened at Gujranwala on the 14th, and as usual minimises the disorders that occurred there. He very unfairly, I think, tried to throw the greater part of the onus on the police officer in charge of the station; he said the subsequent disorders were due to the officer firing off his revolver. Will Council believe that before the revolver was fired two railway bridges had been set on fire, telegraphs cut and the Post Office also set on fire? He referred again to the hanging of a calf from the railway bridge, and he thought that the fact afforded some sort of explanation of what happened afterwards; since the public believed that the Criminal Investigation Department had done it. That suggestion caused at the time a ripple of laughter in Council, and I will therefore avoid criticising it. But, my Lord, when I hear him tell the story about this calf, and the pig said to have been killed near a mosque, I could not help thinking of the expression we so often use about a cock and a bull. There was no justification for the disorders and outrages that took place at Gujranwala, for they took place before the crowd was fired on at all. It was not, as he would have us believe, a mere fortuitous collection of schoolboys bent on wanton mischief that set fire to the railway bridges, nor was it a mere fortuitous collection of people that pulled up the permanent way or which deliberately cut the communications with Lahore. The firing by the police at Gujranwala did not result in many casualties; and it was fortunate perhaps in the circumstances, since this was a case in which a young officer, without any senior Magistrate to give him assistance, had to deal with matters on his own responsibility, and to quell disorder which resulted in the burning of the railway station and a number of Government buildings, the burning of the church, and the looting of the good sshed where there were goods to the value of eight lakhs of rupees. I protest against the allegation that there was any explanation or justification in anything that that police officer did for the action of the mob. That was one instance of what happened on the 14th, and it was not an isolated instance. If disorder had stopped there, you might say that the declaration of martial law was hasty; but it did not stop there. I have the record here of a large number of cases showing the extent of the disorder and the danger to communications, though I will not venture to try the patience of the Council by reading them all. Let me finish the record of the 14th. On that day—the day of the trouble at Gujranwala—an attack was made on a European officer in the train at Hafizabad. Wires were cut near Batala in the Gurdaspur district, there was a strike on the Railway in Hissar district, workmen stoned the time-keeper's office at the Railway workshops at Lahore, telegraph wires were cut between Lahore and Amritsar, and an unlawful assembly, at which decision was taken to indulge in general looting, was held at Padhana. Down in the south there was a railway strike at Samasata, and the telegraph wires were cut. Up in the north at Rawalpindi seditious notices were found posted calling on the people to rise during the night. At Rohtak there was a joint attack on the line by the mob and the railway staff, a railway bridge was damaged and attempts made to wreck a mail train. At Sialkot wires were cut between Sialkot and Wazirabad. Now I come to the 15th. At Gujrat a crowd attacked the Railway Station, and smashed the telegraph instruments; the police had to fire on the mob. At Malakwal junction in the same district a mob was only prevented from making trouble at the station by the presence of troops. In the Jhelum district a train was derailed on the main line at Kala. At Sialkot wires were again cut near Dhariwal. In Lahore District grass stacks were set on fire near Bhangali and Padri. At Hafizabad in the Gujranwala district the mob attempted to rescue men arrested damaging telegraph wires and the police had to fire on them. At Chuharkhana, also in the Gujranwala district, the station was attacked, railway lines torn up, telegraphs cut and the station burnt and looted. The market was only saved from the mob by the arrival of an armoured train. Close by, the Dhaban Singh Railway station was burnt and all the telegraph wires cut, and late at night the Momun station was burnt. At Wazirabad in the same district a mob pelted the troops at the station with stones, cut wires at the station, and then burnt the house of the Rev. Mr. Bayley, a missionary who had resided for very many years in the district and who (as the Commission stated in their judgment) was greatly respected by everybody; he was a linguist of wide renown, and the mob burned not only his property, but what was even more valuable, they burnt the records of many years' scientific labour. At Gojra in the Lyallpur district a mob endeavoured to get an engine driver to refuse to start his train by telling him that the troops at Multan had mutinied. A number of telegraph wires were cut in Rohtak. At Sialkot, an attempt was made to fire a railway carriage in a siding. Let me go on to the 16th. In the Gujrat district a mob entered the Town Hall at Jalalpur Jatan, insulted the Municipal Commissioners, and damaged the furniture, and at night the railway line was dismantled near Malakwal resulting in the derailment of a train next morning and the loss of two lives. In the Jhang district telegraph communication was interrupted between Jhanj and Subhaga. In the Lahore district telegraph wires were cut at Changa Manga and at Raewind. In Rawalpindi, telegraph wires were again cut. In Sialkot, the permanent way was attacked between Sialkot and Wazirabad and the wires cut. In the Gujranwala district all the wires were cut near Sangla station and a murderous attack made on a European telegraph Inspector. Wires were cut in four other places on the Sangla-Shadara line.

"I leave the 16th and come to the 17th. In the Gurdaspur district telegraph wires were cut between Chhaina and Dhariwal, and three other places, and telegraph wires were cut between Kaler Kalan and Kunja in the Jullundur district. In the Lahore district, near Jhallo and Harbanspura, an attempt was made to derail a train by placing obstructions on the line. In the Lyallpur district a party proceeded to a neighbouring village and returned after breaking the telegraph insulators and cutting telegraph wires en route. At Lyallpur itself a stack of Government bhoosa valued at Rs. 50,000 was set on fire and burnt. In Rawalpindi, telegraph lines were interrupted near Gujar Khan. Trouble did not even stop on the 17th. On the 18th, in the Ferozepore district, obstructions were placed on the railway line ; in the Gurdaspur district canal wires were again cut. In the Jullundur district Sidhwan flag-station was burnt. On the same day, the 18th, at Lyallpur, an attack on Moman Kanjan station was only interrupted by the arrival of troops, and a gang of villagers from a village colonised by Manjha Jat Sikh colonists, came out at night and tried to wreck the line between Toba Tek Singh and Jhaniwalla. Well, I fear, I have already wearied you by narrating this series of events, but it was essential in order to prove my point that I should bring them to the notice of the Council. It is impossible to allow any minimising of what happened in the Punjab between the dates I have mentioned. I maintain, and I repeat to the Council, that not only should we take into consideration what happened before the declaration of martial law, but we are entitled to quote as justification of our action what happened immediately afterwards as showing the real state of the province.

"Now I will not attempt to deal at any length with the legal aspect of the case. It was necessary, for the declaration of martial law under Regulation X of 1804, that there should be either war or open rebellion. I understand that jurists have differed as to what constitutes open war, but, I believe, it is fully accepted that to establish the existence of war you do not need the existence of an army with all its paraphernalia. What is quite certain, and what, I think, I may with confidence place before the Council is this, that to justify a declaration of open rebellion, it certainly does not require the existence of an army or of an attack by armed forces. Why the Hon'ble Pandit himself referred in the course of his speech yesterday to open rebellion in the Gordon riots. I maintain that the Gordon riots, which were treated by martial law, were in no wise as serious as what happened in the Punjab on the dates I have mentioned. There you had a case, and readers of 'Barnaby Rudge' will remember it well, in which crowds assembled more or less out of religious animosity, burnt chapels and ended up by burning distilleries ; yet under the law of England it was held to justify the application of martial law ; what is more, the action taken to suppress disorder was held to justify the application of an Indemnity Act. I put it to the Council that the justification necessary for Government to declare the existence of a state of rebellion, is a matter of common sense, and I maintain that the account which I have given of what happened in the Punjab in the middle of April would justify any Government in declaring that there was a state of rebellion in the Punjab. If the Council will agree with me that Government merely exercised ordinary common sense in making that declaration, then, I think, a great part of the Hon'ble Pandit's case falls to the ground.

"His contention was that if martial law was not justified, then an Indemnity or Validation Act is not justified. I maintain the state of things in the Punjab shows very clearly that martial law was justified, and it follows as a corollary that you must have an indemnity and that you must have a validation.

"My Lord, when I began to speak I intervened more or less as giving evidence of facts. But there is one other consideration which, before I sit down, I should like to put to the Council. India is only now on the threshold of its political career, and it will not escape all the surging troubles which have come to the world since the war, since the beginning of unrest in the world at large. The officers of State, Indians as well as Europeans, and in the future probably more Indians than Europeans, will have to deal with those troubles. I have quoted to you one case at least in which an Indian officer, without any European support, had to deal with very serious trouble, the case at Kasur: there are other cases, such as that of Tarn Taran and Hafizabad. I ask the Council to reflect whether it is wise that officers of State, and particularly Indians, should feel that they are without support in dealing with troubles such as those I have enumerated. I feel myself the case of Indians to be infinitely harder in this respect than that of Europeans. They are liable to criticism of the most intimate nature, I mean in their families and in the circle of their friends. If they do anything which is thoroughly unpopular, they are liable to social, and perhaps even to religious, ostracism. Is it right, is it fair, to hesitate for one second to give them support for the reasonable use of their discretion? I appeal to the Council to view this case with some sense of proportion, and with something of insight into the future. I appeal to it not to look at it in any spirit of partisanship. If I may, I should like to quote the words of one who, I think, was not less distinguished by patriotism and by love of his country than those who have been most keen in their attack on this Act in the last few days. Before the Hon'ble Mr. Sastri left Bombay, he spoke as follows:—

> 'At the same time he was one of those who believed that the Punjab Government had had good cause to use strong measures—perhaps the measures they had used were excessively strong, far stronger than the necessity of the case required—but they had had a case for the use of strong measures. No Government in the world, however mild or sympathetically disposed, would have sat quiet without using stringent measures to restore order when they had a mob sprinkling kerosine oil on buildings and burning them down, clubbing and burning Europeans to death. They were bound to render to Government the most cordial co-operation in bringing things once again to a normal state.'

"Now I quote those words, my Lord, because, I think, they show that an Indian public man, distinguished for his public spirit, can yet give Government its due, can yet recognise the gravity of the situation in the Punjab, and can retain his right of free criticism, without falling into the attitude of the persistent and unreasonable partizan. It is the spirit of that speech which I commend to the Council in dealing with this question."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"My Lord, in the course of the last few days I find I have been called upon to address this Council for the second time upon the Punjab affairs. On the first occasion it was due to the Resolution of my friend, the Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya, that I had to address this Council; now it is in connection with a Government Bill that I find I have again got to express my opinion. The Hon'ble the Home Member in introducing the Bill yesterday and asking for leave of this Council made a speech, which if I may say so without impertinence, was free from any trace of bitterness or acerbity. If anything, it was a little unnecessarily forceful, due perhaps to his emotional Celtic temperament, but otherwise I have no grievance against it. And, I may say in justice to him that, in introducing the Bill his opening words were solicitous of the co-operation of non-official Members of this Council, and he begged of us not to import into our speeches any needless acrimony or bitterness. I may venture to say, my Lord, that the Indian Members who have so far spoken have, on the whole, adhered to the suggestion thrown out in such a friendly way by the Hon'ble the Home Member. But I wish I could say that the suggestion had been as well received and acted up to, in the spirit in which it was sought to be pressed, by the European Members in this Council. I am sure I am voicing the unanimous opinion of almost all the Indian non-official

Members of your Lordship's Council when I say that the friendly admonition of the Hon'ble the Home Member was completely lost upon the Hon'ble Mr. Thompson, about which it will be necessary for me to say a few words later. But before I do so, I desire to express, if I may be allowed, my whole-hearted appreciation of the spirit underlying the Hon'ble Mr Hailey's speech. Mr. Hailey has presented, it seems to me, the case for the Government in a spirit of such remarkable fairness and with such skilful advocacy as to carry conviction to a certain extent even to the minds of his opponents, and this is the highest compliment I can pay to him. If all speeches, my Lord, on the Government side were as fair and as skilful, I am sure the non-official Members of this Council could be easily persuaded, even on most contentious matters to see, at least partially, eye to eye with the Government. But before I make my submissions to your Lordship in regard to the Bill and the reasons why, after most careful consideration, I have not been able to agree with the Hon'ble the Home Member as to the desirability of its introduction at the present moment, I should like to say—and I am sure some of my European Colleagues here, if not all, will agree with me—that the language which was indulged in this morning by the Hon'ble Mr. Thompson is to be strongly deprecated. Because we non-official Members of the Council express opinions which may not suit the views and sentiments of our European Colleagues, for them to indulge in the style and language and make personal attacks as did the Hon'ble Mr. Thompson on Mr. Malaviya, I submit, my Lord, with the greatest deference, is highly objectionable. Mr. Malaviya is a gentleman who is quite capable of defending himself: he will survive Mr. Thompson's attack, as he has done others in this Council and outside. He is a gentleman held in the highest esteem throughout the length and breadth of India for his devotion to the country, and, however much you may differ from his views or his manner of presenting his case, there can be no justification for anybody to have made a personal attack on him as Mr. Thompson did this morning . . . .

The Hon'ble Mr. J. P. Thompson:—"My Lord, may I rise to a personal explanation? I did not attack the Hon'ble Pandit for his opinions, but for his statement of fact."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—The Hon'ble Mr. Thompson told us—I quote his words—that he was a great admirer of Sir Michæl O'Dwyer. Those who listened to his speech this morning hardly needed that assurance, for those who remember the famous speech of Sir Michæl O'Dwyer in this Council must have felt satisfied that the Hon'ble Mr. Thompson's own way of handling facts is reminiscent of the methods of the late Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab. When I find the Hon'ble Mr. Thompson charging the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya with distortion, exaggeration and misunderstanding, when I find him, again, charging Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya with credulity, gullibility, a lack of the sense of proportion and the power of closing his eyes to the political situation, and when I find him subsequently winding up his peroration by saying that in intelligence and mentality he was correlated with the lower orders, I bespeak to these the attention of the Council and venture to ask whether it is a fair presentment of the case or one that can be justified.

"Now, my Lord, I shall pass on to other matters. The Hon'ble the Home Member was pleased to commend to the attention of this Council—and, I think, he particularly looked hard at me when he did so, as if he tried to stare me out of countenance—certain articles which had appeared in the 'Civil and Military Gazette' of Lahore on this question by an anonymous scribe who signs himself as 'An Indian student of Constitutional Theory and Practice'—a rather long and pompous designation under which he takes shelter. The Hon'ble the Home Member asked us particularly to read those articles which, he said, put before us the whole case in defence of the Bill which we are now discussing. The Hon'ble the Home Member did not at the same time ask us to read a reply to those articles which appeared in the 'Tribune' of Lahore. Perhaps he had not seen it himself. Now, this writer, my Lord, who has taken refuge in anonymity, says some very interesting things in his articles which have a bearing upon the point we are discussing now. I believe the Home Member asked us to read the articles for the reason that the writer says :—

> 'Indian publicists and Indian editors (I am afraid I come under both these categories) should have, therefore, no sort of quarrel or dispute with the coming Indemnity Bill. Any unreasoned or obstinate opposition will show how ill-equipped and ignorant of the very A B C of the constitution are our leaders in the Legislative Council and the writers in the Press.'

I fear it was for this particular reason that the Hon'ble the Home Member commended the articles to our special attention. Further on, I find that this anonymous writer who comes to teach us the elementary principles of Constitutional Law concludes by saying :—

> 'I also hope that the Indian Members of the Imperial Legislative Council, and particularly the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya, on whom the mantle of the irreconcilable Oppositionist seems by an irony of circumstance to have descended, will not fritter away their energy and their time in an unreasoned, purposeless and infructuous opposition to a constitutional practice that stands hallowed by the observance of centuries in democratic England itself.'

Personally, my Lord, I shall be sorry, indeed, to waste a minute of my time in any unreasoned, purposeless or infructuous opposition to a Government measure. It has been my effort all my life to offer reasoned criticism and not to lead a purposeless, infructuous opposition. The writer seems to forget that, whatever weight of reason there may be on our side, any opposition here to a Government measure is bound to be, so far as we are concerned, infructuous, because, when the Government bring in a measure, there are behind the Front Government Benches the serried ranks and solid phalanx of our official friends, 35 strong, who sit here for the purpose of supporting the Government in any measure the latter like to bring in, whether it affects the European non-officials or the Indian.

'Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs but to vote and die.'

What is the good in a Council like this for any of us to try and persuade the Government? Once they have made up their minds that a measure has to be got through this Council, the old shibboleth of the responsibility for maintaining law and order being on the Government is trotted out and there are those 35 valiant soldiers to vote down any opposition that we may have to offer. Therefore, it is not for the purpose of carrying on any infructuous opposition that I have to place before your Lordship a few observations. The reason for it is this. Your Lordship's Government, as the Executive, have done certain things, have taken a certain line of action. Your Lordship's Government now come before this Council to ask the moral assent of the non-official Members to the view taken by the Executive. If I am not asked for my moral assent, if the Government simply ignore me, I shall make no grievance of that. I shall not take up in that case a minute's time of this Council. But when the Hon'ble the Home Member gets up and puts forward reasons and arguments before me and asks me to give my moral assent—for my vote does not count for anything—then I am bound to examine his arguments and make my submissions as I conceive them to be.

"Coming, therefore, to the question of moral assent, my first submission is that in the preamble of this Act I find it stated—

> 'Whereas owing to the recent disturbances in certain districts in the Punjab and in other parts of India, it has been necessary for the purpose of restoring order to resort to martial law,' and so on, and so forth.

Now supposing the preamble had been worded like this:—'Whereas owing to the recent disturbances in certain districts in the Punjab and in other parts of India, the Governor General in Council had deemed it right and proper to establish martial law therein', I would have had nothing to say against it. But when your Lordship's Government ask my assent to the declaration that it was necessary to proclaim martial law, I am entitled to say that, quite apart from whatever views I may hold, it will be prejudicing the work of the Committee your Lordship's Government have been pleased to constitute, if I were to give my assent now to this preamble as it stands. Therefore, quite apart from the facts as to what transpired in the Punjab—I have heard different versions of them; one was given by the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya who put forward the cases of those persons, subjects of His Majesty the King-Emperor, who are said to have grievances in the matter, while contrary versions have been given by Messrs. Thompson and Hailey who say that the facts are not exactly as the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya put before the Council—what I say is this. You have constituted a Committee to go into this matter, to analyse and sift the evidence and to come to certain conclusions. What will be the value of those conclusions if we now assent to this preamble that it was necessary for the Government to declare martial law? Therefore, my submission is, that by assenting now to this preamble the non-official Members of this Council, whether Europeans or Indians, will be making the work of the Committee infructuous, and here I may be permitted to refer to one or two observations which were made . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"May I inquire, my Lord, with a view to shorten the debate, if the Hon'ble Member's objection to the Bill is confined to this statement in the preamble? Because, I may say now, my Lord, that Government are quite prepared to reconsider the question of this preamble."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"That, my Lord, is but one of my objections. That is No. 1. But certainly if the Government will meet us half-way, it will be of great importance. I hope the Hon'ble Member will agree to that alteration. Now, my Lord, when the Hon'ble the Home Member put that question, I was going to deal with one or two observations of my friend, the Hon'ble Mr. Crum. Without the least desire to cast any aspersion of even the mildest character on my esteemed friend, I do say that I can quite understand his difficulties in not being able to appreciate the points—the legal points—involved in this Bill. To him the matter of fact is that Government have done certain things; they gave certain promises to their officers, and why should not those promises be carried out by the Government? That is the way it strikes him and he, therefore, characterised the attitude of those who oppose this Bill at the present stage as dishonest, ridiculous and piteous—rather unnecessarily strong words those, for which there is no justification. He also said that it seemed to him that the only object of those persons who are offering opposition to this Bill is to persuade the public outside this Council that the Government have done something wrong. Well, I desire to assure him that, far from that being the object of those of us whose misfortune it is to differ from the view of the Hon'ble the Home Member, we are trying to persuade the Government to do what we conceive to be right. That is my answer to the Hon'ble Mr. Crum. I think that in saying what he did he did a great injustice to us, who come here at the sacrifice of time, money and energy from different places in British India to serve our country to the best of our lights.

"Now, my Lord, this Bill deals, leaving the preamble alone, with martial law and indemnity, and to be able, therefore, to appreciate the points involved, we must have a clear notion of what these two are. I am aware that I am addressing the official benches and also the Hon'ble the Law Member, who is a great authority on the subject. But I make these submissions for his attention also. Now, what is martial law? Martial law is defined, my Lord, in various standard works of legal literature; but I have no desire whatever to quote them. I shall only invite your Lordship's attention to what I find Lord Morley in his memorable 'Recollections' wrote to Lord Minto, when there was some talk of martial law being established a few years back. He said: 'Martial law is only a fine name for the suspension of all law.' And again; 'If you declare martial law in India, it will be a gigantic advertisement of national failure.' Well, it is not for me to say whether the declaration of martial law in the Punjab this year was or was not a gigantic advertisement of national failure on the part of British statesmanship; but we must remember that when we talk of martial law in the Punjab, it means that for the time being there was no law at all, that the whole legal machinery was suspended, and that, as a matter of fact, things were done which would never have been done otherwise than under the cloak of martial law. I shall now, with your Lordship's leave, read out one short passage from a judgment of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in the well-known case of Phillips v. Eyre (4 Q. B. D. p. 225), to show what an act of indemnity really amounts to. He said: 'There can be no doubt that every so-called Indemnity Act involves a manifest violation of justice inasmuch as it deprives those who have suffered wrongs of their vested right to the redress which the law would otherwise afford them, and gives immunity to those who have inflicted those wrongs not at the expense of the community for whose alleged advantage the wrongful acts were done, but at the expense of individuals who, innocent possibly of all offences, have been subjected to injury and outrage, often of the most aggravated character. It is equally true, as was forcibly urged on us, that such legislation may be used to cover acts of the most tyrannical, arbitrary and merciless character, acts not capable of being justified or palliated even by the plea of necessity, but prompted by local passions, prejudices or fears, acts not done with the temper and judgment which those in authority are bound to bring to the exercise of so fearful a power, but characterised by reckless indifference to human suffering and utter disregard of the dictates of common humanity. On the other hand, however, it must not be forgotten that against any abuse of local legislative authority in such a case protection is provided by the necessity of the assent of the Sovereign acting under the advice of Ministers, themselves responsible to Parliament.' Now, I can quite understand an Act of Indemnity not working unnecessary hardship on the subject population, where the measure is assented to by the Sovereign on the advice of his Ministers and with the assent of Parliament. But, here, my Lord, where the Government of India, the executive of the King-Emperor in this country, do certain things and then come and ask for the assent of this Council, with a standing official majority at their back, surely that cannot possibly convince the people that the action of the Government was right; and that the Government in asking this Council to pass this Bill will not be asking assent to a measure which might be of the most tyrannical and arbitrary character. That is the whole difficulty which we have to face in regard to this Bill; and that is why we have to be so very careful. Now, my Lord, apart from that, we find that in this Bill there are provisions of a very serious character, and it is, therefore, difficult for us to assent to the policy of this Bill. Take, my Lord, for instance, apart from the preamble, the provision in clause 2, which fixes the period of immunity from 'on or after the 30th of March 1919' and brings it down to the time when martial law had been completely withdrawn. In other words, by making this provision your Excellency's Government are asking our assent to give the operation of martial law retrospective effect. Now, this question was raised in the House of Commons in 1906 by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald who, your Lordship may remember, was appointed a member of the Royal Commission on Public Services in India by His Majesty's Government. I mention this fact so that it may not be said by the Hon'ble the Home Member in referring to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald : 'Oh, he is a crank,' and all that sort of thing. Well, he raised the question as to whether it was desirable to give retrospective effect in legislation of this kind to the administration of martial law. This is what he said : 'The second point was that this incident, the murder of two policemen, took place on the 8th February, and martial law was proclaimed on February the 9th ; that the incident took place at a time when there was no martial law in the colony, at a time when the civil law was still in operation ; yet the natives accused of the murder of the policemen were tried by martial law. Was martial law to be made retrospective in the future ? Bad as martial law undoubtedly was and unjustified as those were, as he thought, who declared it, ten thousand times more unjustifiable was it, that this negation of all law should be made retrospective and to cover acts committed previously to its being proclaimed.' The Right Hon'ble Mr. Winston Churchill who was called upon to defend that measure giving retrospective effect to it said this in reply : 'Martial law is no law at all. Martial law is brute force. The only restriction on martial law is, that no more force is used than necessary, and where more force is used than necessary, persons may afterwards be called to account unless covered by an Act of Indemnity. The Hon'ble Member for Leicester suggested that it was illegal to try these men by martial law for an offence committed before martial law was proclaimed. Of course, all martial law is illegal, and an attempt to introduce illegalities into martial law is like attempting to add salt water to the sea.' Now, under clause 2 it is proposed to give retrospective effect. The Hon'ble the Home Member advanced no sounder argument than did Mr. Churchill when he talked of adding salt water to the sea. Then, we find in clause 3 of the Bill that the ordinary rule of evidence is completely reversed, and we note that the burden of proof is cast on the plaintiff or the prosecutor . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—"I think the Hon'ble Member is making a mistake when he says that the burden is thrown on the prosecutor."

The President :—"I think it was a slip of the tongue."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"It is hard for your Excellency to realise what our difficulties are in speaking a foreign tongue in this Council. We are apt to make mistakes. Then, I find here further in one clause, that there is no limitation as to the places where officers are to be protected. I have no desire to take up any further the time of the Council, but my submission is that many cogent reasons have been advanced by us why your Lordship's Government should postpone the consideration of this measure. Firstly, by the words in the preamble we shall be nullifying the effect of the report of the Committee. We shall be calling upon them to assume that it was necessary to declare martial law. Now, Mr. Hailey may be satisfied as to that and Mr. Thompson also, who was Sir Michael O'Dwyer's right hand man. I daresay he is, but we naturally feel a certain amount of diffidence about this point. Secondly, I have shown that the Bill is open to great objection in the matter of giving retrospective effect. Your Lordship's Government are no doubt aware that since it was announced in the 'Pioneer' of Allahabad that the Government were going to bring in an Indemnifying Bill, Indian public opinion has been roused. It has been insistent that this Bill should not be proceeded with at the present time. My Hon'ble friend, Mr. Malaviya, referred in some detail this morning to the strong volume of public opinion on this subject. He showed by quotations from a well-known London paper that public opinion, even in London, sees no justification for the Government's action in this matter. In India, I can assure your Lordship, almost every shade of public opinion, the so-called moderate and the so-called extremist, is unanimous in asking Government to forbear from pressing this Bill. Not only people of supposed advanced views, but even such a moderate man as Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, an ex-Chief Justice, whom, I believe, the Hon'ble the Home Member appointed last year as one of the advisers of Government....

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" He was appointed by the Bengal Government."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"Then the Government of Bengal are entitled to praise for their choice in having appointed him as their adviser. I understand from the papers that even he sent to your Lordship a telegram asking your Excellency not to press this Bill at the present time. He has also written a long article in the 'Indian Social Reformer' from which the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya quoted certain passages. Now, my Lord, I do venture as a responsible adviser of your Government to say that it is not right for the Government of India to flout public opinion in this way and say to us: 'Oh, we are reponsible for maintaining law and order, the responsibility is cast on us by Parliament, and we shall do what we think proper.' That, my Lord, is a wholly wrong attitude. Public opinion has got to be appreciated; it has got to be considered and given due weight to. We are apt to believe that public opinion came into existence in this country only with British rule, and that it came here along with certain other Western ideas. As a matter of fact even in the early days people who had not acquired English education knew the value of public opinion. My Hon'ble friend Mr. Shafi will appreciate the well-known lines of the great Hindustani poet, A'tash

'Sun to sahi Jehan men hai tera fisana kya kahti hai tujhe khalk-e khuda ghaebana kya'

which means 'do for God's sake listen to what people are saying about you and pay some respect to it.' That shows that public opinion was held in great respect even in earlier days. Therefore, I say, put off the Bill for two or three months. I understand the Committee will soon be out and will submit their report by the end of the year. Is there any advantage in pressing this matter at this stage notwithstanding public opinion to the contrary? I protest, my Lord, against the Government acting in defiance of public opinion; the result of such action in the past has been acerbity and ill-will on the part of His Majesty's Indian subjects. It is not desirable that the Government should repeat that experiment. I feel strongly that that would be a blunder. I do not want an indefinite postponement; if that was meant I should vote against it. I am in favour of a Bill of Indemnity—the only question is, should it be passed now, before the autumn Session is over? I do hope your Lordship will take into your careful consideration the view I have put forward. A large number of Indian Members of this Council, including the Hon'ble Maharaja of Kassimbazar and the Honb'le Rai Sita Nath Ray, take the same view as I do. My Lord, your Government will be in a stronger position by listening to and accepting the suggestion we have jointly made."

4-26 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. H. McPherson :—"My Lord, I have no desire to prolong this debate unduly, but I have a point of view to explain which, I think is of some importance and do not see why we others, who are here only to vote and die as my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sinha says, should be precluded from stating our views to the Council because one Member takes up an extravagant and quite unfair proportion of its time. I will try to be as brief as possible. I do not propose to follow previous speakers into the details of the unhappy events in the Punjab, but merely to say a few words regarding what I conceive to be the general attitude of the Indian public in other provinces towards the late disturbances, and the present situation, for I consider that this is by no means fairly represented either by the writings which appear in the public press or by the speeches made in this assembly, including that of my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sinha from Bihar and Orissa who has just appealed so strongly to public opinion. From these writings and speeches, one might imagine that the whole of India is boiling over with indignation against the measures taken to suppress the Punjab disturbances, and that it is entirely opposed to the passing of the present Bill, regarding it as a mere device to save from the just consequences of their acts those responsible for these measures.

" My Lord, I venture to think that this is a wholly false picture of the general attitude of the Indian public towards these troubles, and that in order to gain a true perspective for the consideration of the present Bill, it is necessary to realize a little more clearly and a little more impartially what India outside the Punjab really thinks about the recent unhappy events in that province.

" Speaking for my own province, Bihar and Orissa, I most emphatically deny that the province as a whole or even any considerable section of the educated classes in Bihar and Orissa shares the views which have been placed before the Council by the Hon ble Mr. Sinha and other non-official Members.

" I do not ignore the fact thatMr. Sinha's views coincide with those which twice a week are thundered forth in the ' Searchlight,' nor that they were endorsed a month ago by the Bihar Provincial Conference assembled at Darbhanga, when resolutions were passed deploring in the strongest terms the Punjab disturbances and condemning the methods used for their suppression. Nor do I forget that Mr. Sinha is the chosen representative of the non-official members of the Local Legislative Council, while I am a mere official, but even an official, my Lord, has eyes and ears, opportunities of observation and sources of knowledge, and, speaking as one who was in close touch with all shades of opinion in Bihar and Orissa during the critical times of April last, I can honestly say with the fullest confidence that in this matter neither Mr. Sinha's views nor the resolutions of the Darbhanga conference, nor the writings in the 'Searchlight' are any index to the true sentiments of the province.

" Through the dark days when the tragedy of the Punjab was unfolding itself and every hour brought fresh news of senseless outrages committed under the reign of mob law, of dastardly attacks on isolated Europeans and defenceless women, of the mad destruction of property both sacred and profane, of the wholesale interruption of communications, there was no feeling present, in the minds of all classes in Bihar and Orissa except one of nervous apprehension lest the epidemic of madness might not be checked, but might spread to our own borders and there revive that spirit of lawlessness of which we had had bitter experience less than two years before. We could not forget our own dark days when in one district, Shahabad, mob rule had prevailed for a time and neither life, property, nor the honour of women was safe. I venture to think that amongst our people the Hon'ble Pandit would find few to subscribe to his theory that the Punjab mobs never indulged in the game of pillage, arson and murder till they had been provoked by the indiscretions of the police or the troops, and that as soon as they had finished their little game, they resumed the role of quiet and inoffensive citizens, on whom to impose martial law was a terrible mistake.

" And when the prompt and decisive measures taken in the Punjab to restore law and order at length proved successful, there was, I assert, no feeling left in the minds of people but one of profound thankfulness that the helm of the State had been held by strong hands, that danger had been averted, and that India had been spared the horrors of a Civil war. Later this feeling of grateful relief was acutely intensified when the menace of war appeared on the North-West Frontier, showing in its true light the significance of the Punjab outbreak, and it dawned upon them that the peace of India had been rudely threatened by the combined forces of internal disorder and foreign invasion.

"There was, my Lord, little, in those days, of criticism that the measures adopted in the Punjab had erred on the side of severity. This was a new fact which it was left to a certain school of politicians in the province to discover four months later when they met together at Darbhanga. There assembled in the full security of public peace, while they mildly deplored the outrages of the Punjab (some went so far as to ascribe these to a sinister desire on the part of certain officials to discredit the Reform Scheme), they strongly condemned the measures taken to suppress the disturbances, and suggested that the situation was one which might have yielded to 'tactful and delicate handling.'

"As the Hon'ble the Home Member mentioned the other day, these hostile critics who denounced the stern methods of the Punjab were the same people who two years before blamed the Local Government of Bihar and Orissa because they did not adopt more drastic measures at the outset and nip the Shahabad riots in the bud.

"They belong, I fear, to a school of thought which can see no good in any act of Government, and think that any stick is good enough to belabour the poor official.

"My Lord, I can assure you that there is, happily, in my Province a vast body of sane and sober-minded citizens who have no sympathy with these critics, who had nothing but gratitude for the suppression of the Punjab outbreak, and who regarded the resolutions of the Darbhanga conference, in the language of at least one local paper, as monstrous, futile and uncalled for.

"This large class is not very vocal; perhaps not as vocal as it should be: its sentiments are not to be gathered from the reports of public assemblies: it is apt to be thrust aside and overborne on such occasions: but it is a very large class indeed and its feelings are none the less deep and genuine that they have to be gathered from private utterance rather than from public speech.

"And no one, I say, can seriously deny that this large class, and the still larger class of cultivators, who have little time for politics and no desire except for peace to earn their daily bread, pray for nothing more ardently than that maintenance of law and order which was secured in the Punjab, and which is the sheet anchor of India's prosperity.

"My Lord, I venture to express the opinion that the class, for whom I have tried to speak, now desire nothing better than to forget the past and reach forward to the promise of the future. They do not even want a Commission or Committee to rake up evil memories. Nothing would please them more than a whole-hearted and complete response to the eloquent appeal which your Excellency made on the opening day of this Session, to avoid futile wrangling over the past and the fanning of racial bitterness.

"If confronted with the present Bill, I have no doubt that they would acquiesce willingly in its provisions, regarding it as a necessary sequel to those measures which proved the salvation of India's peace, and a bare act of justice to those officers of Government who were charged with the unpleasant task of suppressing public disorder.

"It amazes me, my Lord, that in spite of your Excellency's appeal there are those in this Council who seem determined to keep the unhappy memories of the past alive, and who appear to value the personal safety of riotous mobs above the peace and prosperity of India. Equally with them, I deeply deplore the loss of human life which occurred in the Punjab, and it is the saddest of reflections of all that amongst those who were killed were certain persons who were innocent of evil and even children, but that is the tragedy of these occasions not uncommon. I have here a recent issue of the 'Pioneer' in which there is a brief account of the late Boston riots. It runs thus :

> 'Following the police strike, rioting was renewed last evening when two men and a boy were killed and a number injured, including women and girls, in collisions between the mob and troops who used a machine gun. Finally cavalry cleared the streets.'

"My Lord, the lives of these innocent victims in the Punjab lie at the door, not of the Military and the Police who only did their duty, but of the law-breakers who composed the mobs and still more of the recreants who pulled the strings from behind and worked the mobs to fury. We must not forget that had these lawless crowds not been sternly checked, their example would have spread desolation throughout the length and breadth of India, when the question would have been one not of hundreds but of thousands or tens of thousands of lives, and the growing prosperity of this great land would have received a blow from which it would never have recovered.

"With these words, I would appeal to my non-official Colleagues in this Council to accept the present Bill and show their faith in the British justice, which they so often invoke. They have witnessed the tremendous sacrifices of blood and treasure which the British race has willingly offered in the cause of righteousness and freedom, and they have only a week ago joined in the tribute to these sacrifices. Is it reasonable to suppose that the same race should have laid aside its noblest instincts in its dealings with fellow citizens in India who have borne their full share in these sacrifices ? If there has been in the Punjab even a hairbreadth's departure from the spirit of British justice, we may have every confidence that the distinguished Committee which has been appointed to investigate the whole question, will not fail to bring it to light. Let us not meanwhile deny to the mere agents of Government the protection to which they are entitled by every precedent of history."

The Hon'ble Lieutenant-General Sir Havelock Hudson :— 4-41 P.M.
"My Lord, my only reason for intervening in this debate is to clear up one or two remarks which have been made by my Hon'ble friend the Pandit as regards the action of certain officers and others connected with the suppression of rebellion in Amritsar. I do not think the Hon'ble Member has given these events in their clear perspective, or in their proper perspective. The first event to which I shall refer is the Jallianwala Bagh, and in order to give the situation as it would appear to the Officer Commanding at Amritsar, I must ask your Lordship's permission briefly to state the situation at Amritsar on the 10th of March. We have the attempts of the crowd in the Civil Lines, the troops stoned and ordered, after due warning, to fire ; the attack on the Telegraph Office ; the Telegraph Master rescued by an Indian Officer when in the hands of the mob ; the murder of a European guard at the goods station ; the murders of the Manager and Assistant Manager of the National Bank ; the murder of the Manager of the Alliance Bank ; the attack on the Chartered Bank ; firing of the Town Hall and its sub-post office ; looting of other post offices ; attack on the Zenana Hospital ; the assault on Miss Sherwood ; the burning of the Indian Christian Church, and attempt to fire the C.M.S. 'Girls Normal School ; the murder of a sergeant of the Military Works Department ; a second attempt of the mob to break into the Civil Lines ; troops again stoned and ordered to fire, later on towards nightfall systematic destruction of all lines of rail and telegraph communicaion ; and, finally, the destruction of two small railway stations and the looting of a goods train.

"My Lord, does not this read rather like the preamble of the Indemnity Act on the Gordon riots of which the Hon'ble Pandit kindly made us a present ? The above would be the situation as it would appear to an officer who found himself in a position such as confronted the General when he assumed command at Amritsar on the 11th April last. It will be realised, I think, that the situation was one of unexampled gravity. The Commissioner of the Division had definitely stated 'that the situation had passed out of his control,' that he must rely on the military authorities to restore order by the exercise of military force. The city was in the hands of an unruly mob; organised attacks had been made on Government property; Banks had been burned and looted; railway and telegraph communications had been interrupted; inflammatory posters inciting to 'die and kill' had previously been posted on the clock tower in the heart of the city, and the lives of Europeans had been taken in circumstances which I shall not describe in detail. It would be clear to the officer in command that the rebellion was not confined to Amritsar alone. He would be aware of the riots at Delhi and Lahore, and he would have had an opportunity of gauging the temper of the people by his personal observation. He would have been aware of the danger of the spread of the rebellion into the surrounding districts. As an officer in a highly responsible position he would know that it was his duty to take all measures necessary to restore order, and that his actions would be judged by the measure of his success in so doing. He would also know that he would be held personally responsible for any action of his which might be considered to be in excess of the reasonable requirements of the situation. You cannot conceive that any officer on whom such a responsibility had been thrown would enter on his task in any spirit of light-heartedness; nor would an officer of his seniority and experience (he had 34 years' service) set about his task with a disregard of the sanctity of human life or with a desire to exact reprisals for the acts of rebellion which had already been committed. His first act would be to dispose his troops with a view to the protection of life and property. His second would be to warn the populace as to the result, if it became necessary, to use military force in the suppression of further disorder. These are the steps which were in fact taken by the officer in command at Amritsar.

"On the 11th and 12th he re-organised his troops and on the 12th he marched a column round and through the city in order that a display of force might have its effect on the minds of the populace. We have it on record that the bearing of the inhabitants was most insolent, and that many spat on the ground as the troops passed. From the shouts of the mob it was clear that they were in an entirely unrepentant spirit. No military force was used on this occasion as the officer in command decided to issue proclamations as to his future intentions before employing such force. From a military point of view he would have been quite justified, I hold, in using force on that day, but the General Officer Commanding decided to pursue his policy of patience and conciliation. A proclamation was issued on the evening of the 12th and on the morning of the 13th April, the Officer Commanding marched with a body of troops through all the main streets of the city, and announced by beat of drum his intentions of using force should occasion arise The people were permitted to collect in order to hear the proclamations.

"The announcement that unlawful assemblies would be dispersed by fire was received with jeers and cries indicating that the mob had no belief in the sincerity of the warning given. While the troops were still in the city, information reached the Officer Commanding at about 12 o'clock that, in spite of his proclamation, a big meeting of rebels would be held at the Jallianwalla Bagh at 4-30 that afternoon. As this place had been used before for meetings, and as large assemblies had been addressed by the heads of the agitation on the 29th and 30th March and the 2nd April, and as a dense mass meeting had assembled here on the 6th during the hartal and had listened to speeches intended to bring Government into hatred and contempt, it would have been clear to the officer in command that he might expect deliberate defiance of his orders. Now, he was well aware of the events of the 10th of April when the murders of Europeans and the attacks on property had been made and when the firing which had been employed to suppress these disorders had been totally inadequate. The Officer Commanding at Amritsar had to decide about midday on the 13th of April how he would act if the projected meeting took place in direct defiance of his authority. After making dispositions for the safety of his command, he found that he had but a small striking force at his disposal. I believe the number was 25 men of one regiment and 25 men of two other regiments, belonging to the Indian Army, and, in addition, 40 Gurkhas armed with kukris only, and two armoured cars. Realising the gravity of the situation the officer commanding did not send, as he might have, a subaltern in charge of this small force. He realised that it was an occasion on which he, and he alone, must exercise the full responsibility. He marched this force straight to the Jallianwalla Bagh leaving the armoured cars which he had also taken with him behind, because they could not get into the Bagh. On reaching the Bagh his force was confronted by a vast assembly, some thousands strong, who were being harangued by a man who was standing on a raised platform. The Hon'ble Pandit would give us to believe that this was a fortuitous meeting of villagers and that they were listening to a lecture. That was not so in accordance with the facts, so far as I have been able to gather. It was clearly the duty of the Officer in Command to disperse this unlawful assembly. Realising the danger to his small force, unless he took immediate action, and being well aware of the inadequacy of the measures taken to restore order on the 10th of April, he ordered fire to be opened. The crowd was dispersed and the force was withdrawn. I have given the Council this narrative to show how the situation would be viewed by the soldier, and will content myself with saying that from a military point of view the sequence of events justified the exercise of military force, and that the object of its exercise was fully attained. Also, from a purely military point of view, the Officer in Command would have been gravely at fault had he permitted the elements of disorder to continue unchecked for one moment longer.

"The next point which I wish to turn to is another one to which reference has been made. It is the issue by the Officer in Command at Amritsar of orders that any persons who wished to pass the scene of the assault on Miss Sherwood should be made to crawl on their hands and knees. As this incident has been described at a meeting of the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee and All-India Home Rule League as a 'petty assault on a woman', I think it only right to remind this Council of what actually had occurred. In the first place, I would say that this is not merely an isolated instance of an attempt to assault European ladies. We have it on record that on the 10th of April the mob entered the Zenana Hospital in their endeavours to find the lady doctor in charge, who however escaped. After leaving the building the crowd again returned, on information given by a disloyal servant, to search for her again, breaking open the rooms and cupboards in their search which was fortunately fruitless. On the same day the mob attempted to set fire to the Church Missionary Society's Girls' Normal School, in which were four lady missionaries who remained hidden. I am sorry to have to refer in some detail to the assault on Miss Sherwood, but it is necessary, because I wish this Council to view the situation as the Officer Commanding on the spot must have viewed it. This lady had for many years been working in the city and was greatly respected, and the assault on her was characterised by extreme brutality. The following abridged account is taken from the judgment of the Commission which tried her assailants :—

> 'When she was bicycling from one of her schools to another, she encountered a mob which raised cries of 'kill her! she is English'. She wheeled round and tried to escape but took a wrong turning and had to retrace her steps. She reached a lane where she was well-known and thought she would be safe, but the mob overtook her and she was also attacked from the front, being hit on the head with sticks. She fell down, but got up and ran a little way where she was again felled, being struck with sticks even when she was on the ground. Again, she got up and tried to enter a house but the door was slammed in her face. Falling from exhaustion she again struggled to get up, but everything seemed to get dark and she thought she had become blind.'

"Her dress was seized, her hat was pulled off, she was struck with fists, she was caught by the hair and beaten on the head with shoes and was finally knocked down and struck on the head by a lathi. She suffered grave injuries to the scalp and was in a critical condition when she left for England.

"I feel sure that the Council will agree that it is not surprising that the Officer in Command took the view that some unusual measures were necessary to bring home to the mob that such acts of violence directed against defenceless women could not be tolerated. Something was required to strike the imagination and impress on all the determination of the military authorities to protect European women. This Council can readily understand how easily the feelings of soldiers would be outraged by acts of this nature and that they might be led to uncontrolled reprisals. Incidentally it is worthy of note in this connection that we have no charge against any of our soldiers during this rebellion. It is easy, my Lord, to criticise the orders issued by the Officer in Command at Amritsar, but the circumstances were altogether exceptional and the punishment, though humiliating, was not such as to cause danger to life or physical hurt. Except on one occasion when a body of prisoners were brought down the street in which Miss Sherwood had been assaulted, no compulsion was brought to bear on any individual to submit to the order. The order remained in force for a period of five days and there is good reason for the belief that, except for the party of prisoners already mentioned, those who were subjected to the order came voluntarily to submit to it for the sake of notoriety or martyrdom. One man after going down the street on his hands and knees three times had to be stopped giving further exhibitions.

"My Lord, the order was of course an unusual one and not one which might have been considered necessary by other officers in like circumstances. The Officer in Command at Amritsar will doubtless be prepared to justify his action should he be called upon to do so.

"The next point to which I wish to refer is, the use of aeroplanes at Gujranwala. I am not concerned in justifying to the Council the order given by responsible authority to send aeroplanes to Gujranwala on the 14th and 15th April. I merely wish to explain from the point of view of an officer who receives such orders how he would act in aid of the civil power and for the protection of life and property when so ordered. The situation, as far as it was then known, would be explained to him and his action would be left to his discretion. In this particular instance information was received by the military authorities at Lahore that a mob had attacked the railway station at Gujranwala, had looted the goods shed and had set fire to the Tehsil, the Dâk Bungalow, the courthouse and the Church. It was known that there was only a small body of police at Gujranwala at the time and no troops. Owing to the interruption of communications, to despatch troops would have involved excessive delay. If any measure of protection were to be afforded in time, the use of aeroplanes provided the only possible solution. Well, I think, I must explain to the Council the limitations of aeroplanes when used for such a purpose. It is not possible for the pilot or observer to communicate with persons on the ground, either to obtain information or to issue warnings as to the measures he intends to adopt. In the first place, the noise of the engines precludes all verbal communication, and aeroplanes have not yet reached that development when they can hover in mid air. From their bird's eye view the pilot and observer are able to ascertain that buildings are burning, that railway communications have been interrupted and trains destroyed, and that crowds are collected; they cannot easily discriminate between the innocent and the guilty; but, on the other hand, from this bird's eye view the observer is able to get a much better idea of the general situation than an officer who is only on foot. When, however, it is clear from the nature of the damage that general rebellion is in progress it may be a reasonable assumption that the crowds are collected with criminal intent. The presence of an aeroplane over a crowd is in itself a warning to those engaged in disorder that they are likely to be taken to account unless they disperse; and the dropping of the first bomb (the effect of which is local but the noise of which is considerable) affords a further warning which can hardly be mistaken. It may of course be argued that a bomb cannot be dropped nor a machine gun fired from an aeroplane with any great degree of accuracy. This may be true, but when the mark aimed at is an unlawful assembly it is not very material whether those in front or behind are made to suffer. It may be remembered that it is often just those persons who are most responsible for incitement to disorder who keep in the background and urge others forward to commit excesses. There is even a third category which never appears on the scene at all. Even admitting that the aeroplane in its present state of development is not an ideal instrument for enforcing order, still where as in the case of Gujranwala no other military assistance was available, we must not blame the Officer Commanding the aeroplane for the limitations of his machine. My Lord, my object in recounting to this Council in some detail the measures taken by the military authorities to reconstitute civil order out of the chaos produced by the state of rebellion, is to show that there is another side to the picture which is perhaps more apparent to the soldier than to the civilian critic. No more distasteful or responsible duty falls to the lot of the soldier than that which he is sometimes required to discharge in aid of the civil power. If his measures are too mild he fails in his duty. If they are deemed to be excessive he is liable to be attacked as a cold-blooded murderer. His position is one demanding the highest degree of sympathy from all reasonable and right-minded citizens. He is frequently called upon to act on the spur of the moment in grave situations in which he intervenes, because all the other resources of civilisation have failed. His actions are liable to be judged by ex post facto standards, and by persons who are in complete ignorance of the realities which he had to face. His good faith is liable to be impugned by the very persons connected with the organisation of the disorders which his action has foiled. There are those who will admit that a measure of force may have been necessary, but who cannot agree with the extent of the force employed. How can they be in a better position to judge of that than the officer on the spot? It must be remembered that when a rebellion has been started against the Government, it is tantamount to a declaration of war. War cannot be conducted in accordance with standards of humanity to which we are accustomed in peace. Should not officers, and men who through no choice of their own are called upon to discharge these distasteful duties, be in all fairness accorded that support which has been promised to them? My Lord, I feel before I conclude, I must make a reference to the amendment which the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda has proposed. I must confess that I heard this with some amazement. I suppose there is no class that has really suffered more by the disturbances in the Punjab than the forces of the Crown. Here they were at the close of four years of war; most of them were looking forward to demobilization and their hard-earned leave and many of them to a return home. They were suddenly called on to perform what is the most distasteful duty, as I have said before, which soldiers are ever required to carry out. They had nothing to do with the outbreak of the disturbances or with the imposition of martial law. They only did their duty and, as a recognition, the Hon'ble Member suggests that Government should defer till some indefinite date the fulfilment of their promises of support. My Lord, it may be within the recollection of Members of this Council that Hon'ble Members both inside and outside this Chamber have repeatedly referred, and that with legitimate pride, to the services rendered by India and more especially the Indian Army. It was only last week that this Council listened to the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma's eloquent tribute to the services of that Army, and yet it is that very Army that the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda by his callous amendment to this Bill would leave in the lurch. For what effect would the amendment have if accepted? Officers and men would be liable to prosecution for any illegal act committed under martial law, and as martial law is in itself no law, all their acts under that law would be illegal. Actions for damages, for illegal arrest and a host of other charges could be preferred against them, and the question whether they acted in good faith would have no force with the courts which try their cases. My Lord, I think all soldiers would view with suspicion, if not horror, the airy suggestion that Mr. Chanda made that the actions would not come up at once, that they would be postponed for a month, then perhaps for two and then again for three months and so on indefinitely. The Manual of Military Law, which is the soldier's only guide, is silent as regards martial law; there is only one chapter in the whole of that book relating to martial law, but that chapter is written by Lord Thring, and there is one sentence in it, which is the soldier's sole guarantee, which I quote below: It runs as follows :—

> 'It is only necessary to add that, when a proclamation of martial law has been issued, any soldier who takes, in accordance with the official instructions laid down for the guidance of those administering martial law, such measures as he honestly thinks to be necessary for carrying to a successful issue the operation of restoring peace and preserving authority, may rely on any question as to the legality of his conduct being subsequently met by an Act of Indemnity.'

"The Government, my Lord, have taken the only honourable course and that is to introduce an Indemenity Bill on the earliest possible occasion. To have done otherwise would have been the negation of Government and repudiation of its obligations."

5-5 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B.N. Sarma :—"My Lord, I am glad before I vote I have had an opportunity of listening to the statement of the case on behalf of the Punjab Government and of the military authorities. It is a matter of very vital importance that we should look at the question impartially and dispassionately and not fall into the error of saying 'ditto' to whatever the people say, at the same time reviewing the course which the Government may ask the Council to ratify. What does the Bill ask us to do? In the first place, it asks us to state as legislative authority that martial law was necessary to restore order in the Punjab. I do not think that is open to argument. The second point is, we are asked to protect the civil and military officers who have acted under the orders of Government in accordance with the promises made to them that they would be protected in whatever they did recently for the purpose of carrying out what Government had in view. I may note in this connection, my Lord, that the Bill does not confine its operations to the events which have occurred after martial law had been declared. It relates to events which preceded the declaration of martial law in the various districts of the Punjab. Therefore, I may say at once that there is a complete answer that people can give to this Bill as it stands, namely, that it is not a Bill intended merely to carry out the promises which Government made to its officers after martial law had been declared, but also to ratify the action of the Military and Civil authorities in the suppression of these disorders before martial law had been declared. It is open to the Government to bring in a Bill for the purpose of giving protection to its Civil and Military officers. As to what took place before martial law I quarrel with the position. This is a vital point. Then clause 3 throws the onus on the people of saying that any particular act which Government wished to carry out was not bonâ fide. If the question stopped there, there might be something to be said for the Bill, but we are asked to go further. We are asked to say here whether we feel martial law was justified or not; whether martial law was kept in force longer than the necessity required ; whether it was legal on the part of the Government; whether they were right in passing

Ordinance No. V or not. In any event we are asked to ratify all the convictions and sentences of the Summary Courts in respect of which the public are not in a position to know whether justice has been done or not done by reason either of the absence of the record or the absence of the full judgment. I ask the Council's attention especially to this aspect of the question, because the Hon'ble Mr. Crum and those who followed him had taken into consideration the fact that we are asked to keep in prison those who might have been wrongly convicted, convicted on the passion of the moment, the matter may have assumed a different aspect. I am one of those who believe that any disorder whatever should be sternly put down at the initial stage. I am not going to quarrel with any measures that Government thought necessary for this purpose. I go further and say that those responsible should be severely punished. I go further and I agree with the Hon'ble the Home Member that, whether the Government were right or wrong, the officers who carried out their duties under the orders of Government, especially in a country like India, ought to be protected if they acted humanely and in accordance with the dictates of a civilised Government. There is no quarrel with the Government on that score, but, my Lord, (I feel that the constitutional issues at stake in this controversy between the people and the Government are of such vital importance that we would do well to consider carefully before according sanction to this step. I understand there is justification for the belief held by the people that if there is grave disorder, the Government are prepared to treat the people of India like cattle—no consideration is necessary so long as it is expedient to bring about peace and order and to protect the lives and property of Europeans.) That, my Lord, is our issue that has been raised by this unhappy controversy, and it is therefore necessary to examine in detail whether these are real issues insanctioning this Bill, and as to whether people are merely clamouring for the punishment of officers who have carried out their duties in a difficult time with reasonable precautions and regard to human life and suffering. It is not necessary in this case to consider whether some of the old dicta uttered by constitutional writers really justify Government in their action in declaring martial law necessary. On that basis I think people have some justification for thinking that in some of the occurrences, it may be riots and disorders, in the case of an unarmed mob, there was no justification for the employment of martial law. I am not going to take up the time of the Council longer, because whether martial law is employed or not, I take it that the civil power has every right and justification for asking the military and the police to come to its aid in suppressing disorders, and provided the duties are carried out bona fide, in good faith, and with due caution, there is no necessity for any mere technicalities; but on the question of constitution it has been said that martial law having been declared, it is necessary to introduce this Indemnifying Bill, but, I think, my Lord, it is necessary to state that in the view of many of us martial law was unnecessary and should not have been declared. In this connection I would draw the attention of the Council to what Mr. Dicey says on this question. He says :—'The question for our consideration is, on what principle, and within what limits, does armed resistance to the authority of the Crown, either on the part of an invading army, or on the part of rebels or rioters, afford a legal justification for acts done in England by the Crown, its servants, or loyal citizens, which, but for the existence of war or insurrection, would be breaches of law.' Throughout the question is treated as one of civil war, and, I think, the essence of the whole thing is, whether a section of the population, whether large or small, resisted with arms the authority of the Crown.

"Now, my Lord, the second point to which I would invite the attention of the Council is, whether according to all writers on martial Law, it is not considered to cease the moment the necessity ceases. I do not think there is any single writer who states that in order to prevent a future trouble, in order to prevent similar mishaps, in order to preserve order, even though the disorders have been suppressed, martial law can be continued especially during a time when civil courts are in working order. Therefore, my second point would be, my Lord, that after the 21st or 22nd of April when according to the Press Communiques order had been restored in the Punjab, it was not right, it was not proper, for the Government to have continued martial law and to have created those tribunals to exercise jurisdiction in respect of all offences, whether those offences were committed or not. This has a vital bearing upon the question as to whether the Council will be justified in confirming the convictions and sentences passed by those tribunals, even though the Government have given us the assurance that they would be re-considered by two High Court Judges.

"Then the third point, my Lord, and what I look upon as the more important point, is this, and that is the moral aspect of the question. There are two theories of Government, one theory which attempts to employ only the civilized methods, however long and protracted may be the struggle between the forces of order and disorder. And the other based upon the theory that in a country which is not thoroughly civilized, it is open to the Government to resort to terroristic methods if the object in view is an honest one, if the end to be achieved is the restoration of peace and order, and that it would not be wrong to humiliate a whole race, to subject them to indignity or to do whatever is necessary to terrorise or cow the population if the object in view is to be achieved. My Lord, if the second theory is advocated, and that was the example that was set to us by some of the old sovereigns and perhaps it would be advocated even now by a few, but which has been repudiated most whole-heartedly by all civilized Governments in the world, and for the suppression of which theory Great Britain herself has allowed herself to run into a debt of 8 thousand millions and the de-population of her fair provinces. The question, my Lord, now is as to whether any British officer of the Indian Government can be allowed to rule India on the second theory, because the view I take of the facts is that there are several British officers who are under the impression that so long as order and peace are restored, if a person believes that it is reasonable to do anything which attains that end, and if that theory is to be accepted, then certainly the Government are perfectly right in bringing forward clause 2. But if that theory is repudiated, as I hope it will be repudiated by every true Britisher and by the Government, then it seems to me, my Lord, that on the face of it, it is impossible to throw the onus upon the Punjab Public of proving that the several acts, both by the military and civil authorities, are acts which can be justified by rules of morality or by rules of humanity. It is therefore I find it difficult to give my vote to this clause, although I agree that the officers are to be protected. It is necessary that my view, which I believe is also the view of a large section of the people, is open to criticism and it must be demolished if it is unfair, because it is the view held by a large section of the Indian population, and it is well that the hollowness of that view should be exposed in all its bareness in order that people may take a right view of the situation. My Lord, how do we look at the situation? The way in which we look at the situation is this, and it is easier for me to do so because I am not hampered by some considerations which may hamper others. Although I objected to the Rowlatt Act, I never was in favour of an agitation on the lines of the Satyagraha movement. I was unpopular on that account, and therefore I say I am able to speak with greater fulness than many others. But, my Lord, it must be said, that it was not the Satyagraha movement which was responsible for these unhappy events, although it was the occasion, and although—here I agree with the Hon'ble Mr. Hailey—it created a certain atmosphere which led to these disturbances, it was not the real cause, but it was the unhappy view of the Punjab Government that the prestige of the British race should be upheld against the warlike races of the Punjab by methods which cannot be justified in other provinces. We find that on the 30th of March there was no disorder; on the 6th of April there was no disorder. I assume for argument's sake that Satyapal and Kitchlew were preaching sedition and were trying to bring about excitement. Was there anything to prevent the Government from arresting these men and putting them on their trial? There is nothing to which the Indian public submits so cheerfully and loyally as an open trial. It is this theory of keeping up prestige by deportations, by secret methods, which the public have been resenting, and it was the deportation of these two men, whatever action may have been justifiable against them, which was resented. That is the way in which we look at it. Well on the 10th some precautionary measures were taken. Assuming that the mob was unruly and assuming that it was incumbent on the officers to shoot some members of the mob, that would not afford any justification whatever for the lawless action of the mob after that. That is reprehensible and it ought to be put down with a stern hand. I agree with that also. But it affords an explanation of this tension between the British Government and the people on some subjects which has been produced, especially in the Punjab on account of the difficulties in that Province and other causes. It is that tension which led to this racial difficulty. When the mob thought that they were unjustly dealt with, they did not distinguish between the British citizens and the British Government or between individuals. It affords an explanation, as I have said, but no justification. And then followed the unhappy incidents of the mob on the 10th. Hon'ble Members will notice that up to the evening of the 10th there was no unhappy incident in Lahore. Communications were interfered with for a little time, but there was time for the news from Amritsar to reach Lahore before the unhappy incidents in Lahore took place, and therefore—I will not say it is right—there are many people who believe that the unhappy incidents in Lahore were the result, the natural result of the provocation which was given to the British community by the savage doings of the mob in Amritsar on the morning of the 10th. Then a large number of Indian lives were sacrificed; it may have been right, I will not question that now. But, my Lord, I cannot help thinking that, after the explanation which was given by General Hudson, people would be willing to think that the Jallianwala episode was not the result of the unhappy tension and temporary dislocation of certain officers who wanted to show what their attack upon European lives would mean. I think it was by way of reprisals. The public will still unhappily continue to think that it was by way of reprisals, by way of revenge, and not for a possible violation or disobedience of the orders of the authorities in prohibiting a meeting. They think that was taken advantage of to teach the mob a lesson, because it is impossible for us to conceive that when men from all parts of the Punjab, Jats and other cultivators who had nothing to do with politics, were collected in large numbers for the Bysaki fair, no precautions would be taken against shooting down such a large mob simply on account of the reason that it was a lawless mob which violated and disobeyed the injunctions of the Government. Hon'ble Members will notice that it was only that morning that the Seditious Meetings Act was proclaimed to be in force. It was on the 13th morning. There was hardly time for the public to know that meetings were prohibited under that Act. But I should assume that a certain section of the people did know of the prohibition and in spite of the prohibition went there, and others gathered there from curiosity or because there happened to be a fair. But no explanation has been forthcoming to the effect that the mob resisted or did any act which justified the shooting down of any person. And what is more important to notice is, assuming, for argument's sake, that a few shots were thought to be necessary to cow down the people and send them away, there was no justification for shooting down 300, 500 or a thousand as is generally believed. That, my Lord, is the crux of the whole situation. There was one reference in General Hudson's speech which gives a partial support to this. The General Commanding felt that the punishment that was awarded on the 10th was not sufficient to teach the people a lesson; they were still continuing to be insulting, and therefore it might be, inasmuch as good order and peace were in his hands, he felt that a few more drastic measures had to be taken and hence this unhappy incident.

"I must meet a point raised by the Hon'ble Mr. Hailey, and that was in regard to the incident at Kasur. The incidents at Kasur on the 12th are partly explainable by the incidents at Amritsar on the 10th and the incidents at Lahore on the 10th. I am not justifying the acts of the mob; I am not in any way palliating what they have done; I am only suggesting that it is an explanation, but an explanation which would show that there was no rebellious tendency in the land, that it was only bitter resentment at the thought that British officers should have shot down Indians, and Indians thought it was unjustly done. I do not say it was unjustly.

"Then what follows after the 13th? I think the papers will show that the news reached Gujranwalla before the 14th morning when a train was held up there. And it must be remembered that shopkeepers and all classes came to Amritsar for the Bysaki fair from all parts of the Punjab and carried back reports, it may be exaggerated reports, of what had taken place in Gujranwalla all over the Punjab, and there is nothing surprising in people becoming lawless suddenly when they felt that they were most inhumanly dealt with. I do not say it is a right feeling or a wrong feeling, but that is the feeling, and is there anything impossible in the view that with such inflammable material in the Punjab, as we are told, the mob should have behaved in that way? Then in Gujranwalla we find, possibly after the spreading of this news, it is impossible to say without an inquiry, because there was time for the news to reach them, after the spreading of this news, we find all the incidents in Gujranwalla taking place, the burning of the railway station and the other actions of the mob. Here, my Lord, I must as a Legislative Council Member decline to sanction the action either of the civil authorities or the military authorities in using bombs and aeroplanes. Even in a state of war—but we are not concerned with that. At any rate in peaceful times, even with a lawless mob like that in Gurjanwalla, they are not justified. That is a doctrine to which we should not give our legislative sanction. It would be most mischievous and harmful and dangerous.

"And there seems to be absolutely no necessity for the authorities to have asked for this aeroplane to drop bombs not merely there but in adjoining villages and it can only be considered to be vengeful? Various issues of the Civil and Military Gazette of that date show that the mob were dispersing. General Hudson says 'How was the officer commanding to know whether the mob was dispersing or not?' Of course, if the civil authorities had given the military authorities the necessary sanction, I would not blame the military authorities. They have to support the civil authorities and their action might be justified. But, I think, the civil authorities do not give any explanation as to why they allowed the use of bombs or whether they sanctioned their use. And whatever may be the merits, as regards the action of the military authorities, the civil authorities cannot be exonerated in respect of this action. And this was done before martial law was proclaimed, so that the action of the officers who shot down people in Amritsar and Lahore and the action at the Jhallianwalla Bagh on the 13th and the action at Gujranwalla before the proclamation of martial law, which was between the 15th and 17th—I speak subject to correction—would not come within the purview of this Act and within the preamble of this Act if you justly follow the procedure which has been followed in other countries by following up martial law with an Indemnity Bill. Therefore, I have to deal with this simply because the Government have asked this Council to give protection to officers who acted before martial law was proclaimed. Ordinarily, they are liable to be brought before the courts, the civil and military authorities would be liable to be brought before the civil Courts, and I do not know whether on previous occasions protection has been given—I am speaking subject to correction—but at any rate the preamble does not justify it. Now the action of the authorities in dropping bombs, if that is true, is a matter which I think cannot and ought not to be brought within the purview of this Act. The answer of the Hon'ble the Home Member may be 'Yes, but why argue this. We say if it is not done bona fide and in a reasonable belief to produce a particular result, the officers will be condemned by the Courts ; we do not protect them.' But, my Lord, if the whole transaction from start to finish proceeds upon the basis that British officers are justified in humiliating the Indian public and in the employment of any means that may be necessary to bring about the desired result, if we accept that theory, what justification have we in allowing any British officer to be punished ? Therefore we shall have to make up our minds as to that at the outset. Assuming that that was the belief of British officers, or of Indian officers for the matter of that or of the Government for the matter of that, assuming that they felt that any humiliating action is justified, any drastic action is justified, in order to bring about the result, then all we can say is that we shall have nothing to do with the Bill. We can never subscribe to that doctrine. I argue simply because I believe that the Government would not subscribe to that doctrine, British officers would not subscribe to that doctrine and no Britisher would subscribe to that doctrine.

"Then, my Lord, we find that there were incidents on the 11th, 12th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and so on. May I say in this connection, my Lord, that I believe that the attempt to humiliate the educated classes has been indirectly responsible for these unhappy events. There is no going away from that point. Sir Michael O'Dwyer has told us and in distinct terms on more than one occasion that he did not believe in these mild methods, that he did not believe that the country is in a fit state for the introduction of any reforms on a reasonable scale. He has told us that the educated Indian is really a menace to the British Government . . . .

The Hon'ble Mr. W. M. Hailey :—"May I rise to a point of order."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"I beg the pardon of the Council for using that. I meant a section of the educated community is really a menace to the British Government."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. M. Hailey :—"My Lord, I merely rose to a point of order. I desired to obtain some verification for the statement which the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma has made. He has now corrected it."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"I think the speeches of Sir Michael O'Dwyer—I am not accusing him of dishonesty, I only mention his view, his honest view of what is right and proper—show that he thought that a section of the educated Indian public was pursuing a career which was ruinous to the Government as well as to the country, and there was no love lost between the Indian Press and himself. Bearing these facts in mind, and bearing in mind the fact that the Commissioners in their judgments look upon various acts of these educated men as having brought about these results, there was nothing surprising in the action which was taken by the Punjab Government against various educated men, leaders in various cities, vakils and others, in handcuffing them and subjecting them to trial and punishment. There is nothing surprising in that. They may be justified in doing it, but I am bringing this out to show that that led to a storm of indignation throughout the province. If at a crisis like that the Government chooses to shoot down the mob, the Government chooses to punish all educated Indians, to humiliate them, to make every educated Indian salaam a European, to make them crawl on their bellies, I ask, my Lord, has not that very action produced the results which were meant to be remedied? Therefore, here is an explanation, not a justification, for the action of the mob or for the action of the educated classes. If they went wrong throughout the Punjab there was a very good explanation for the occurrences. But, my Lord, it is not necessary to go at any greater length into what occurred in the Punjab, except by way of supporting my proposition that the whole of India feels that she has been disgraced. That is the feeling, my Lord, and I hope the Government will try to assuage that feeling and show that it is unjustified. Unfortunately, the whole of India feels that the Indian public have been grossly insulted by the action of the authorities in the Punjab. Well, there may be some who are sceptical on the point, but, turning to the statement of trials by summary courts and area officers, in the districts of Lahore, Amritsar, Gujranwala, Gujrat and Lyallpur, I find a number of cases in which men have been whipped for not salaaming European officers. Well, take that for granted that it might have been done in a reasonable belief to teach the Indians a lesson. That is not the question at issue. The order should not discriminate between Indian and Indian because we are living in democratic times. But there was nothing to prevent the troops from whipping a High Court Judge for disobeying this order and refusing to salaam a European. Is it, therefore, wrong on the part of the Indian public to deeply resent this action of the authorities as being wholly unjustified and as the Government of India ask us to ratify the convictions based upon such grossly uncivilized methods? That is the point at issue, my Lord. If the Government say that these convictions would be set at naught, that the men would be released, then it might be quite a different thing. But we are asked by the Government of India to ratify the convictions of these men who have suffered gross indignity for opposing an illegal and inhuman ordinance passed by the military authorities. I therefore submit, my Lord, that as the Bill stands, it is self-condemned. We appeal to the moral convictions; of course we know perfectly well that legalities have not much force and validity in troublous times; but all authorities in England and elsewhere are agreed on this point, that moral considerations must prevail, that the officers who seek protection must appeal to morality and to say that they have behaved as humanly and in as civilized a manner as possible. I submit, my Lord, on behalf of the Indian public that it is impossible for them to ratify and sanction these convictions if they have a spark of self-respect in them, if they have anything worth considering in them. I have already alluded to the fact, my Lord, that it is impossible, having regard to the events at Jallianwalla Bagh and elsewhere, to raise the presumption in the manner in which it is sought to raise it. I pray that the Government will deal only with cases which took place after the martial law ordinances were issued. Then that would exclude from the purview of our consideration a large number of actions which have to stand on their merits under the common law of the land. If they are to be brought in on the ground that the essence of martial law is a necessity and that those people are entitled to protection, then I humbly pray, my Lord, that the onus of having acted in good faith and in a reasonable manner should be laid upon them. I also ask, my Lord, as to why there is in this clause the phrase 'reasonable belief that those measures are necessary for the purpose of maintaining order, etc.' in addition to the words 'bona fide'? Hon'ble Members will see that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for any plaintiff or any prosecutor to show that the officers who were concerned in the discharge of these duties did not believe them to be necessary. That would be an impossible position to take up. The only point would be as to whether they were reasonable in believing them to be necessary. But if it is the sentiment of the British public as voiced loudly by several European papers that they are very sorry that Sir Edward Maclagan should have pursued this clemency policy which is likely to mar all the good work done by his distinguished predecessor, when we see that that is the atmosphere, if I would think that this was the mentality at the time, that this was the atmosphere at the time, then I say, my Lord, it is necessary that we should carefully consider what they might consider to have been a reasonable belief that their actions were justified by necessity. But we, my Lord, as legislators, find absolute difficulty in ratifying any action which is based upon ideas of revenge, reprisals or upon methods which should not be pursued which are acknowledged should not be pursued. That is my real difficulty. My real difficulty is not that I am unwilling to protect officers, even though the martial law proclamation and orders were wrong—even assuming that I am prepared to protect the officers, but not all officers who have acted in particular ways.

"I have only a few words to add with reference to clause 4, and that is this. Hon'ble Members will find that these summary courts were established or have acted in exercise of powers granted to them by Ordinance IV. The Ordinance, my Lord, gives these tribunals power to deal with any offences whether they were connected with these troubles or not, any offences which occurred after the 30th March, in accordance with the law of the land, but I suppose following the procedure of Ordinance No. I of 1909 as far as may be . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"I think the Hon'ble Member has made a verbal slip; that Ordinance has nothing whatever to do with summary courts; it deals only with commissions."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"Or rather courts which were empowered to deal with cases just as summary courts-martial are empowered to do . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"The Hon'ble Member is, I think, mixing up two different things. Commissions were appointed under the first Ordinance, and under Ordinance No. 4 the Commissions were entitled to try these persons. In addition there were summary courts appointed by the martial law authorities."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I shall be glad to proceed upon the footing that these courts should have followed the ordinary procedure and should have dealt with these cases and have ordered those punishments which are awardable under law. I have made a mistake. It is true that under the first Ordinance the Commission shall have all the powers of a general court-martial under the Indian Army Act, and shall, subject to the provisions of this Ordinance in all matters, follow so far as may be the procedure regulating trials by such courts-martial prescribed under the said Act. Provided that where in the opinion of the convening authority a summary trial is necessary in the interest of the public safety such authority may direct that the Commission shall follow the procedure prescribed for a summary general court-martial by or under the said Act, and the Commission shall, so far as may be and subject to the provisions of this Ordinance, follow such procedure accordingly. Provided further that sections 78, 80 and 82 of the said Act shall not apply to any trial under the Ordinance. Then this is the other Ordinance which I was referring to. 'This Ordinance may be called the Martial Law (Further Extension) Ordinance, 1919.' I shall be glad to hold the other view notwithstanding anything contained in the Martial Law Ordinance I of 1919 the Local Government may by general or special order direct that any commission appointed under the said Ordinance shall try any person charged with any offence committed on or after the 30th March 1919. There is no limitation there. Thereupon the provisions of the said Ordinance shall apply to such trials accordingly and the commission may pass in respect of any such offence any sentence authorised by law. I think, therefore, that it was competent to the officers who dealt with cases under this Ordinance to follow the procedure that was prescribed in Ordinance No. I. Even in respect of trials which did not fall within Ordinance No. I but were matters under the Penal Code or which were taken up by the convening authority before these tribunals. However, that is a matter which I shall leave now. Hon'ble Members turning to this statement will find that a very large number of convictions in accordance with this Ordinance were passed towards the end of April, the beginning of May, June and July. This was dated the 21st April when according to the Press Communiques order had been restored and everything was quiet, barring a few incidents here and there. I do not say that there was no fear of a recurrence of those events, that is unnecessary for my argument; but the Press Communiques that were issued would show clearly . . . I will take one.

"I take one. On the 22nd of April the following Press Communique was issued: 'Situation seems to be well in hand . . . . disturbances except the cutting of telegraph wires.' I am not going to argue that reports of disorders were not coming in, it is unnecessary to argue the point, there may have been disturbances, but all I can say is that the disturbances had been quelled by the 30th. My point is that martial law cannot be invoked and should not have been invoked after the 21st of April for the purpose of administering justice for the further prosecution of measures of Government—we are not concerned with them. My submission is that on the 21st or 22nd of April the ordinary courts should have been allowed to proceed. It may be said that if that were done it would not have been possible to get through the work expeditiously. There was nothing to prevent Government from appointing additional tribunals to deal with the offenders. I take strong exception to the ordinary safeguards which are open to the public being removed by executive action in a time of peace . . . ."

The Hon'ble Mr. J. P. Thompson:—"My Lord, in the absence of Mr. Hailey, may I explain for the Hon'ble Member's information that disturbances were not over by the 20th of April? There were several cases of cutting of telegraph wires."

The President:—"Order, order. The Hon'ble Member may rise to a point of order or for a personal explanation, and if Mr. Hailey is not here, Sir William Vincent who has yet to speak, can reply to the point."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"Subject to correction, I should like to say that though these disturbances continued till May or June there was no justification for the continuance of martial law. It was not necessary for a sporadic disturbance. According to all constitutional writers this rebellion, which I am assuming for the sake of argument, would justify martial law coming to an end by the 21st or 22nd of April. Therefore we need not ratify the action of the Executive Government in introducing a new procedure in removing the normal safeguards to which British Indian subjects of His Majesty are entitled. My submission is that the ordinary tribunal and normal procedure should have been followed. The judgments show that the normal procedure was not followed. There were 236 offences tried and my submission is that we as a legislature would not be justified in ratifying and validating all these convictions and sentences. Sir William Vincent had a very powerful argument in support of his position when he said that the Government of the Punjab felt that if these convictions are not upheld and if the men are let loose there will be no safety. Another argument was that if these men were tried over again this would lead to great public expense. My Lord, there is no escape from that. I do not want any man rightly convicted to escape, but Government could put these men on their trial in the ordinary courts and the public peace will not then be disturbed, people will have confidence that whatever may have been done in a time of panic, if done honestly and bona fide, Government rightly recognise any injustice that may have been committed and therefore will follow the normal procedure. Let the man be tried under the usual procedure, with the usual safeguards, a certain amount of money may have to be spent, but it would be usefully spent. There is no difficulty in the way of accepting the suggestion that has been thrown out that two High Court Judges, or ten High Court Judges should go into these sentences. My Lord, unless the Judges see the statements made by witnesses which have been recorded, I cannot see how the Judges are to deal with all the cases. I am sure where the records are full it will be competent for the Judges to set aside these convictions or advise the Government of India to do so. But where we have only pencil notes or no notes of evidence or where the evidence is meagre, my submission is the Judges will not be able to remedy matters, in some instances at least, inasmuch as we know a record has not been kept. It is impossible for the Government of India to inspire public confidence, and I feel it would be well for the Government not to press for clause 4, asking us to ratify whatever has been done under martial law by these tribunals. My Lord, a word, I think, is necessary from me in addition to what the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha said in reference to what fell from Mr. Malaviya. I have asked for certain information to be given, and for the publication of certain correspondence. The Government felt very rightly that in the public interests this should not be disclosed. I cannot help thinking that in the interests of the public it should be disclosed, so that both the parties may be ready for the tribunal. I think it would be well if both parties should state their case so that the truth may come out ; on the other hand, the view of Government may be justified on various points and the other people would not press it, so both parties would come prepared. In the absence of that information, and inasmuch as there is an uneasy feeling in certain sections it was the duty of the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya to bring forward the grievances of the people. This duty he has discharged and we are grateful to him for it. I maintain that in regard to the statements made, no one would have been more happy than many of us if these facts were untrue. But beyond one or two statements of officials, namely, whether a C. I. D. officer had been murdered or European officials suffered some injury I do not think there was any reply worth mentioning, but beyond one or two statements of an inconsequential nature, namely, as to whether a C. I. D. officer was insulted and as to whether particular European officers did not receive injury, I do not think on essential points there was any reply worth mentioning. That is a question, I suppose, of difference of opinion amongst the Council, but at any rate some of those points were not answered.

"Then, my Lord, ridicule is properly applicable to show up a man who makes pretensions which are absolutely unjustifiable. That is a perfectly legitimate weapon, but what was the occasion for the use of the strong language that was employed in regard to the Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya ? The Hon'ble Pandit has kindly shown me the correspondence, and we find that, unless the Hon'ble Mr. Thompson made a personal inquiry into the question of a corpse that was found in the well, which has absolutely no political aspect, it is rather difficult to say who is in the wrong. The people think that the administrators of this land lend a ready ear to those who always flatter them, to the police and to other officials. That is the trouble. Now the Hon'ble Mr. Thompson takes up the position of a Municipal Commissioner and tells us that 12 or 13 others went to the well and found nothing and 8 days afterwards they found a corpse. Meanwhile, it would not have been possible for that corpse to have been removed. As a matter of fact even the Commissioners seem to have taken the pains to see what was there. I only allude to this to show, my Lord, that on such scanty materials Hon'ble Members of this Council do not deserve attack and they require protection. Of course the protection is both ways, but, I think, my Lord, the Hon'ble Members were perfectly right.

"My Lord, I have tried my level best to see whether I could support this Bill. I have some difficulties along with the Government in pressing for a complete postponement of this measure. It is true that the officials have to be protected. I agree with Sir Sivaswami Iyer that it is incumbent upon the Government to bring in a Bill by way of a temporary measure to safeguard the interests of the officers who were employed in the work and protect them pending the result of an inquiry before Government makes up its mind as to how best to deal with these officers. That no reasonable man can object to. But, my Lord, notwithstanding some safeguards, there is great danger in giving undue protection to these officers, some of whom do not at least deserve any protection having regard to the events which have transpired. The officers, my Lord, were very anxious that their doings should not be known to the public. They shut out the general public from the Punjab; the Indian press in the Punjab was muzzled. Even Mr. Andrews who wanted to go there was prohibited. Under those circumstances is it strange in our saying they should wait patiently until the general public has had an opportunity of judging as to what has actually transpired? The officers did not want to take the public into their confidence, and therefore it is not unreasonable for us to ask that this measure should be postponed until the Committee of Inquiry has submitted its report; but I do not do even that, I ask the Government to give them temporary protection. But I cannot see my way either to ratify all these convictions and sentences or to give complete protection irrespective of the inquiry to every officer even subject to the safeguards mentioned."

6-12 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, this has been a day of telegrams and I should like to add my quota. I have received, as I am sure I ought to inform the Council, a telegram from the Wardha Home Rule League protesting against the introduction of this Bill. I have no doubt that this protest will meet with the consideration it deserves in this Council. The Hon'ble Pandit also referred to, and read out a telegram from, the Indian Association of Lahore. Members of this Government have also received the same telegram, but in their case it has not been signed, and it would be interesting if the Hon'ble Pandit could let us know by whom his copy is signed. The Secretary of that Association, I understand, is now confined in one of His Majesty's jails, and, I think, we ought to know who has signed it on his behalf. (After a pause).

I do not think I need wait till the Hon'ble Pandit . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Perhaps I have given it to the Reporters. So far as I can remember, it was not signed, but I am sure it was signed. I can say, my Lord, that the Indian Association is an Association of long standing in Lahore. (After a pause).

I have just got the original telegram. I had it in my pocket, I thought I had given it to the Reporters and it had not come. The telegram is not signed."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, I begin my remarks by saying that I regret very deeply the events which have happened in the Punjab and in other parts of India. No one deplores more than I do the loss of life, both Indian and European, which has occurred, and I would add no one deplores more than I do that it is in most cases the dupes who have suffered and the agitators behind them who have escaped. But my object in rising at this late hour in Council is not so much to express my regret, though I am glad to have the opportunity of doing so, but to deal as shortly as I can with the constitutional position of martial law in our polity in India.

And I doubt if, with all that has been said, the real position has been explained to the Council. The Hon'ble Pandit, I think it was, on a previous occasion contented himself with saying, as has been repeated to-day, that martial law is the negation of law. But an epigram like that never can contain more than a germ of the truth, and it was hardly sufficient for the Hon'ble Pandit and other lawyers who have followed him to dismiss the whole subject of martial law as summed up in that short epigram. There is a great deal more behind it which it is essential that we should consider in connection with this Bill. No doubt it is true in one sense that martial law is the negation of law, but in every civilized country in the world it steps into the place of the civil law when occasion requires. It is not only in our own Empire and in our own history that martial law has a definite place. It will be found in the constitution of pretty well every continental country of Europe. It is specifically provided for in the French constitution and is there known as a 'state of seige,'—I am translating of course. It can be declared, in France, by the President on the advice of his Ministers if the Chamber is not sitting. In our own constitution it has been known from the very earliest days. But before I come to the historical side, which I shall deal with—as shortly as I can—I think I should explain the basis of it. The law of which it is said to be the negation is the thing that provides for normal conditions, but for normal conditions only. Abnormal conditions are left to be met by extraordinary measures. The Code of Criminal Procedure in this country provides for police measures to deal with riots. If they get beyond the police, the police can call in the military to their aid, but it is still the civil arm which is dealing with what has occurred, and the military are called in to their aid only. If matters go beyond this, charge must be taken completely by the military. The law does not attempt to provide further than that. Abnormal conditions have now arisen, and the enforcement of law and order is, and has to be, handed over to those who can do it by force of arms. The line, I think Hon'ble Members will agree, between riot and insurrection and revolution is a very thin one in every case. What is a riot this morning may be an insurrection this afternoon, and a revolution to-morrow. If you are unable to put it down at the outset, you may find that a fire has been lighted which all the fire-engines of the country cannot extinguish. It is that thin line which is the difficulty in all such cases. There is the line first of all between disturbances which the police can quell by themselves, and others for which they must call in the aid of the military, and there is the line between what the police aided by the military can deal with, and the situation that must be handed over entirely to the military arm. Once that last line is overstepped, it is no longer a mere riot, conditions are no longer normal; it is a case for what we have called martial law, that the name is a convenient one and no more, I quite agree. It arises only when the civil arm is no longer able to maintain order. That is why it is a negation of the civil law; it is a negation of the law because the law has failed and for no other reason. Whatever we may like to call it, a rebellion or an insurrection, —whatever politicians in this country may like to call it—, we have to deal with the facts not with the words we use to describe them. The question we have to consider here is, whether at the time when martial law was put in force in India the situation was such that the civil authorities were unable to cope with it. Therefore, let us not quarrel over words or discuss the difference between rebellion, insurrection and revolution. The practical question before the Council is, whether there had arisen in the Punjab at this time a state of things with which the civil authorities were unable to deal. We have been told in this Council that no such state of things existed. I would much rather have left the question where my Hon'ble friend, Sir William Vincent, left it in his opening speech, not discussing whether it was necessary to proclaim martial law, but leaving that to be considered by the Commission. I would rather merely assume that martial law was declared, for, as my Hon'ble Colleague put it, it follows essentially from that that there must be an act of indemnification and validation. Some Hon'ble Members, led by that redoubtable champion of the liberties of the people, who is still sitting here after his temporary disappearance, thought fit to go into all the happenings, for what purpose, I frankly say, I cannot conceive. What this Bill proposes is that only acts which were done bona fide and which were believed to be reasonably necessary for the restoration or maintenance of order are to be the subject of indemnification, or validated in part, nothing else. The Hon'ble Pandit spent some hours telling us of a number of acts that would not be covered by the Act. He went through the whole history of what had happened in his own way recounting to us a great number of things which he told us could not have been bona fide, which could not have been necessary, and therefore, if I may say so, would not have been touched by this Act. What was his object, I repeat, I cannot conceive, unless possibly the time has come when it may be necessary for the Hon'ble Member again to seek re-election, and we may consider this as an election speech, in which, pace Mr. Sinha, terminological inexactitudes are often thought to be excusable. But it was not only the Hon'ble Pandit, but other Hon'ble Members have taken up definitely the position that there was never any situation (I am not attempting to put it in their own words) with which the civil law could not have coped. We began the other day with my Hon'ble friend Raja Sir Rampal Singh, whose absence I greatly regret to-day, for I dislike criticising any one in his absence, but he has, I may presume, thought it wise to beat a strategic retreat. The Hon'ble Raja Sir Rampal Singh, coming from the fastnesses of his ancestral castle in Oudh, said there was no rebellion, no insurrection—only a few little disturbances! Of course, sitting at home in safety, it was quite easy for him to say to himself there is no fire going on; there is no trouble! If you are a long way away and your house is not in danger of the conflagration, it is easy to take up this attitude. I strongly suspect that my Hon'ble friend from Oudh did not want to see the fire and I suggest that the most charitable way of looking at his speech is that it was written for him by a friend.

"Then we have my Hon'ble friend Mr. Ayyangar, who indeed is present, but whom I fear I shall not be able to make cognisant of my words at the moment. From the religious solitude of far Madras, he tells us again, that there was no rebellion, nothing serious was going on at all. I think the expression he used, so far as my memory serves me, was that only 'a few rash acts' were committed in the Punjab.

"Then we come to my Hon'ble friend Mr. Chanda. He put it in the forefront of his argument that there was no rebellion there, nothing that the civil arm could not deal with. And where does the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda come from? Assam! He too has come from the confines of India to say there were no serious disturbances in the Punjab. Can nobody tell us any better than this? Are there no members here who belong to the Punjab, who have been in the middle of these disturbances, who know what happened, who have seen what happened? There are surely many of them in this Council, but has any one of them told us that there was no rebellion in the Punjab, that there was nothing that could not be put down by the civil arm? Is it not an extraordinary fact that to find support for the opposite view you have to go to a member from Assam, a member from Madras—I am glad I do not have to speak in the plural of Madras—a member from the fastnesses of Oudh and, if I may say so, the self-constituted Special Commissioners from the United Provinces. Now, if other members of the services who sit here had not replied in detail to what I do not hesitate to call the monstrous statements of the Hon'ble Pandit, I should have taken some pains to reply to them in detail; but it is not necessary for me to do so now. Let me come now to the speeches of my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sarma and of my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sinha, who seems to think that we come here to talk about martial law and the doings in the Punjab with kid gloves on our tongues. I do not. Let us all say what we think. I shall not blame any Hon'ble Member who says what he really thinks, and surely in this Council I am entitled to say what I really think. But I will only say that the speech of my Hon'ble friend the Pandit was characterised by certain terminological inexactitudes, a phrase which has, I believe, parliamentary sanction. I have said that no member from the Punjab has come here to tell us that there was not a rebellion in the Punjab; I only use that word for convenience. But is there no one else to whom I can appeal who, at all events, does not bear the ticket of Government upon his back? I seem to remember one Horniman as somewhat of an ally of the party which the Hon'ble Pandit, I believe, now leads. I have some recollection of a letter of his published in the newspapers. It did not seem to accord with the view which is taken by his lieutenant now. I have got the words here - the expression used by Mr. Horniman of Bombay Chronicle fame, if I mistake not, was 'the recent deplorable revolutionary outbreaks'. Then there was another stout ally, a former ally at all events of that same party, Mrs. Annie Besant. I am sure many Hon'ble Members in this Council will remember the words of wisdom that fell from her with regard to the situation in the Punjab. Let me remind them, I quote from her letter in the 'Times of India' of the 19th of April 1919:—

> 'I ventured to urge before this movement was started that its logical result was riot and bloodshed, and to point to the danger of a revolutionary movement here. Surely what had happened in Europe was warning enough and I even noted the elements here on which Bolshevist propaganda might work. Are there not in the Punjab signs of such a movement? The cutting of telegraph wires, the derailing of troop-trains, the burning of railway stations, the attacks on banks, the setting free of jail birds, are not the actions of Satyagrahis nor even of casual rioters, but of revolutionaries.'

I understand that Mrs. Annie Besant has now been disowned as an ally of the party over which my Hon'ble friend, the Pandit, now presides with such skill, but those were words coming from the very party of which the Hon'ble Pandit is now the lieutenant, and I doubt if there is any Member of this Council who, if the proposition is put in the way I have put it, namely, whether there was a situation with which the civil arm was unable to cope, could do otherwise than admit the fact.

"Let us get so far in the argument. Now the next question that arises—I am dealing largely with theory now—is, is it or is it not the duty of every stable Government to maintain law and order in the country? I might go a little further, and say, is it not the first duty of every stable Government to do this? There again I think that even the Hon'ble Pandit will not venture to answer me in the negative. If it is so, if it is the first duty of Government to maintain the public peace, if that is accepted, does it not follow essentially from that that the Government must have the power to do so? If it is necessary to go beyond what I call the civil arm and invoke the direct intervention of the military, the situation is that which we describe as martial law. If it is the duty of Government to do that, do not Hon'ble Members think that it must follow that Government has the right to do it, and that there must be some sanction behind it? Writers on Constitutional Law have always struggled to find the sanction for martial law. There are three schools of thought which have existed in the past. The first school of thought, which has very much behind it historically, asserts that it is in the inherent power of the Crown to proclaim martial law. Let me not be misunderstood. I mean that if it is in the power of the Crown to put martial law in force, then the municipal courts are unable to take cognizance of cases arising out of it, because what has been done has been by the prerogative of the Crown. I say there is a great deal historically in favour of that view. I do not wish to trouble the Council at length with this, but I think it might interest Members to hear what such a great man as Pitt said in introducing the second Irish Indemnity Bill. He said:—'The Bill which I have to propose is not one to enable the Government of Ireland'—mark the word 'enable,' I am not merely emphasising it, it is in italics in the report—'to enable the Government in Ireland to declare martial law in districts where insurrection exists, for that is a power which His Majesty already possesses '. That is probably the locus classicus of the doctrine that it is a right and a power which the Crown inherently possesses, but it goes possibly a little further than that, because it has been recited that the Crown has that power in at least two Statutes which have been passed by Parliament, and therefore Parliament has at all events tacitly acquiesced in that doctrine. However many constitutional lawyers doubted whether the right of the Crown to enforce martial law could exist after the Constable's Court by which it was ordinarily enforced and by which trials were held had been abolished—and that was in the late Tudor times—and therefore they struggled to find a substitute for the prerogative of the Crown in the sanction of the Common Law itself which the opposite school always denied.

"Here again I do not wish to labour the point. The argument was that the power, as we lawyers say, flowed from the duty, the duty connoted the power following the legal maxim 'necessitas, quod cogit, defendit,' and there is a considerable school of thought who still maintain that position. But in more recent times another school of thought has taken what is possibly a half way course and argues that though there may be a prerogative right in the Crown, though there may be a power under the common law to enforce martial law, the safer view at all events to take is that martial law should be followed by validation and indemnity. I think Hon'ble Members will see that this is common sense in many ways. After the disturbances have been put down. we do not want the battles fought all over again in the Courts; what we want is peace and quiet. For this reason the policy has always been to validate afterwards in order to prevent these discussions in the Courts when the crisis is over. That view certainly holds the field in modern times, namely, that though martial law may not be necessarily the negation of law, though it may have a foundation in the law, yet it undoubtedly takes the place of the ordinary civil law in abnormal circumstances, and therefore it is always desirable, always even necessary, for the reasons I have given, that a Validation or Indemnity Act should follow it. Hon'ble Members have referred, particularly Mr. Sarma, to the Regulation of 1804, under which martial law at all events in some districts was put in force. That Regulation, as no doubt Hon'ble Members will remember, gives to the Government powers to establish martial law and for trials to be held by courts martial. Now, power to establish martial law is in itself a statutory sanction for martial law; remember that 'martial law' means, I need not cite again the quotation from Steven's History of Criminal Law, to which the Hon'ble Pandit has referred. Martial law means the military taking the place of the civil arm in order to enforce law and order. This power to establish martial law is derived from the Legislature, in the case of the Regulation of 1804, and we have to read into the words 'martial law' the various things which it connotes, that is to say, if we have statutory power to establish martial law, that makes legal ipso facto every act which can be justified by martial law. We in India therefore are in the position of having statutory power to proclaim martial law though it none the less leads us to resort to indemnity. But martial law has not been enforced under the Statute in all districts. It has been enforced under the inherent power in other places. I need only refer to the case of Bombay which is probably not covered by the Bengal Regulation. But notwithstanding that we have statutory power to put martial law into force in some parts of India, it is none the less necessary, for the reasons I have already given, to have an Indemnifying and Validating Bill. This, if I may say so, is agreed to by every sensible Member of this Council. The only argument I have heard against it is that of the Hon'ble Members who said that there were no serious disturbances in the Punjab, and of those who said ' By all means let us have an Indemnity Bill, but not to-day. ' Well, that it is necessary to have some Indemnity Act is beyond question. I will tell the Council in a moment what a length of precedent there is for it. But apart from its being strictly constitutional, I should like to put the question very plainly indeed to some of my Hon'ble friends in this Council, and I would appeal especially to my Hon'ble friend the Maharaja of Kassimbazar, whose speech indicated a somewhat hesitating acceptance of the proposals now before this Council. Do you or do you not want to be protected in your lives and property, whatever may happen in India ? Do you wish the Government to do what I have spoken of as the first duty of the Government, namely, to protect your life and property ? And that if they cannot do it through the Police, do you wish them to do it by the use of the Military ? Let us have a plain answer to that question from any one who is not prepared to agree to a Validating Bill. If you do not want it, tell the Government you do not want and the Government will not do it. Let me tell you this that if this Council will not indemnify the soldiers who have had to enforce martial law in order to preserve the public peace, they will not willingly do it again. You cannot place these unpleasant duties on your officers and at the same time leave them, as Mr. Chanda suggests, at the mercy of the Courts. That is not the way to treat officers whom you have asked to protect your lives and property. You have got to indemnify them at the earliest possible opportunity, and unless, I say, you do that, they cannot be asked to take any risks in protecting you. Why should they ? Why should a man, in order to protect your life and property or to protect my life and property or anyone else's, do that which he knows may subject him to the direst penalties of the law ? Remember when we talk of indemnifying officers, it is not the high officers of Government that you are asked to indemnify. It was the Gurkha soldiers who fired on the mob and, may be, killed people ; it is the Indian soldiers and Indian officers whom you are asked to indemnify just as much as the British officers. Every soldier who fires according to orders and, may be, kills a person may be liable under the common law of the country to be indicted for murder. If my property is in danger, or my life is in danger from a mob, whether it be in Amritsar, Delhi or Lahore, can I ask the soldiers to fire upon the mob to protect me if I am not prepared to back them up afterwards by an Indemnity Act at the earliest possible opportunity ? Surely not. Let Hon'ble Members come out into the open, let them say that they do not want to be protected, they do not want their lives and property to be protected, let them do what the Hon'ble Pandit suggested, constitute among themselves a body of watch and ward, let us get rid of the police . . . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"We do not want our lives to be protected at the expense of others."

The President :—"Order, order. The Hon'ble Member has had his say."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—"I thank the Hon'ble Pandit. It reminds me of a statement once made by one of the most eminent Judges in India to counsel who protested against being interrupted. He said do not worry, Mr. So-and-so ; an interruption always shows me where the shoe pinches. . . . . . .

(The Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya here rose to interject a remark.)

The President :—"The Hon'ble Member has for a long time been a Member of this Council and knows perfectly well what order means. I must ask him to observe order."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—"It may interest the Council to hear that I had the curiosity to have looked up in our reports the number of interruptions recorded in this Council during the whole of last year. The total was 51. Of these, the Hon'ble Pandit was responsible for 29. It appears to me that he has had rather more than his due share.

"Now, I say if you want officers of Government and soldiers under their orders to protect the lives and property of people, you must be prepared to indemnify them. I say it is necessary, and in accordance with common sense, and that it is in accordance with the practice of hundreds of years in this great Empire to which we have the honour to belong. The limits are perfectly well understood. The limits within which indemnity will be given are the limits of good faith and doing that which is reasonably necessary.

"They are clearly laid down in every book on Constitutional Law. We are not asking Hon'ble Members in this Council to go beyond that. I shall show in a moment that we are not asking them to go nearly so far as has been done in some cases. If Hon'ble Members will look back to constitutional history, they will note that in the earliest days the turbulent Barons were controlled by martial law.

"In Wat Tyler's rebellion in the time of Richard II martial law was put in force, and though it was directly contrary to the terms of the Magna Charta, men who had taken part in that rebellion were tried by court-martial or even put to death without any legal form of trial at all. Coming on to later times we find again put in force in Jack Cade's insurrection in Henry VI's reign. I do not want to go back for a precedent to ancient days. I only want to make it quite clear to the Council that the enforcement of martial law has been a part of the British constitution from the very beginning, from Norman times through Tudor times, down to the days of the Hanoverian House and on to the present day.

"When we come to the Georges, the questions involved are probably more important, as we get the Acts which have already been referred to. I do not propose to refer to them in any detail except to correct certain inexactitudes which have crept into the Hon'ble Pandit's arguments with regard to them. We have first of all the 1715 Act to which my friend the Hon'ble Pandit referred. I regret to have to refer to it again, but with almost characteristic inexactitude the Hon'ble Pandit only read from the preamble of the Act and forgot to read the operative part of the Act. He told us that the Act did not do what as a matter of fact it does. One cannot always, I am afraid, collate from the preamble to an Act what is enacted by it. But let me read on after the long preamble,—the enacting part is there. The only part which the Hon'ble Pandit did not read, as far as I remember, was this: 'All personal actions, etc., for anything done in order to suppress the Rebellion in 1716, shall be discharged. And if commenced again, the person sued may plead the General Issue, etc., Double Costs.' But the preamble was the only part in which the Hon'ble Pandit was interested, because he preferred to . . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"May I rise to a point of order?"

The President:—"On a point of order."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"I want to explain that I was arguing on the preamble, and it was not necessary for me to read the whole of the Act."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"Neither necessary, my Lord, nor advisable for my Hon'ble friend's arguments.

"I do not think I need say anything more about this. Hon'ble Members have heard the Act read, apart from the operative part, by my Hon'ble friend the Pandit.

"Next we come to the 1745 Act, and there again the Hon'ble Pandit's researches did not go far enough. The Hon'ble Pandit referred to 19, George III, Chapter XX, which was an Indemnity Act, and which was passed after the disturbances, but he apparently did not find out that before the rebellion began Parliament passed another Statute authorising martial law being put in force. Therefore, they began before the Pretender's invasion by authorising the putting in force of martial law, i.e., you have got curiously enough, almost the same position which we have in India now, that is to say, they were allowed by Statute to establish martial law, as we are here, yet after it was all over they proceeded to indemnify by the Statute to which the Hon'ble Pandit referred. The Indemnity Act of 1745 is practically in the same terms as the one of 1715. The Hon'ble Pandit put forward a tentative argument with regard to these Acts that they can be no model for us because they were dealing with invasions from outside, 'rebellions' in what may be called the technical sense. He suggested that that was quite a different case. There he said 8,000 Scotsmen flocked to the Pretender's flag and there was a regular war. But I am afraid that argument is destroyed entirely by the next Act of 1780 which dealt with the Gordon riots,—as the Gordon riots were nothing in the world if not a purely internal disturbance. My Hon'ble friend Mr. Hailey reminded you of their history,—most Members of this Council will no doubt remember the story in 'Barnaby Rudge,' it was hardly more than a riot, but a riot in the morning which might have been a rebellion in the afternoon, and it had to be dealt with by martial law. In that case there was, I believe, no statutory power given to proclaim martial law, but afterwards Parliament granted an indemnity in respect of all the acts that were done. I may perhaps read from the Act of 1780 again. It is very interesting, because it shows how far Parliament went. After the part the Hon'ble Pandit cited namely:—'Divers Acts which cannot be justified by the strict Forms of Law, and yet were necessary'—that is the part the Hon'ble Pandit read—it goes on 'That All Personal Actions and Suits, Indictments and Informations, which have been, or shall be, commenced or prosecuted, and all Molestations, Prosecutions, Proceedings whatsoever, and Judgments thereupon (if any be), against the said Magistrates, or other Persons for, or by reason of any Act, Matter or Thing commanded or done on the Occasions, and for the Purposes aforesaid, or any of them before the twentieth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, shall be discharged and made void; and every Person, by whom any such Act, Matter or Thing, which shall have been commanded or done, before the said twenty-fourth Day of June, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, shall be freed, acquitted and indemnified, as well against the King's Majesty. * * * '

"It will be seen that the Hon'ble Pandit was again somewhat inaccurate in saying that it had only a very limited application. It may seem so if you read only the preamble, but if you read the operative part of the Act, it indemnifies and makes good every act done by every person for the suppression of that rebellion.

"Well, let me continue the history as shortly as I can. We come next to the Irish trouble in 1798, which resulted in what is often called the Battle of Vinegar Hill.

"There, again, they not only had the Indemnity Act, 41 George III, C. 104, but Parliament gave beforehand power under Act 39, Geo. III, C. 11, to enforce martial law. So, again, the position was almost exactly what we have here. First of all the power given by the Legislature to put martial law in force, and secondly, the indemnity for anything done under it. It is in connection with the 1798 rebellion in Ireland that the case of Wright and Fitzgerald arose. I think the Hon'ble Pandit referred to it, or, at all events, to the summing up of Mr. Justice Chamberlayne. It is a typical and illustrative case and, I think, the Council may like to know just a little bit more about it. Fitzgerald was a High Sheriff and Wright, as the Hon'ble Pandit told us, was a school master. Fitzgerald ordered Wright, at any rate according to the allegation, to be flogged with 500 stripes (they did not do things by half measures in those days), and he was flogged, and according to the evidence flogged in Fitzgerald's presence, under the most harrowing circumstances, circumstances, I may say, almost as harrowing as those which the Hon'ble Pandit, with such oratorical effect, described to us yesterday. The Judge summed up, as the Hon'ble Pandit has told the Council, there was a sympathetic Irish jury, and he was awarded £500 damages. The Hon'ble Pandit did not care to read any further than that. If he had looked on a little further, he would have seen that the case went on to the Court of Exchequer and was quashed and Fitzgerald, the High Sheriff, got his full costs. Therefore, the end was not quite where the Hon'ble Pandit left it. So much for Vinegar Hill and Wright and Fitzgerald.

"Now let us pass on to 1803, Emmett's Insurrection it is usually called. That was a case which was curiously like the present one. A mob went about in Dublin killing everybody they met who did not belong to their persuasion. In a fit of what, I suppose, my Hon'ble friend Mr. Ayyangar would call rashness, or it may have been pleasantry, they killed the Lord Chief Justice. There was no time for Parliament to authorise the proclamation of martial law, but the Government put it in force and they passed the usual Indemnity Act 43, George III, C. 117. I do not wish to speak about martial law in Ireland at this day, though it is a matter which touches us very nearly. Many Members of this Council may no doubt know that Ireland is at present under martial law, but they have not got to the indemnity stage yet. Let us now go to South Africa. I am only endeavouring to show the Council how entirely constitutional the putting in force of martial law is when the civil arm cannot cope with disturbances, and that in every case it is almost necessarily followed by an Indemnity Act at the earliest possible moment. In South Africa, the story begins with 1835; again in 1846, and again in 1850, martial law had to be put into effect, and in every case there was an Act of Indemnity passed by the local Legislature. The case, therefore, is in this respect nearer to our own. Then in 1900 and again in 1902 and again in 1914 in South Africa, we find martial law in force and Indemnity Acts passed which the Hon'ble Pandit has or would have referred to, if he had had the books. In 1900 there was Act VI of 1900 which was a full Indemnity Act, much fuller than this one. I think perhaps I may go into the terms of it very shortly. Hon'ble Members will find in that Act that very objectionable clause which, I think, my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sarma, and, if I remember aright, Mr. Sinha, have referred to; 'every such act, matter or thing referred to in the preceding sections shall be presumed to have been advised, commanded, ordered, directed or done, as the case may be, in good faith until the contrary shall be proved by the party complaining.' The terms are little wider than in our Bill. By that Act they indemnified people in respect of 'any acts, matters and things whatsoever in good faith advised, commanded, ordered, directed or done as necessary.' I draw attention to those words because, in drafting the Bill which is before the Council, we have had all these models before us, and what we have in the Bill about 'in the reasonable belief that it was necessary,' is merely a translation of the expression I have quoted which you find all through these recent South Africa Acts—I mean 'done as necessary.' I think any lawyer will agree with me that 'done as necessary' means done in the belief that it was necessary. But in order that there should be no doubt about it, we have thought it was better to translate it into plainer language.

"When we come to the second of the more modern South Africa Acts, we find exactly the same words; it is to be an indemnity 'for or on account of or in respect of any acts, matters and things whatsoever in good faith advised, commanded, ordered, directed or done as necessary for the suppression of hostility and the establishment and maintenance of good order.' Then, again, there is exactly the same clause with regard to the presumption; 'every such act, matter or thing referred to in the preceding section shall be presumed to have been advised, commanded, ordered, directed or done, as the case may be, in good faith until the contrary is proved.'

"Let me for one moment dismiss, if I can do so, the argument that has been raised on this. It has been suggested that we are doing something outrageous in providing in this Act that the onus of proving ill-faith is to be on the man who alleges. But is this not the essence of our criminal law? I may be wrong in thinking so, but this is why I ventured to interrupt my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sinha, who put forward, as I thought, the suggestion that it was not for the prosecution in criminal cases to prove intent or ill-faith. But, is it not the basis of the law which we have inherited from the British constitution, that you presume every man to be innocent until the contrary is proved? And does this go any further than that? At all events, it has been adopted in every modern Validation Act, and we have frankly followed on the same lines. I was asked by the Hon'ble Pandit whether I had taken the Act of 1906 for my model. I told him that the actual model was the most recent Act of all, the 1915 Act. I think probably the Council will agree with me that, so far as I am responsible for the drafting of any Bill, I follow the most recent model; and that is what I have done, though, as I said before, we have, I believe, examined every Indemnity Act we could get before we started to draft this Bill.

"Now as to Act XI of 1915, of which I am glad I was able to give my copy to the Hon'ble Pandit though I am afraid rather late. It provides that 'every act, matter or thing referred to in sub-section (1)—the general words are in the previous section—'shall be presumed to have been advised, commanded, ordered, directed or done (as the case may be) in good faith until the contrary is alleged and proved by the party complaining.' We have that again. Then we have the specific provision with regard to sentences, which again I may read and, I think, Hon'ble Members will see that our Bill does not go nearly as far as this really.

'The several courts-martial and military and special tribunals constituted and convened by or on the authority of the Government or its officers during the period aforesaid for the trial and punishment of persons guilty of treasonable, seditious or rebellious conduct, or of persons subject to military law shall be deemed to have been constituted in accordance with law, and the several sentences pronounced by all such courts and tribunals, as well as by Magistrates' courts or other inferior courts, for any contravention of, or failure to comply with, any law or statutory regulations known as martial law regulations, or any orders or instructions, given on the authority thereof, are hereby confirmed.'

Hon'ble Members will notice that we have not gone as far as that in our Bill. Sub-section (2) says:—

(2) 'Every person confined in any prison, gaol, lock-up, or in any other place whatever under and by virtue of any such sentence aforesaid shall continue liable to be confined therein or elsewhere as the Minister of Justice may direct, until the expiration of such sentence, or until released by the Governor General in the exercise by him of the Royal mercy, or until otherwise discharged by lawful authority.'

(3) Every such sentence shall be deemed to be a sentence passed by a duly and legally constituted court of the Union, and shall be carried out or otherwise dealt with in the same manner as the sentences of such a court.'

Those are the material sections of the latest South African Act, and there is a great deal more in it that my Hon'ble friends will see follows largely the previous models of 1900 and 1902.

"Then if I may pass away from South Africa and follow up the other cases in which martial law has been proclaimed and followed by indemnity, we have the very well-known case of Jamaica in 1865. A long pamphlet dealing with all that happened has been published at the Tribune Office, an office, I think, not unknown to my Hon'ble friend the Pandit; and it was to me rather remarkable that he did not refer to the contents of that pamphlet in any way at all. Perhaps we should be glad he did not or he might have been addressing the Council till now. But there was much in that pamphlet which, I am sure, gave him food for reflection. It deals with the well-known case of Governor Eyre. He arrested a man called Gordon, who was believed to be the centre of the insurrection in Jamaica, outside the martial law area altogether, and executed him. An Indemnity Act was passed by the local Legislature, and then Gordon's widow came to England and prosecuted Eyre under an Act which allows Colonial Governors to be prosecuted in England, for the death of her husband, claiming damages. The case was a cause célèbre at the time, and allegations much like those that have been made by the Hon'ble Pandit were made with regard to the doings in Jamaica. The case came before the Grand Jury. The Grand Jury were charged by one of the greatest of Judges, and they did as they were entitled to do, as men of common sense would do presumably in such a case, they threw the indictment out and there was an end of it; they would not allow it even to be tried. There was another case to which the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha, if I remember aright, referred in connection with the Jamaica riots. That was the case of Eyre and Phillips. But the sole question there was, whether Eyre the Governor was within the Indemnity or not; there was no other question concerned. My Hon'ble friend Mr. Sinha has referred to the report of the case in the Queen's Bench. I should have liked to refer to the report in the Court of Exchequer, but when I asked for the book, I found that the Hon'ble Pandit had unfortunately taken it away to the farthest end of Simla. It has now been given to me, but too late for me to quote. All I need point out is, that the only question before the Court was whether this case was covered by the Indemnity Act or not, whether an Indemnity Act passed by a local Council could indemnify its own Governor because he was a party to it. I am speaking from recollection, but, I think, the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha will agree that that was substantially the sole question decided in that case.

"Then let us come nearer home, to Ceylon. In Ceylon, they had martial law in 1848 and they had a local Indemnity Act there, but I am afraid I have not got it. The same thing happened in St. Vincent in 1862; martial law proclaimed and followed by an Indemnity Act. And as the Council have been told, in India, after the Mutiny, we had an Indemnity Act, Act XXXIV of 1860. It is rather material perhaps to refer to that Act because Hon'ble Members will at all events see that, in bringing this Bill before the Council, we have not gone as far as we might have. The Act of Indemnity of 1860 was in very wide terms. I need only read section 2, which is the material one.

> 'All acts done since the tenth day of May, 1857, in connection with the late disturbances by officers of Government or by persons acting under their authority or otherwise, in pursuance of an order of Government, or which shall have been or shall be ratified by the executive Government, are hereby confirmed.'

That meant that the Executive Government was made the sole arbiter as to whether a man was to be indemnified for a particular act or not. Surely we have got a good deal more liberal a measure here, in that we leave it to the Courts to decide whether any act complained of was done bona fide and in the reasonable belief that it was necessary for the suppression of disorder.

"With regard to the question of reasonable belief, which has been somewhat attacked, it may be useful to read to the Council what one of the greatest Lord Chancellors said in the House of Lords in a debate on the Gordon Riots in 1780. It appears to me very material on this point. Lord Thurlow was the Lord Chancellor at the time, and he came down from the Woolsack to address the House. Of course I am not going to read the whole speech, but only a very short passage. Hon'ble Members will remember that the Gordon Riots were purely civil disturbances. There was no case of an invasion from outside. The Gordon Riots were very similar to the present case. They were an attempt to overawe the Government and induce them to repeal the Catholic Disabilities Act which had recently been passed. The cry was 'No Popery' 'Repeal, repeal.' This was very much like the object of these disturbances in the Punjab which was to get this very timorous Government to repeal the Rowlatt Act. Lord Thurlow said:

> 'Under these circumstances it was, and after it had been in vain endeavoured to quell the riots by the intervention and authority of the Civil Power, that the Military were employed; and therefore, the case being so far similar to the Rebellion in 1715 and 1745, that there was an actual insurrection, that the laws of the land were trampled under foot, and the King's Government opposed. The military as well as everyone in a brown coat were justified in the commission of such trespasses and acts of homicide for the purpose of restoring the public peace as were justifiable in the year 1715 and in the year 1745.'

This disposes entirely of what I may call the argument of the Hon'ble Pandit that martial law is only applicable where there is a case of invasion. In the Gordon Riots the military and private persons were entitled to do everything that they were entitled to do in 1715, and in 1745 when martial law, as Hon'ble Members will remember, had actually been declared by Act of Parliament, though here it had not. I will continue my quotation 'to do everything that was justifiable in the years 1715 and 1745 for the purpose of putting an end to the rebellion then on foot in the Kingdom. Not that he meant to say that either soldiers individually or collectively any more than private persons might not in their endeavours to quell the outrages, etc., lately committed have been guilty of some things which, under a cool legal investigation would appear to be contrary to law and punishable either by the Common or Statute Law of the Realm, for, undoubtedly, in opposing, repressing, and quelling such daring outrages as had been perpetrated, the military, as well as individuals, must necessarily have been forced into excesses; but when the occasion was duly considered, and the extreme hurry and violent confusion in which all men who joined in restoring the public peace were obliged to act, those excesses would be seen to have been unavoidable, and to be the proper objects of an Act of Indemnity, but not an Act more necessary for the military than for other persons who had done as the military had done, and been instrumental in effecting that good purpose which the military had effected.'

"My Lord, I think three points emerge very clearly from this speech of Lord Thurlow. The first is, that the power of enforcing martial law where disturbances have gone beyond the civil arm is very akin to the right of self-defence; it is so not in the case of soldiers only, but of everybody else. Secondly, it shows that we should look at the acts done in the light in which the Council are asked to look at them under this Bill, namely, considering whether the persons who did them did them in good faith and in the reasonable belief that they were necessary. The third point is quite clear from what the Lord Chancellor says. In doing that we have to take into account the circumstances of the time, the excitement of the moment, and the fortunate fact that the man may have no one to consult. These are the legitimate circumstances which have to be taken into account. That, I venture to submit, is very material. In this connection I draw the attention of Council to the fact that the Bill reserves power to Government to prosecute in any case where it may find it necessary. No one in dealing with this Bill has referred to that point. Clause 6 (c) runs 'Nothing in this Act shall prevent the institution of proceedings by or on behalf of the Government against any person in respect of any matter whatsoever.' Thus Government is not precluded from taking any action against an officer that is necessary. Then I draw attention to clause 6 (b), in which though we have confirmed sentences we have not gone nearly as far as was the case in the South Africa Acts. We have left the right of appeal to the Privy Council fully open. Under that clause if any appeal goes to the Privy Council, it will be decided as if this Act had not been passed. We cannot do more. If these sentences are monstrously unjust, if these tribunals have no jurisdiction, if there has been a denial of justice, if there has been a travesty of justice, (I believe I am correctly repeating expressions which have been used in this Council), the Courts are open and in England, the Privy Council will listen to any appeal on these grounds if a case can be made out. Years ago in Dillet's case it was laid down on what lines the Privy Council will hear appeals in criminal cases. If, as I say, there has been any denial of justice, we have left it open to the person aggrieved to go to the Privy Council, if there has not been a denial of justice, surely the sentences must be confirmed.

"There is much I should like to say in answer to my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sinha and again in answer to the speech of my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sarma, but I am afraid that at this hour I must resist the temptation. However, I cannot help referring in conclusion to one dictum of my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sinha. He said 'what is the good of my trying to persuade the Government.' I think I may console myself with the retort 'What is the good of my trying to persuade Mr. Sinha?'"

7-20 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha:—"My Lord, I did not intend to make a speech of more than 10 minutes, but after the very lucid and illuminating speech of my Hon'ble friend the Law Member I shall detain them for even a briefer time. I think every Member of the Council must feel grateful to Sir George Lowndes for his very clear and convincing exposition of the legal and constitutional technicalities to which the Hon'ble Pandit and the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma had taken such pains to expatiate on in their respective speeches After the light thrown on these technicalities by Sir George Lowndes and the terse manner in which he expounded the facts and the circumstances under which the various Indemnity Bills referred to by the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya had been enacted, I am fully convinced that there cannot be any two opinions on the expediency of the introduction of the Bill originally. I am free to confess I was in favour of the amendment for the postponement moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Chanda, but I repeat I cannot help supporting the legislation after the clear exposition of the Hon'ble the Law Member. Before the Hon'ble the Law Member made his speech I was a little doubtful as to whether or not I should accept the Bill, but having heard it explained to-day by the Hon'ble the Law Member with his usual forensic ability, a fact with which we were familiar in Bombay before he came here, I think the Council will be satisfied that the Bill should be allowed to pass. Well, there was one point that puzzled me and it is this. In all the cases put before us I should like to know from the Hon'ble the Law Member or the Hon'ble the Home Member whether the inquiry that is now going to be made will clash with the Bill, that is to say, what will be the effect if the Commission think that certain officers had committed such excesses that they could not be tolerated and therefore of course that they must not be indemnified. I should like to know also if there are any instances, as in the present case, of an Indemnity Bill being followed by a Committee of Inquiry."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, may I answer the question?"

The President:—(Addressing Sir Dinshaw Wacha). "Do you wish Sir George Lowndes to answer that question?"

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha :—" Yes, for this reason that a doubt exists in the minds of some people in Bombay and other places. They think that a postponement is necessary in order that we may know exactly the scope of the inquiry."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—" The question has rather a double barrel aspect. In the first place as regards the South African case there was a Commission of Inquiry appointed by the very Act which granted the Indemnity. That very Act created the Commission; therefore although there was a Commission of Inquiry an Act of Indemnity was passed. The Commission appointed by His Majesty was empowered to inquire into sentences and they validated the Acts just as we do now.

" The second aspect of the question was whether the Act will in any way affect the position. I have not the least hesitation in answering that question. The only thing that we by the Bill seek to validate are acts done bona fide for the maintenance of law and order, and the Council may take it from me that this Bill will not in any way prejudice the Commission of Inquiry."

The Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha :—" I am satisfied, my Lord, and I hope other Members of Council are satisfied too. I support the Bill."

The Hon'ble Mr. K. V. Rangaswamy Ayyangar :—" My Lord, I cannot attend the night Session of the Council as my health does not permit of it in this cold Simla night, however much I may wish to be here to cite my reasons against the introduction of the Bill. So I have to forego the discharge of my duty I owe to my Punjab brethren. 7-25 P.M.

" But I have to say a word in connection with the remarks of the learned Law Member who has charged me for minimising the Punjab incidents, for my saying that some of those disturbances were rash acts, committed by stray individuals. This is quite a different charge from that brought by the Home Member the other day! By rash acts I only meant that the disorders were due to the passing excitement of some stray members of the crowd, and that they were not at all due to an organised conspiracy. I had separately mentioned the horrible murders of Amritsar and other places and so by rash acts, I was referring to the unlawful incidents at Lahore and similar places where the mob did not obey the orders of officers but assembled in meetings and joined processions.

" I did not at all minimise or tried to minimise events at the Punjab either the murder of Europeans or that of Indians. On the other hand, my Lord, some of my European friends charge me for over-estimating the events there and caring too much for them. I did not say that murder and arson committed by the mob were rash acts or the loss of life of nearly 300 people, as the Hon'ble the Home Member put the estimate of deaths, was a rash act. I was and am only grieved to find that the sacredness of human life and human misery has not at all been seriously taken into consideration either in the Punjab or in the discussion here. While the massacre of the Armenians gives so much uneasiness that it outrages the sense of humanity and all the finer instincts of the English nation, it is only unfortunate that the grave incidents committed at the Jullianwalla Bagh, the throwing of bombs from aeroplanes at Gujranwala and such other incidents do not provoke similar sentiments in the same nation.

"I cannot but commend to the Council the suggestion which my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Sarma, pointed out and which emanated from Sir Sivaswamy Iyer, the President of the Madras Liberal League. Sir Sivaswamy Iyer has wired to the Secretary of State as follows :—'Introduction now of the Punjab Indemnity Bill is exciting much dissatisfaction. Adjustments of principle and scope of indemnity to necessities of the case will be practicable only after the Inquiry Commission. If immediate legislation is needed, we would strongly suggest a mere suspensory Bill, suspending actions and prosecutions against officers pending the Commission and appeals in Privy Council, and suspending limitations against the parties aggrieved.' This expedient should satisfy the Government, but should the Government insist on the Indemnity Bill, it should be followed by an Amnesty Bill vouchsafing amnesty to all those who are dealt with by martial law. This will go a long way to soothe the bitter feelings."

7-29 P.M. The President :—"Before calling on Sir William Vincent to reply to the debate, I should like to state that Mr. Chanda who moved the amendment is absent to-day through ill-health, and that is the reason why Mr. Chanda is not here to reply to the debate on his amendment. Hon'ble Members will remember that when this debate was begun it was on the clear understanding that there should be one debate on the amendment as well as on the substantive motion for leave to introduce the Bill, and I told Mr. Chanda at that time that that would not preclude him from having a right of reply on his amendment. I now call on Sir William Vincent to reply."

7-30 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, I do not know if I shall be in order if, before replying on this debate, I give to Council some new information, with reference to the Committee of Inquiry. I think the Council will be interested to know that the Secretary of State has now sanctioned the addition of one Indian and one European member to that Committee. This information has really no connection with the Bill, but it is a matter in which the Council is greatly interested.

"My Lord, when I closed my opening speech on this Bill, I said that I had avoided, as far as possible, prejudicing any question that would come before the Committee or saying anything that might provoke racial feeling. I believe it has generally been accepted by this Council that that was my attitude. But I was a little surprised to be accused by the Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya, of all people in this Council, of attempting to prejudice the work of the Committee and that, because I had ventured to put it to the Council,—and I think Sir George Lowndes also said the same thing,—that if the Committee of Inquiry appointed to inquire into this matter found that a man had acted reasonably and bonâ fide, I was quite sure they would not hold him in any way to blame. Well, after I spoke the Council heard the various statements made by the Hon'ble Member himself, attempts to create prejudice, to minimise various facts and to place before Council ex parte statements as to particular incidents on which it was suggested that this Council should condemn particular officers or particular actions. My Lord, the Hon'ble Member has received such severe . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"May I rise to a point of order, my Lord?"

The President :—"Personal explanation or point of order?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"A correction, my Lord."

The President :—"Personal explanation?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"Exactly, my Lord. I never said that the Council should condemn any officer on ex parte statements. I said their actions should be sifted by the Committee of Inquiry and then judgment pronounced."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, the Hon'ble Member has received such severe castigation from the Hon'ble the Law Member that it really would be an act of cruelty to say anything more of his speech. I can only say that, even if I had in any way been guilty of attempting to prejudice the decision on any point by the Committee or of creating an atmosphere of bias in respect of any matter, it would have been a case of Satan reproving the sin, for no man has been more guilty in that respect than the Hon'ble Member himself. But I leave it to Council to judge if I said anything which could prejudice the inquiry. My Lord, I regret very much, however, that an attempt has been made by the Hon'ble Member and by others to place particular incidents before the Council to make ex parte statements as to what happened on particular occasions, because I think that statements on the one side necessarily evoke from others contradiction, and that this Council was therefore placed in a very unfortunate position in regard to such incidents—incidents of which as the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha said, the Council do not know much of which they now have had stories from one side and stories from the other, and I feel that it would have been much better if both sides had left all these incidents alone. Such a course would not havelaffected this Bill and Council could have left the whole of the facts to the Committee of Inquiry to decide.

"I must, however, myself quite clearly disclaim any intention to justify any particular action. It was for instance suggested that I was attempting to indemnify officers who were concerned in the Jhalianwalla Bag incident. My Lord, I had no such intention, nor can such an intention be deduced from the Bill. The question whether these officers will be indemnified or not will depend on the findings of Courts as to whether their action was bona fide, and reasonable or not. I do not seek in any way to prejudge the point.

"In the course of the debate the Hon'ble Sir Dinshaw Wacha inquired whether the passing of this Bill would in any way affect the Committee of Inquiry. The answer has been given. The Committee of Inquiry is an administrative Committee. Its report will have no legal effect. The result will be, when it reports that the opinions and recommendations will have to be decided by the authorities in order to see whether any person is to be punished or censured or commended administratively; but that has nothing whatever to do with the Courts. That Report will not be evidence in the Court. The legal liability of those concerned is a separate matter and can only be settled by either the common law or a Bill of this character.

"My Lord, it has been said that martial law was not necessary. I was anxious to abstain from expressing any view on the point at present; but as the subject has been dealt with at such length, I wish to add one word to the discussion, and that is to read the actual message—if I may with your Lordship's permission do so—on which the Government of India declared martial law. The Council have learned from Mr. Hailey's speech and from other Members all the incidents which preceded the 13th of April, and it is not necessary for me to reiterate them. Well, on that day, all other telegraphic communication being cut, we received the following message by wireless telegraph :—

'Railway stations between Kasur and Amritsar looted, British soldier killed.' (As a matter of fact there were two) 'Two British officers injured at Kasur.' (There were more people than two injured) 'Bands of rebels reported on the move, Kasur treasury attacked; state of open rebellion exists in parts of the districts of Lahore and Amritsar. Lieutenant-Governor with the concurrence of the General Officer Commanding the 16th Division and Chief Justice of the High Court requests the Governor General in Council to direct him to suspend the functions of the ordinary criminal courts in Amritsar and Lahore districts and establish martial law therein and direct the trial of offenders under section 2 of Regulation 18 of 1914. Situation critical. Moveable column starts marching from Ferozepore to Amritsar through worst tract with guns to-morrow.'

"I want to put it to any Member of this Council whether, if he had been a Member of the Government of India at that time, with the information which is now before the Council, on receipt of a telegram of that kind, he would not have acted exactly as the Government of India did: if any officer would have dared to take the responsibility of not accepting a recommendation of that character. That is all, my Lord, on the question of martial law, but I think that this message adds to the information before the Council.

"My Lord, it has been said that this present Bill goes too far. I do not think it necessary for me in any way to discuss that point. It has been fully debated already by the Hon'ble the Law Member. Many detailed criticisms of various clauses were put forward which, if I may say so, appeared to me to be irrelevant in a debate of this character. We ought now really only to discuss the question as to whether an Indemnity Act of this character is necessary or not, and that is a question about which, I believe, nearly all the Members in this Council have been now convinced. It has been said, however, that we ought to postpone the Bill, because actions will not be brought at once, or if they are brought, postponement may be secured. Another suggestion was, 'you should bring the Act in now, but make it an Act which will only suspend civil or criminal proceedings against officers.' I would point out in answer to these suggestions that an action begun now may be decided before any Indemnity Act could be passed after the report of the Committe is received, and any lawyer member of this Council will know how difficult it would be to pass an Indemnity Act in regard to a suit either commenced or decreed. As to pending suits, is it fair that we should leave officers who, ex hypothesi, as I said before, have done their duty, with a possibility of being sued—or that we should say to them 'Well, you may be indemnified for doing what was right or you may not, we will tell you that six months later, when the Committee of Inquiry, which has nothing really whatever to do with your legal liabilities, has decided some other point.' I submit that is not a right position for Government to take.

"My Lord, there is only one other matter to which I wish to draw attention and that arises out of the remarks made by the Hon'ble Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia. He asked me to give him an assurance that those who gave evidence before the Committee would in no sense be harassed by the police. I am glad to give him that assurance, and I am quite sure that His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor will give full effect to it.

"Another point was that I was asked whether if the Committee should find that any officer of Government had been guilty of improper conduct, he would be punished. My Lord, I have already said that it is our hope that we may be able to publish the report of this Committee, and it is certainly not our intention to treat the recommendations of this body as of no account in so far as we may accept their views. Any recommendations which they make will have to be considered, and such action as we think necessary will certainly be taken upon them."

The motion for postponement of the Bill was put and negatived.

The motion that leave be given to introduce the Bill was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I now introduce the Bill and move that the Bill, together with the Statement of Objects and Reasons relating thereto, be published in the Gazette of India in English."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Council then adjourned till Tuesday, the 23rd September, 1919, at 11 A.M.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

(5 & 6 Geo. V, Ch. 61.)

The Council met at the Council Chamber, Viceregal Lodge, Simla, on Tuesday, the 23rd September, 1919.

PRESENT:

The Hon'ble SIR GEORGE LOWNDES, K.C.S.I., K.C., Vice-President, presiding, and 41 Members, of whom 36 were Additional Members.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum asked :— 11-5 A.M.

Exclusion of Germans and enemy subjects from India.

1. "With regard to the position of subjects of late enemy countries and their return to India, will Government be pleased to state :—

(a) for how long they are prepared to exclude Germans and subjects of other late enemy countries from India ?

(b) what steps they are taking regarding Article 438 of the Peace Treaty ?

(c) whether they are prepared to permanently exclude German missions from India ? and

(d) what circumstances will guide them in making exceptions to repatriation of interned enemy subjects ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"(a) The Government of India are in correspondence with the Secretary of State for India on the subject of the admission into, or exclusion from, India of subjects of countries which are or have been at war with His Majesty. They hope to be in a position very soon to make a public announcement of their policy in this matter.

(b) The properties and undertakings of all German missions in India, including the Basel Mission Trading Company, have been vested in the provincial Custodians of Enemy Property, boards of trustees have been formed, and the properties and undertakings are being transferred from the Custodians to the trustees in accordance with Article 438 of the Peace Treaty.

(c) The Government of India will act in accordance with any decision which may be arrived at by His Majesty's Government. His Majesty's Government have decided that missionary and other philanthropic societies or organizations of alien enemy nationality, and their individual members of alien enemy nationality or birth, irrespective of their religious belief, cannot be re-admitted to India for a period which may be defined hereafter.

(d) The Government of India have decided that every German and Austrian at present in India is to be repatriated, subject to exceptions only in cases where there are very special reasons for granting exemption from repatriation. Each case will be considered on its merits. Exemption might be granted on the ground that an individual was by birth a British subject; that he has married and brought up a family in India and has entirely severed his connection with his own country; or that he is a native of territory which has ceased to be German or Austrian territory as a result of the Peace Treaty. But it is impossible to specify all circumstances which the Government of India might think sufficient.

In the United Kingdom, in the case of Germans married to British-born wives and deported from England to Germany, the wives have been allowed to stay in England or follow their husbands to Germany, as they preferred. In the case of British-born children of such parents, the law does not authorize the deportation of British subjects, but it has been the practice in England to include the names of very young children in the mother's permit. When the children are of school-going age or over, each case has been dealt with individually. In such cases the practice has been to make inquiries and try to ascertain whether the children wished to go or stay, and in the latter event whether there were relatives in England who could take care of them. The Government of India propose to be guided by the same principles in dealing with British-born wives and children of Germans and Austrians who were interned in India and are to be repatriated."

"The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—"May I ask a supplementary question? Can the Hon'ble Member say how soon he will be able to give a definite answer to (a)?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"We have telegraphed about this matter to the Secretary of State recently, but I am unable to say the exact date on which a final decision will be reached."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum asked :—

Evasion of Indian Income-tax.

2. "(a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to an announcement reported to have been made by the Secretary of State in the House of Commons on 17th July regarding apparent evasion of Indian income-tax?

(b) What steps are Government taking to improve the machinery of collection and to prevent evasion?"

" (a) Yes.

(b) The Government of India are fully aware of the importance of improving income-tax assessment and preventing evasion. Before the passing of the new Act they had put to Local Governments (which, it should be remembered, are in charge of the administration of income-tax) the question whether the time had not come for the more general employment of specially trained and whole-time income-tax establishments. The importance of tightening the administration has been generally recognised; and though the diversity of conditions in the several provinces renders the application of any uniform system impracticable, the majority of Local Governments are, it is understood, taking up the suggestion, and it may interest the Hon'ble Member to learn that recently in the cities of Calcutta, Bombay and Rangoon, the income-tax establishments have been considerably strengthened. Special additions have also been made to the staff in the Punjab, the United Provinces and Madras, while certain improvements in the machinery have been introduced in the districts of Bengal. It is hoped that with this strengthening of the assessing staff a progressive improvement will be secured in the direction of enforcing liability to the tax where it is now being evaded. The Government of India also hope to obtain from Mr. Watkins, the expert in income-tax administration, whose services have been kindly lent to them in connection with the Excess Profits Duty by the Board of Inland Revenue of the United Kingdom, useful advice in connection with the whole subject."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

3. " Will Government be pleased to state approximately the rough estimates of the world's production of gold and silver during 1919-20 and 1920-21."

World' d ctio gold a silver.

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

" The Government of India have not seen any authoritative estimates of the world's production of gold and silver during the current and next years, and in view of the various uncertain factors involved, they do not think that it will serve any useful purpose for them to attempt to frame any such estimates for the public information."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

4. " (a) Has any conclusion been arrived at in fixing the salaries of Europeans and Indians serving in India and doing the same work?

(b) Is there to be any differential treatment, and, if so, on what principle?

(c) Is the European allowance to be the same in respect of all services or to vary with the service and status, rank and length of service of the individual? If so, what are the differences?"

System adopted in fixing the salaries of Europeans and Indians serving in India.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

" No conclusion has been arrived at."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

5. " What is the value of the gold and silver employed in arts in the various countries during the ten years prior to the war?"

Value of gold and silver employed in arts.

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

" The information asked for by the Hon'ble Member is not available except as regards the United States, where in 1916 the amount of gold consumed in the industrial arts was valued at slightly over 51 million dollars, i.e., about £10¼ million, while the silver consumed amounted to somewhat over 32 million fine ounces.

In the case of India, it is impossible to say how far the gold and silver which has gone into consumption is held in the form of coin, and how much has been melted down for use in the arts."

Exchange compensation allowance.

6. " Will Government be pleased to state the reduction, if any, in the expenditure under exchange compensation allowance (1) during the official year 1918-19, and (2) during the four months ending on 31st July 1919, and the reduction anticipated during the succeeding eight months?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

" The expenditure on account of exchange compensation allowance was reduced from Rs. 43¾ lakhs in 1917-18 to less than Rs. 7½ lakhs in 1918-19, and to nil during the first four months of the current year. No expenditure on this account is anticipated during the remaining eight months."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

Collection of taxes.

7. " Do Government propose to consider the desirability of arranging for the collection of some taxes during the slack months of the trading season?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

" The Hon'ble Member's question is not understood. The collection of Government taxes goes on through both the slack and the busy seasons of the year."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur Sarma :—" May I request that the dates of the collection of revenue be postponed so as to enable the money to be used for the benefit of the trade?. That is the question I wish to ask."

The Vice-President :—" I understand that the Hon'ble Member desires to ask a supplementary question."

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard :—" I am afraid I did not catch what the Hon'ble Member said."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur Sarma :—" May I ask the question as to whether the dates of collection of certain of these taxes might be postponed till the slack season so that during the busy trade season the money may remain with the trade?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard :—" I am afraid, Sir, that we want all the money that we can get as early as we can get it. That is the answer to the Hon'ble Member's question."

Differences in prices of foodstuffs in various districts.

8. " (a) Do very wide differences exist between province and province, adjoining districts and even parts of the same district in prices of foodstuffs ?

(b) Are Government in a position to say whether this is due party to the inability of the Railway Companies to meet the normal traffic demands ?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"Full details of the wholesale and retail prices of food-grains in the different provinces and districts of India for the second half of July will be found in the Supplement to the Gazette of India for the 13th September. An examination of these statistics discloses considerable differences in the retail prices of food-grains, but it is not possible to assign any one cause for these variations. Marked differences in the price of rice, for instance, in adjoining districts may be due purely to local causes as when communications are temporarily interrupted by floods, or they may be due to the fact that District Officers have not reported the price of the same quality of rice. But the principal cause is probably that suggested by the Hon'ble Member, namely, the inability, of the railways to cope with all the traffic offering. This has compelled Government to control the inter-provincial movements of food-grains, and retarded the levelling process which is ordinarily promoted by free communications. The Government of India are now advised that the railway position is improving, and they are consulting Local Governments as to the possibility of relaxing control over the internal movements of food-grains."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

Metallic and paper currency.

9. " (a) Will Government be pleased to state to the extent of the latest figures available, the existing currency in cheques, notes and metal in the various countries having principal trade relations with India ?

(b) Is there in such countries sufficient metallic currency behind the cheque and paper currency according to the accepted standards prior to the war ?

(c) What proposals, if any, do Government contemplate for assisting India to compete industrially and commercially successfully with other countries ?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

" (a) I lay on the table a statement* giving the latest information available regarding the note circulation, and coin and bullion reserve held against the latter, in the United Kingdom, Japan, the United States of America, France and Italy. No information is available regarding cheques or the metallic currency actually in circulation.

(b) Government regret that they have no information on the point.

(c) This opens up such very wide matters that it is not practicable to deal with them by means of question and answer. I can only refer the Hon'ble Member to the Report of the Industries Commission. "

The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal asked :—

Imperial Preference.

10. " (a) With reference to the policy of Imperial preference, reported to have been announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the House of Commons, were the Government of India previously con ulted or was Indian public opinion on the subject in any other way presented before His Majesty's Government?

---

(b) If the answer be in the negative, do Government propose to represent to His Majesty's Government the considered public opinion in India after ascertaining the same?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"The Government of India were consulted on the general question of fiscal policy arising out of the Resolutions of the Paris Conference held in June, 1916, though no specific reference at that time was made to Imperial preference. The Government of India did also ask Local Governments for their views on general questions of trade policy after the war, and in doing so, made a reference to the question of preferential tariffs. The replies of Local Governments indicated that a scheme of Imperial preference would, on the whole, receive the approval and support of the majority of the commercial community in India. But no discussion of the general principle has been invited. The replies were placed before the Secretary of State."

Consideration of the establishment of a State Bank in India.

11. "(a) Is it not a fact that the Chamberlain Commission on Indian Finance and Currency in 1913 suggested the appointment of an expert committee to examine the question of the establishment of a State Central Bank in India?

(b) Do Government propose to ask the Secretary of State to refer the matter to the committee now sitting in London for consideration and for working out in detail a definite scheme capable of immediate adoption?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

"The answer to (a) is in the affirmative and to (b) in the negative. I may add that I propose to give a brief explanation of the position in connection with the Resolution which Mr. Sarma will shortly move."

Katarpur Bakrid riot case.

12. "(a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the editorial column of the 'Amrita Bazar Patrika' of the 18th August, 1919, relating to the Katarpur Bakrid riot case and the severity of the sentences passed on the accused, in which it is stated that 8 have been condemned to death and 135 sentenced to transportation for life, that among the 8 condemned there are 3 mahants, one doctor and one aged banker, and that among those transported for life there are high pandas, municipal commissioners and secretary, zamindars and bankers as also a Sub-Inspector of Police?

(b) Do Government propose to take any action to reduce the sentences or to grant pardons in the above case?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"(a) The attention of Government has been drawn to the article in question.

(b) It is understood that the sentences are being considered by the Local Government. The Government of India have not received any application from any of the convicted per sons."

Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicine.

13. "With reference to the reply given in this Council by the Hon'ble Sir Reginald Craddock in answer to a question asked by the Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi on the 19th September 1916, will Government be pleased to state what further action the Government of India and the various Local Governments have taken for placing the ancient systems of medicine on a scientific basis and for increasing their usefulness ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"Local Governments have been consulted in the matter and their unanimous opinion is that before anything can be done in the direction of placing the Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicine on a scientific basis, it is essential that there should be a strong movement among indigenous practitioners to reform and organize themselves, and of such a movement there is at present little or no evidence. The Government of India consider, however, that the scientific investigation of the properties of indigenous drugs is likely to be fruitful, and may help to achieve the object which the Hon'ble Member has in view, of increasing the usefulness of the ancient Indian systems of medicine. An investigation on these lines is to be made by the Drugs Manufacture Committee which has recently been appointed. This Committee will, amongst other matters, inquire into the value of indigenous medicines and will collect information regarding the mineral and vegetable drugs not included in the British pharmacopœia which are at present most commonly used by those who practise the Ayurvedic and Unani systems."

Constitution of a Chief Court at Nagpur.

14. "Will Government lay on the table the correspondence, if any, between the Government of India and the Central Provinces Administration relating to the constitution of a Chief Court at Nagpur ? What action do Government propose to take on the proposals made by the Central Provinces Administration ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"A decision on the question of constituting a Chief Court at Nagpur has been postponed for the time being on financial grounds. As no final decision has yet been reached, the Government of India are not prepared at this stage to lay the papers on the table. I shall be glad to give the Hon'ble Member further information privately if he wishes."

Higher appointments on Railways.

15. "Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing the superior appointments, i.e., gazetted appointments, made to the various branches of the Railway service during the years 1916-17, 1917-18, and 1918-19 classified as below :—

Europeans. Eurasians. Hindus. Muhammadans. Others."

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied :—

"A statement* is laid on the table. The figures given therein do not include officers of the Audit and Accounts Department, State Railways, who are provided by the Indian Finance Department.

The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal asked :—

Expenditure on New Delhi.

16. "What is the actual expenditure on the construction of New Delhi from the date of the undertaking of the works up to 31st March 1919 ?"

---

* Not included in these Proceedings.

The Hon'be Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"The outlay on the New Capital at Delhi up to the end of 31st March 1919 was as follows :—

		Rs.
Actual expenditure to end of 1917-1918	...	... 2,63,02,409
Approximate expenditure in 1918-1919	...	... 41,27,000
Total	...	... 3,04,29,409 "

The Hon'ble Mr. K. V. Rangaswamy Ayyangar asked :—

Appointment of a non-official commission to inquire into the Calcutta disturbances of September 1917.

17. "(a) Is it a fact that the Calcutta public appointed a non-official commission consisting of Messrs. L. P. E. Pugh, A. Tyabji, H. D. Bose, C. Vijayaraghavachariar and Agit Prasada to inquire into the Calcutta disturbances of September, 1917; that the said commission sat for about a month in Calcutta and after an open public inquiry, submitted a report to Government?

(b) Will Government be pleased to lay the said report on the table and to state to what extent they propose to give effect to the recommendations of the said commission?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"(a) and (b) No such report has reached the Government of India."

The Hon'ble Mr. N. F. Paton asked :—

Government Loan and hoarding of Silver Rupees.

18. "(a) Is it a fact that a very small amount of new money has been invested in the recent Government Loan as compared with the very large sums subscribed and being subscribed to Joint Stock Companies?

(b) Are Government satisfied that the terms of their recent Loan were such as to enlist the full financial support that might otherwise have been obtained?

(c) Is it a fact that very large quantities of silver rupees are being hoarded throughout India?

(d) Are Government prepared to consider the advisability of commencing issues of Premium Bonds concurrently with the issue of the next Loan, with a view to bringing into circulation these hoarded rupees?"

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard replied :—

"(a) Government do not consider that the amount subscribed to their recent loan, namely, over 21 crores, compares unfavourably with the sums now being invested in companies.

(b) Government are satisfied that the terms of their loan were as liberal as the circumstances justified.

(c) Government have no exact information as to the amount of rupees now in hoards, but it is probable that the facts are as stated in the question.

(d) Suggestions for the issue of premium bonds were carefully examined two years ago. Even if the issue of such bonds were a measure free from objection per se, Government do not consider that it would have any material effect in bringing hoarded rupees into circulation."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha asked :—

The value of the sovereign.

19. "(a) What truth, if any, is in the following statement of alleged facts as given by the Statesman :—

" If you land in the country with a sovereign the Government will take it away from you and give you eleven rupees three annas in return. If you are in the country and happen to have a sovereign and take it to the Currency Office you will get fifteen rupees for it. On the other hand, if you take it to the bazar you will find purchasers at twenty-one rupees. But if you accept it you will be committing an offence.

(b) If the facts be as stated above, do Government propose to take any action in the matter and, if so, what action ? If no action is proposed to be taken, will Government state the reasons ? "

" (a) The facts are substantially as stated.

(b) Government recognise the present anomalous position in which there are three prices for gold, namely, (1) the bazar price, (2) the price paid by Government for gold acquired by them on import into India, and (3) the legal tender rate at which sovereigns are received at the currency office. The anomaly should however, disappear when the present artificial restrictions on the movement of gold into India are removed, and when the ultimate rate at which gold will be legal tender in India has been determined as a result of the deliberations of the Currency Committee now sitting in London. As regards the bazar price of gold the Hon'ble Member will no doubt have noticed that the premium has recently been greatly reduced owing to the fortnightly sales of gold by Government."

Jail administration of Bihar and Orissa.

20. " (a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the Resolution of the Government of Bihar and Orissa on the administration of the Jails in that province in the year 1917-18, showing that 13,777 prisoners were admitted to hospital as against 6,579 in the previous year, that the daily average number in hospital was 662 against 310, the total number of deaths rose from 237 to 584 and the death rate from 32·9 to 63·4 per mille ?

(b) Have Government in their possession information about the Jail administration of any other province or provinces, during the same period, showing either an equally bad or even a worse state of affairs ? If so, will Government be pleased to furnish the same ?

(c) If the answer to (b) be in the affirmative, has the Provincial Government concerned tried to explain the situation by urging the same view as the Bihar and Orissa Government that 'it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the officers of the provincial service who have taken their places as medical officers or Superintendents of Jail work have been unable to adapt themselves to it or to control their subordinates' ?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

" (a) Government have seen the Resolution of the Government of Bihar and Orissa on the administration of the jails in that Province in the year 1918.

(b) A statement* is laid on the table showing for each Province in 1917 and 1918 the ratio per mille of average strength—

(i) of admissions into hospital,

Vide* Appendix B.

(ii) of daily average number sick, and

(iii) of deaths from all causes.

(c) Almost every Local Government has at one time or another drawn attention to the deterioration in the efficiency of the administration of the Jails Department during the last few years owing to the absence on military duty of many regular officers of the Indian Medical Service belonging to that Department.

The increase in the death-rate in most provinces is greatly deplored by the Government who are endeavouring to secure the speedy return to civil duty of as many officers of the Department as possible."

Acceptance of "dalis" by Government officers.

21. "(a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a Resolution dated Ranchi, the 16th July 1919, issued by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bihar and Orissa on dalis, in which His Honour in Council has been pleased to declare his decision that from the 1st of September, 1919, 'no Government officer shall be permitted to accept dalis'?

(b) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the leading article on the subject in the Searchlight of August 17th last, in which that journal expresses its appreciation of the said action of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council?

(c) Is the practice in regard to receiving dalis in other provinces the same or about the same as that which obtained in Bihar and Orissa before the promulgation of the recent Resolution? If so, do Government propose to invite the attention of other Local Governments to the Resolution with a view to their taking similar action? If not, will Government state their reasons therefor?

(d) Are there any rules on the subject of presents or dalis issued by the Government of India? If so, will Government lay on the table a copy thereof?

(e) In the matter of receiving presents by Government officers, are there any rules of the Government of India which make a differentiation between Indian and non-Indian non-officials prohibiting acceptance of presents from the former but not from the latter? If so, will Government be pleased to state the reasons for maintaining such a difference?

(f) If any such rules of differentiation be in existence, would it not be open to Government officers in Bihar and Orissa to continue to accept presents or dalis from non-Indian non-officials, in spite of the Resolution promulgated by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and would not the effect of the said Resolution to that extent be nullified?

(g) If the answer to the part (f) be in the affirmative, do Government propose to so revise the rules as to remove the differentiation in this matter between Indian and non-Indian non-officials? If not, why not?"

"(a) The Government of India have not seen the Resolution referred to.

(b) The Government of India have seen the newspaper article referred to.

(c) The Government of the Punjab has, it is understood, issued an order prohibiting the acceptance of dalis. The Government of India have not precise information as to the practice in other Provinces. The matter is one entirely in the discretion of Local Governments; but the Government of India are prepared to draw the attention of other Local Governments to the orders issued by the Governments of the Punjab and Bihar and Orissa.

(d) A copy of rule 2 of the Government Servants' Conduct Rules is laid on the table.

(e) Rule 2 of the Government Servants' Conduct Rules provides that a Government servant may not, without the previous sanction of the Government of India, directly or indirectly accept, either on his own behalf or on behalf of any other person, any gift, gratuity or reward, or any promise of a gift, gratuity or reward, from any native of India. The rule does not mention gifts from persons other than Indians. The rule was based on the East India Company Act, 1772 (13 Geo. 3, c. 63), which prohibited the acceptance of presents from any of the natives of Asia. The offering of presents to Government servants is not a European custom.

(f and g) As already stated, the Government of India have not seen the Resolution said to have been issued by the Government of Bihar and Orissa."

The Government Servants' Conduct Rules.

Gifts.

2. A Government servant may not, without the previous sanction of the Government of India, directly or indirectly accept, either on his own behalf or on behalf of any other person, any gift, gratuity or reward, or any promise of a gift, gratuity or reward from any Native of India.

The Head of a Government or Administration or a Political Officer may accept from any Native Prince or Chief a ceremonial gift which is deposited in the Government Toshakhana and for which a return present is made at the Government expense. Any Government servant may accept a complimentary present of flowers or fruit or similar articles of trifling value. The practice of giving such presents should however be discouraged.

When a gift of substantial value cannot be refused without giving offence, it should, unless the Government of India by special order otherwise direct, be delivered up to the Government."

Increase of salaries of members of the Provincial Civil Services.

22. " (a) Have any steps been so far taken to carry out the recommendations of the Public Services Commission in the matter of increase of salaries of the members of the Provincial Civil Services—Executive and Judicial—in any province ? If so, in which of them ?

(b) Are Government aware that the members of these two services have been very hard hit by reason of their comparatively small salaries and the recent abnormal rise in prices ?

(c) If no steps have been taken so far, do Government propose to deal with the question at an early date ? If so, when may the orders fixing the revised scale of salary be expected ? "

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

" The Hon'ble Member is referred to the replies given on the 15th and 17th September to similar questions by the Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal and the Hon'ble Sardar Bahadur Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia."

[Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha; Sir Arthur Anderson; Sir William Vincent; Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda.] [23RD SEPTEMBER, 1919.]

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha asked:—

Dismantling of the Bhagalpur-Bounsi section of the East Indian Railway.

23. "(a) Are Government aware that the dismantling of the Bhagalpur-Bounsi section of the East Indian Railway has caused very great inconvenience to the people of the Bhagalpur and Santal Perganas Districts in Bihar?

(b) Is it a fact that the people of the tracts affected have submitted a memorial to the Commissioner of the Bhagalpur Division, as stated in an editorial paragraph in the Searchlight of Patna in its issue of 17th August last?

(c) Is it true as further stated therein that 'the earth-work on the railwa track and the masonry work of the bridges and also the station buildings . . . . are all intact and only the iron materials have to be supplied and laid on'?

(d) If the answer to part (c) be in the affirmative, do Government propose to take in hand the restoration of the line as soon as possible? If not will Government be pleased to state the reasons for delaying re-opening th line, and also the approximate time at which the public may look forward t travelling on that section of the East Indian Railway."

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied:—

"The replies to (a) (b) (c) and the first part of (d) are in the affirmativ I may explain for the Hon'ble Member's information with regard to the secon part of (d) that it is the intention to utilise second-hand rails for relayin the line as soon as these can be obtained, but it is not possible yet to forecas a date. Government are alive to the necessity for relaying dismantled lines a soon as possible."

The Punjab Inquiry Committee.

24. "(a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to the statement c the Englishman in its issue of September 6th, 1919, in an editorial paragrap under the heading 'By the way' in which is noticed the personnel of tl Punjab Inquiry Committee, that 'Sir Chiman Lal Setalvad is the seco Presidency Magistrate at Bombay'?

(b) Is it not a fact that Sir Chiman Lal Setalvad who has been appoint a member of the Committee is a non-official, an Advocate of the Bombay Hi Court and at present the Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University?

(c) If the answer be in the affirmative, will Government be pleased state whether there is any foundation for the Englishman's statement?"

"(a) Yes.

(b) Yes.

(c) No."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda asked:—

Training of Indian cadets at ...st.

25. "(a) Is it a fact that Indian cadets have been sent to Sandhurst training? (b) Have the sons of any Indian officers been selected for this co of training? (c) If not, is it in contemplation to make any such selection?

The Hon'ble Major General Sir Alfred Bingley replied :—

" (a) Yes. Ten Indian cadets have been admitted to Sandhurst.

(b) No.

(c) The sons of Indian officers are accepted gladly, but the standards of education or of fitness in other respects cannot be lowered on their account."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda asked :—

Order of forfeiture under the Press Act of 19

26. " In how many cases since the Indian Press Act, 1910, was enacted have there been appeals in the different High Courts against orders of forfeiture and in how many cases, if any, has the appeal been successful ? "

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

" Since the introduction of the Indian Press Act, 1910, fifteen appeals have been preferred to High Courts against orders of forfeiture of security, eleven of which were rejected on their merits, while one was successful. Three are still undecided."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda asked :—

Indian labourers in Ceylon.

27. " (a) Is it a fact that Indian labourers employed in Ceylon estates are sentenced to imprisonment for breach of labour contracts and other labour offences ?

(b) Is it a fact that the Government of Ceylon has under contemplation a new labour Ordinance to secure increased recruitment in India ? If so, do Government propose to ascertain the provisions of the contemplated legislation and take steps to safeguard the interests of Indian labourers ? "

" (a) In Ceylon an Ordinance of 1865 contains penal sections imposing imprisonment for labour offences. It also makes an employer liable to imprisonment for refusal to pay wages when due. The law is a general one, and applies not only to estate labourers but all servants, labourers and journeymen artificers. The Hon'ble Member will find in paragraph 43 of the Report made to the Government of India by Mr. Marjoribanks and the Hon'ble Khan Bahadur Ahmad Thambi Marakkayar Sahib Bahadur in 1917 particulars of the extent to which the penal sections of this Ordinance were used in 1915 in the case of the estate labourers and their employers. The number of persons charged with labour offences in 1915 appears to have been only about one per cent of the total labour force. I may say that both the Madras Government and the Government of India have already addressed the Secretary of State on the subject of this Ordinance, and we have been informed by the Secretary of State that the Colonial Office have asked the Ceylon Government earnestly to consider how far it might be possible to dispense with all punishment for labour offences.

(b) With regard to the second part of the Hon'ble Member's question, we know that a Committee was appointed by the Government of Ceylon in 1918, which was to advise how increased recruitment might be secured from India. The Government of India have not yet received a draft of any proposed new labour Ordinance in Ceylon, and will certainly ask that they may have an opportunity of communicating their observations on any measure affecting Indian labourers which the Government of Ceylon may have in contemplation."

Publication of the report of the Medical Services Committee.

28. "(a) Do Government propose to direct the publication of the report of the Medical Services Committee?

(b) Will this Council be permitted to make suggestions before action is taken by Government on the report?

(c) What were the terms of reference to the Committee, and the personnel of the Committee?"

The Hon'ble Major General Sir Alfred Bingley replied :—

"As regards (a), the report of the Committee is still under consideration by the Government of India, and is therefore treated as confidential for the time being. Its publication at a later stage will, however, be considered.

As regards (b), Government will be glad to consider any suggestions which Members of this Council may have to make in regard to the subjects dealt with by the Committee.

As regards (c), the attention of the Hon'ble Member is invited to the reply given to a similar question asked by the Hon'ble Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjea on the 7th March, 1919."

The Hon'ble Mr. Kamini Kumar Chanda asked :—

Concessions to Civil Assistant Surgeons holding temporary commissions in the Indian Medical Service.

29. "(a) Is it a fact that those Civil Assistant Surgeons who hold temporary commissions in the Indian Medical Service will soon revert to civil employment? (b) Is it proposed that after reversion they will retain the honorary rank held at the time of reversion? (c) Do Government propose in consideration of their services and honorary rank to grant them other concessions, such as first class travelling allowance, etc.?"

The Hon'ble Major General Sir Alfred Bingley replied :—

"(a) Owing to the present shortage of medical officers, it is unlikely that Civil Assistant Surgeons, who hold temporary commissions in the Indian Medical Service, will be permitted to resume civil employment in the near future. Certain officers, however, whose return to civil duty has been specifically asked for by their Local Governments, have already been reverted, or will be reverted shortly.

(b) The general question of permitting temporary officers in the Army to retain their rank as an honorary distinction on release from military service, is under consideration. The decision that may be arrived at on the subject will be applicable to temporary officers of the Indian Medical Service.

(c) The memorials which have been received from some temporary officers of the Indian Medical Service, praying for certain concessions, are under consideration."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked :—

Railway line between Dacca and Aricha.

30. "(a) Are Government considering the desirability of constructing a Railway line between Dacca and Aricha?

(b) Are Government aware of the great difficulties of communication between the city of Dacca and the headquarters of the Manikganj sub-division and the western part of the district generally?

(c) Is it a fact that repeated representations have been made to the Local Government urging the desirability of constructing this line which will facilitate communication in a comparatively inaccessible part of the country, and shorten the distance between Calcutta and Dacca?"

The Hon'ble Sir Arthur Anderson replied:—

"A communication on the subject has just been received from the Government of Bengal. It will be given early attention by Government. The replies to (a) and (c) are therefore substantially in the affirmative, while to (b) the reply is that Government have no special information on the subject."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked:—

Allowances sanctioned on account of high prices.

31. "(a) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing the rates and extent of allowances sanctioned, in view of the high prices, to officers serving in the various departments of the Government of India and the different Provincial Governments?

(b) On what principles have the amounts of these allowances been fixed? Do they bear any proportion to the increase in the rate of the prices of the necessaries of life? If so, what is the said proportion?"

"(a) The attention of the Hon'ble Member is invited to the statement furnished to the Council, in reply to him, at the meeting held on the 19th March 1919. A revised statement* bringing up to date the information then given, regarding special allowances sanctioned by the Government of India, is laid on the table.

(b) The concessions sanctioned have been based on the recommendations of Heads of Imperial Departments and Local Governments, who are in the best position to estimate the degree of relief required. No general ratio has been adopted between the scale of allowances and the rise in prices."

Re-organisation of the Provincial Judicial Service.

32. "(a) Have Government received any proposals of the Government of Bengal in regard to the question of re-organisation of the Provincial Judicial Service?

(b) Are Government aware that the opinion of the Local Government as embodied in Resolution No. 6279-A., dated Calcutta, the 19th November 1918, has not met with the approval of the public in Bengal, particularly in so far as it deviates from the recommendations of the Public Services Commission?

(c) Are Government aware that the proposals made therein are considered very unsatisfactory, especially as regards the fixing of Rs. 175 as the salary in the probationary grade, the first grade of Munsiffs (on Rs. 500) being made a selection grade, and the proposed time-scale and maximum salary for Subordinate Judges?"

"(a) The reply is in the affirmative.

(b) and (c) The Government of India have been informed by the Government of Bengal that numerous opinions were received in reply to their Resolution No. 6279-A., dated 19th November last, but are not aware that they were on the whole adverse to the scheme put forward in that Resolution. The proposals of the Local Government have not yet been taken into consideration as the replies from the Local Governments on this section of the recommendations of the Public Services Commission are not yet complete."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked:—

Government control of rice.

33. "(a) Is it a fact that the Government control of rice resulted in an increase of export from Bengal during the six months succeeding the appointment of a Foodstuffs Commissioner?

(b) What control, if any, has been exercised by the Foodstuffs Commissioner over the export of rice overseas and coastwise from Bengal, since his appointment, through what agency has such control been exercised, and with what result?

(c) Was any maximum limit as to quantity fixed by the Foodstuffs Commissioner, beyond which export of rice would not be allowed from Bengal? If so, when was such limit fixed, what was the limit, and on what considerations was it based?

(d) Did Government make any attempt to ascertain the maximum capacity of Bengal for export of rice when the Foodstuffs Commissioner assumed control, and to see that it was not exceeded?

(e) In fixing any such maximum limit did the Foodstuffs Commissioner take into consideration the actual requirements of Bengal?

(f) Is it a fact that for a long time after the assumption of control over the movement and supply of rice, Burma rice imported into Calcutta was entirely ear-marked for other provinces and not allowed to be consumed in Bengal?

(g) Is it a fact that while this was the case, the price of rice consumed in Bengal was steadily rising?

(h) When was Burma rice first permitted to be imported for Bengal under license and under what circumstances?

What quantities of such rice have since been absorbed in Bengal month by month, and with what effect on the price of rice in Bengal?"

"(a) Yes.

(b) Exports to foreign countries were either prohibited or restricted to definite quantities. Exports to Madras were not interfered with until July last when they were stopped altogether. Control was exercised through the Collector of Customs. Foreign exports between January and June 1919 were 260,000 cwts. less than in the previous year, and as most countries included in the rationing scheme have drawn their full allotments for the year, exports by sea from Calcutta have now been closed down.

(c), (d) and (e) No maximum limit was fixed, but at the Delhi Conference in October 1918 it was reported by the Bengal representative that the surplus available for export from Bengal amounted to 240,000 tons. This figure of course took no account of the surplus available from the winter rice crop of 1918. In regulating exports from Bengal, the Government of India took into account not only the estimated surplus from Bengal, but also (1) previous shipments to countries rationed from Bengal and the minimum requirements of these countries, (2) the essential requirements of other provinces, (3) the relative prices of rice in the different provinces, and (4) the comparative ease with which Bengal could be restocked owing to the proximity of Burma.

(f) No indents for Burma rice were received from Bengal till May last.

(g) and (h) The price of rice did not begin to rise rapidly in Bengal till May last, and 1,000 tons of Burma rice were at once placed at the disposal of the Director of Civil Supplies, Bengal, by the Foodstuffs Commissioner. The allotment was raised to 3,000 tons in June, but at the end of that month the Director of Civil Supplies reported that the demand for Burma rice in Bengal was very small and that there was little prospect of the allotment being absorbed. On July 8th he confirmed his previous statement and reported that the Burma rice shops opened in Calcutta had definitely proved a failure. Nevertheless, the allotment of 3,000 tons was repeated in July and August. The demand is now brisker, and arrangements have been made to land 70,000 tons of rice in Calcutta in the current month, of which less than 25,000 tons are for provinces other than Bengal. In addition, exports of rice from Burma to Chittagong have been freely allowed, 48,091 tons having been shipped to the latter port between the 1st January and the end of August. Full information regarding the price of rice in Bengal will be found in the answer to the next question."

Retail prices of rice.

34. " (a) Will Government be pleased to make a statement showing, province by province, the course of the average retail prices of rice during the last eight months ?

(b) At what wholesale rates are controlled supplies of Burma rice available at the importing centres, and how do the retail prices thereof vary, in the different provinces ?

(c) Is controlled Burma rice available at all District and Sub-divisional headquarters and other important markets ?

(d) Have the retail prices of controlled Burma rice been fixed at every place in the different provinces from the very beginning ? If so, what are the said rates ?

(e) If the answer to part (d) be in the negative, will Government be pleased to state if there was anything to prevent profiteering by retail dealers in such controlled rice ?

(f) Is there anything in the different provinces to prevent a retail dealer in rice from selling a license obtained from a District Officer for a supply of Burma rice, to another person ? Is he under any obligation to import the entire quantity covered by the license into any particular locality in the province within a prescribed period of time ? If not, to what extent can such a locality, for the requirements of which the license is granted, count upon the supply ? "

"(a) A statement* giving the statistics required, as far as they are available, is laid on the table.

(b) The information asked for is not available. The Foodstuffs Commissioner fixes the ex-hopper prices of the different qualities of rice in Burma, the f. o. b. charges, and, in consultation with the Shipping Controller and the Steamer Companies concerned, the rates of freight. It is left to the local authorities to fix the landing charges at the port of entry, and the rate of importers' profit, and to fix the wholesale and retail prices at which the rice may be sold.

*Not included in these Proceedings.

(c), (d), (e) and (f) Questions relating to the distribution and control of the rice imported from Burma within the limits of a province should be asked in the Legislative Council of the province concerned."

Consignments of rice.

35. "(a) Has the attention of Government been drawn to a statement made at a meeting of the Bengal Legislative Council on the 4th July, last, by the Hon'ble Mr. Irwin to the effect that 2¼ lakhs maunds of rice consigned to Bihar and Orissa were accumulated at three stations on the Darjeeling Kissenganj branch line for want of adequate transport facilities, and that some of the rice was rotting and some actually growing out of the bags, while people in the neighbouring district of Darjeeling were crying out for supplies? Is the statement correct?

(b) Is the carrying capacity of railways taken into account by the Foodstuffs Commissioner or Directors of Civil Supplies in fixing the allotment of rice in any particular case?

(c) What steps have been taken for the prevention of similar occurrences in future?

(d) Is it a fact that occurrences similar to the above have happened at several other railway centres?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"(a) The congestion of the rice traffic on the Darjeeling-Himalayan Railway in April last was brought to the notice of the Foodstuffs Commissioner in the beginning of May, and the attention of the Controller of Traffic was at once drawn to the matter. Inquiry showed that the congestion was due to the heavy demands for wagons on the East Indian Railway. This Railway had to restrict the Bengal and North-Western Railway at the junctions, which Railway in its turn had to restrict the Eastern Bengal Railway. These restrictions reacted on the Darjeeling-Himalayan Railway. As soon as it was possible to do so, the East Indian Railway increased the number of wagons at the transhipment points and the congestion was cleared. The Government of India have received no complaints regarding the alleged deterioration of the rice.

(b) The carrying capacity of railways is taken into account as far as possible; but the Hon'ble Member will see from the answer to the first part of his question, that it is not easy to forecast the position on a given length of railway at a given time.

(c) The Foodstuffs Commissioner works in close touch on the one hand with Provincial Directors of Civil Supplies, and, on the other, with the Railway Board.

(d) The Government of India have received no complaints of similar occurrences elsewhere."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked :—

Relief afforded on account of high prices.

36. "(a) What various steps have been taken in each province for generally affording relief against the high prices of foodgrains in areas outside those in respect of which famine has been declared?

(b) Have Government any information as to what steps have been taken in the various Native States towards the same end?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

" (a) The question of the control of prices within the different provinces is one for the Local Governments concerned, and the Government of India have received no detailed reports as to the measures adopted. They understand, however, that in most provinces Burma rice has been used for the purpose of controlling prices. Arrangements have been made at the ports for rigorous control of the rice imported from Burma, and cheap grain shops have been opened in most provinces by district boards, municipal councils and private agencies at which Burma rice is retailed either at cost price or at very small profit. In Bombay city over 120 of these cheap grain shops have been opened, and the Government of India understand that in the Presidency as a whole more than 400 similar shops have been established. In some provinces action has been taken under the Articles of Commerce Ordinance to requisition stocks of foodgrains unreasonably withheld from the market, and in the North-West Frontier Province, where of course conditions are special, maximum prices of foodstuffs have been fixed under the Defence of India Rules.

(b) Similar action has been taken in several Indian States and many of the Durbars have also prohibited the export of foodgrains from their States."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked :—

Grand Trunk Canal scheme and improvement of silted up rivers of Bengal.

37. "(a) What action has been taken in regard to the Grand Trunk Canal Scheme of Bengal ?

(b) How much is the said scheme estimated to cost, and what particular locality will the proposed canal serve as a means of communication ?

(c) Is there any comprehensive scheme before Government for the improvement of the old rivers of Bengal which are silting up ? If so, how much is it estimated to cost and when is it likely to be taken up ?

(d) How far, if at all, is the Grand Trunk Canal project likely on financial grounds to retard the carrying out of any scheme for improving the existing waterways of Bengal ? "

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

" (a) A project for the construction of the Grand Trunk Canal in Bengal has recently been received from the Local Government, and is at present under the consideration of the Government of India.

(b) The scheme, as recommended for sanction by the Government of Bengal, is estimated to cost Rs. 2,88,30,500 and is designed to provide direct routes, suitable for steamer navigation, between Calcutta and—

(i) the Ganges, via the Madhumati and Gorai rivers ;

(ii) Assam, Cachar and Sylhet via the Madaripur Bil Canal ;

(iii) Barisal.

(c) No comprehensive scheme for the improvement of the rivers of Bengal has been submitted to the Government of India.

(d) The construction of the Grand Trunk Canal is unlikely to retard, on financial grounds, the prosecutions of any schemes for the improvement of existing waterways which the Local Government may desire to take up."

RESOLUTION re ESTABLISHMENT OF A STATE BANK IN INDIA.

11-36 A.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"Sir, the Resolution I beg to move runs as follows :—

'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that a State Bank on the lines suggested by Professor Keynes in his annexure to the report on the Indian currency be established in India at a very early date.'

Sir, I sincerely wish that a Resolution of such an important character relating to banking had been moved by a member connected with commerce and banking. I feel the great disadvantage of a layman like myself venturing to bring before this Council a Resolution of this description. But my justification for doing so is the enormous importance of the subject coupled with the recent movements to place the banking facilities of India on a proper basis. There is an impression, which I believe to be accurate, that there is a movement on foot to amalgamate the three Presidency Banks and place additional facilities at their disposal. It is, under those circumstances, Sir, that I venture to bring forward this Resolution. I feel fortified in the soundness of the propositions that I am asking the Council to accept by the fact that I have the examples of almost every European country behind me. We have State Banks in France, Italy, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Netherlands, Belgium, not to speak of Japan, and recently legislation was undertaken in the United States of America to constitute a Central Federal Board and regional banks for the purpose of decentralising the functions and placing on a sound footing the banking facilities of America. I may go further and say that the Government of India, so far back as 1901, were distinctly of opinion that a Central Bank should be established in India for the purpose of relieving them of part of their responsibilities and placing India on a sound banking footing. These are the exact words of the Government of India Resolution :—'We desire at the same time to record our deliberate opinion that it would be distinctly advisable, if practicable, to establish a Central Bank in India so as to relieve Government of its present heavy responsibilities and to secure the advantages arising from the control of the banking of the country by a solid and powerful central institution.'

"Professor Keynes in collaboration with his colleagues went into the question at the request of the Chamberlain Commission and has formulated a scheme going into considerable detail as to the lines on which a Central Bank can and ought to be established in India. I have therefore the authority of a very eminent Professor of Economics and businessmen behind me in the proposals that I put before the Council.

"It is unnecessary for me to state that the principle I ask the Council to accept is the necessity for the establishment of a Central Bank; then that that Central Bank should be largely, if not wholely, controlled with regard to its general policy by the State. As to whether it should take up the question of the paper currency, gold standard and other subjects along with banking facilities are matters upon which no one need be wedded to any particular doctrine. Recent events have taught us very important lessons and they would necessarily be taken into consideration in assigning functions to this State Bank. But I am asking the Council to accept the principles underlying the recommendations of Professor Keynes, and, I think, it will not be very difficult to convince the Council of the soundness of this proposition. Sir, the events during the last few stirring years have convinced us that behind the banking system of every country lies the credit of the whole country, the credit of the Government, and it was shown that it would be absolutely impossible, in times of crisis, for the banks to undertake the work which they were doing in peace times, without State assistance. It was also shown that, owing to the enormous growth of Government securities, Government loans and credit facilities, in other countries, something of the same sort should be attempted in India in order to place India on the right track, and enable her to compete and hold her own successfully with the other countries of the world. All well-organised countries have learnt to make one pound go as far as five for all practical purposes. We are yet in a primitive state and we have to improve our banking system, if even the existing wealth of the country is to be utilised as it ought properly to be utilised. It is unnecessary to expatiate at great length on this point, but a few figures would convince Hon'ble Members of the enormous progress made in foreign countries during recent years and how woefully behind we are at the present moment. Hon'ble Members will find that there were in the United States 3,294 banks in 1890, whereas the number had gone up to 7,560 in 1915. And the capital and surplus was in dollars 316 millions in 1890 and have gone up to 794 millions in 1915, that is by more than 400 millions. We find also that in Japan there has been enormous progress. There were in 1916 the Bank of Japan with 11 branches, and 51 special banks with 77 branches, 1,407 ordinary banks and 2,163 branches, Savings Banks with 184 branches, altogether about 2,143 principal and 3,731 branches. Whereas in 1915-16, under banking and loan, the aggregate number was shown as 480 for the whole of India with a population of 315 millions, and the total capital was only 834 lakhs. Turning to the principal banks, Hon'ble Members will find that the capital of the Presidency Banks and the larger Indian joint stock banks is only 713 lakhs of rupees, and the reserves are about 524 lakhs. Together with the reserves, the capital will be about £8,000,000 or 12 crores of rupees. There are only 71 principal banks and 371 branches. The very large number of banks in a smaller area with a smaller population as compared with the facilities in India with its large area and population should convince clearly Hon'ble Members that we have to make very great strides in keeping up the pace. But that is not the only point. We find that the Government have been practically doing a large part of banking work. The Finance Minister and his establishment have been very hard worked, especially during the last five years, and the Currency Department must have given them no end of trouble. We have the Paper Currency and other policy managed by the State which does what banking experts do in other countries, in collaboration with the Government officials. We have the same state of things in the India Office. We have at the present moment the business of managing about £3 millions of securities in the Gold Standard Reserve alone and 54 millions in the Paper Currency. Those securities comprise stock of various kinds and treasury bills, and one important question would be how to manage them so that we may suffer no loss either in capital or interest; and we have suffered loss already by reason of depreciation in the value of the stocks we hold. Hon'ble Members will also notice that at present it would be difficult to convert the stocks and bills into gold even if it were necessary to do so, and it may not be necessary to convert the whole of the gold standard reserve having regard to the fact that our exports are in excess of our imports, and the present exchange and currency position has also been strengthened. The management of the gold currency reserve, the other stocks and bills we hold is one which would fall legitimately within the operations of a bank, while it is being at present managed by the Government. And our paper currency also has been enormously increased. From 60 crores it has gone up to 180 crores, and it is also necessary that there should be some expert body which can control this enormous growth and work it on sound lines. I think between 16 and 20 crores of rupees of notes have been issued, during the last four months, since we last met in Delhi. It is thus clear that there is necessity for a very highly trained expert body, being created at an early date for the purpose of helping the Government, with a clearly avowed responsibility. The advantages which are generally claimed for a State Bank I need hardly dilate upon at very great length. They are chiefly the following:—

(1) the facilitating an increase of branches;

(2) the partial release of Government balances through their being deposited in a central institution;

(3) moderation of the wide fluctuation of the bank rate and its normal high level;

(4) the introduction of rediscount facilities;

(5) the obviating the existence of the independent treasury system taking large sums off the money market;

(6) obviating the objection to holding large sums at loan for short periods in the London money market;

(7) the pushing on of the further circulation of notes, by increasing the facilities for convertibility;

(8) the removal of the responsibility of Government officials for a variety of financial and semi-financial business;

(9) the command of financial and business experts instead of civilian officers, however well trained they may be in the latter portion of their lives;

(10) the constitution of a buffer between the Secretary of State and vexatious criticism;

(11) the introduction of increased stability into the Indian banking system;

(12) the development on sound lines of native joint stock banks;

(13) the possibilities of its leading to the development of co-operative banking; and

(14) the control of the bank rate.

That is one of the important questions which has been considered in great detail by Professor Keynes, and there are many more of the like nature.

"Now, Sir, one of the questions which has been agitating the minds of the commercial community especially was as to how to divert the treasury balances if the money was not wanted by the Government, into the general banking system of the country for the purpose of helping trade, and the Chamberlain Commission felt that the existing state of things was absolutely unjustifiable and required strong justification before it could be continued. This is what the Commissioners say at page 34:—

> 'Close on £9,000,000 was thus locked up from the market in the Reserve Treasuries as compared with about £3,500,000 a year before, while only £3,752.000 out of the total of £19,268,200 was placed with the banks. Only a comparatively small portion of the £2,198,300 deposited at branches of the banks can be regarded as readily available in the money market, but as this money would be for the most part necessarily located in much the same places under any system, it may be counted as being at any rate more available for trade than if it had been in district treasuries. The causes which led to this state of things on the 31st March 1913 were mainly a sudden slackening off in the demand for Council drafts, unaccompanied by any noticeable slackening of internal trade in India, and a record surplus of revenue over expenditure. It appears to us that a system which leads in certain circumstances to the locking up of nearly £9,000,000 during the busiest period of the commercial year, and £5,400,000, more than under the same system was summarily locked up in the previous year, requires very strong justification.'

Therefore, one of the main objects which we must have in view is how to enable this public money to help trade, when money is wanted. Well, it has been suggested in several quarters that we might simply amalgamate the Presidency Banks, exercise some sort of superficial control over them and place our treasury balances, or such money as can be spared at their disposal, in order to help the objects we have in view. Then Professor Keynes says at page 61 :—

> 'It seems clear that Government cannot entrust any of its existing duties to private hands. It has also become plain that, whether a State Bank is established or not, Government, so far from relinquishing old duties, must bend itself to new ones.'

Then on another page he says that the Government must, if they place their treasury balances at the disposal of any amalgamated Central Bank, control largely the conduct of that Bank, and the question is, whether the control should be of the nature suggested here, namely, governing completely the larger policy with an eye to general public interests without sacrificing commercial interests, or whether we ought to leave these private bankers to do what they can with Government assistance, slightly encouraged or slightly advised by Government officials. I think Professor Keynes says clearly that this enormous amount cannot and ought not to be entrusted to these banks, amalgamated or not, and that some rigorous system ought to be enforced with regard to control. And the other reasons are given in continuation of what I have read out to you. They are :—

> 'The functions of the note issue, it is generally agreed, must be extended, and an element of discretion must be introduced where there was previously none. As in the case of the note issue, so in the case of the cash balances, there must be less rigidity of rule and more discretion. Now, with a State Bank, all this would be easy, and there are plenty of precedents to look to ; but as soon as an attempt is made to work out precisely by what sort of procedure these objects are to be attained in the absence of a State Bank, it becomes apparent that it is not altogether through chance or obtuseness that such desirable changes have not been made long ago. The existing system has been deeply conditioned by the absence of a State Bank. The history of the management of the cash balances, for example, bears witness to this. At no time has anyone supposed the existing system to be perfectly satisfactory. It has established itself because it is the only system which frees the officials from the exercise of a discretion for which they do not feel themselves competent and from which they therefore shrink. The evidence is that actual practice has always tended to be more rigid than the actual letter of the rule laid down by the Secretary of State ; and the choice lies between a good deal of responsibility without thoroughly satisfactory machinery for the discharge of it, and a little more responsibility with such a machinery. The balance of advantage is with the second alternative!'

Now to take up the question as to whether we can place all our treasury balances with these Presidency Banks. One objection I have, Sir, is that, even at present, I feel that very much more money is being kept with the Presidency Banks—subject to correction—than is necessary, without interest. Hon'ble Members will find that the State is under an obligation of keeping without interest only about 75 lakhs of rupees roughly with these Presidency Banks. But the figures that were furnished to the Chamberlain Commission, quoted at page 723, show that roughly between 3 and 4 crores, running into 5 crores in 1913, were kept with the Presidency Banks. Now the Hon'ble Mr. Howard has kindly placed me in possession of some of the later figures I find, turning to the published figures, that the cash balances in the Public Treasuries and in the Presidency Banks ranged between 14 and 22 crores in 1916-17 and 18 and 32 in 1913-14. In the slack months of this year May, June, July and August, we find that the totals were roughly 16 crores. Of this, with the Presidency Banks on the 31st of May 1919 we find 831 lakhs, on the 30th June 1919, 783 lakhs, on the 31st July 1919, 776 lakhs, and on the 31st of August 1919, 975 lakhs I have been told that the amounts have been reduced latterly, that they would work out to about 600 crores, 235 lakhs in the Reserve Presidency Head Offices and 365 in branch offices. Hon'ble Members will therefore see that enormous sums of money have been kept with the Presidency Banks free of interest for several years past. Now you will find that, with the increased growth of currency, with increased taxation, with increased commerce, that the treasury balances must necessarily be larger and, therefore, the amounts placed at the Presidency Banks would also be larger, and, I think, if treasury balances were also to be placed at their disposal, the increased amounts would roughly run to not less than 7 or 8 crores of rupees. Now, would it be just to the other banks of the country thus to back up the Presidency Banks? I do not want to introduce any racial questions into this,—but I must invite attention to the injustice which would be done simply because it is a question of all-India trade, all-India commerce and all-India interests. It is also necessary to bear in mind the sentiments of the people. Hon'ble Members will find that, as against 735 lakhs of capital and reserve in the Presidency Banks, we have the other larger banks with a capital of about 524 lakhs, that is about 72 per cent. Of course, many of them are very small and it may not be safe to keep large balances with them, but still the question remains as to whether they would not suffer by the constitution of a Central Bank not subject to real State control. Professor Keynes made it clear that, in order to encourage Indian Joint Stock Banks and Native State Banks, a Central Bank with State control is absolutely necessary. Then, turning to the question of increasing the number of branches I submit, Sir, that the figures which I have quoted from Japan, the United States of America, not to speak of those of other European States, would show clearly that we must increase rapidly and enormously the number of branch banks. Fifteen hundred small towns have taluq treasuries, and there are 270 district treasuries; in all of them branches may and should be opened. The past history of the Presidency Banks shows that they established only 62 branches during so many years. One reason is, that the banks look legitimately to their own profits; the percentage of profits is 14, 16 and 12 and so on; whereas under the State law of Germany you find a gradation of profits allowed and the dividends run from 6 or 9 per cent. You find the same thing in America also, that these banks have paid only between 3 and 4 per cent dividends. Therefore, there is no use in disguising from our eyes the fact that the Presidency Banks or an amalgamation thereof is not likely, even if they were compelled to do so, to push forward as vigorously the increase in branches as a State bank would do.

"Then, Sir, there is the question of safeguarding Indian interests. A large number of shareholders as shown by Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya are Europeans and rightly so, because they have invested their money and at any rate they are keener bankers than other people. But, at the same time, the largest influence wielded in any Central Bank under the circumstances would be European and rightly so too. If the State control be of a very very subsidiary or superficial character, it is believed that there would be absolutely no chance of Indian banking institutions getting their proper share. I wish to submit that this would lead to very bitter resentment; and any policy which does not equally help the Indian joint stock banks should not be embarked upon.

"There is another point also, Sir, and that is this; we are going to have a semi-federal system of Government in India; the Provincial Governments would wish to have a very much larger voice than they have at present over the banks within their jurisdiction, and the Legislative Councils would desire to exercise very strong control and wield real influence to promote the development of the banking system; and I would, therefore, submit that the federal state system should be followed; we would have then a board corresponding to the United States federal boards, somewhat under the control of the Government, i.e., people, and adequate safeguards have been provided by Professor Keynes, in his detailed scheme to see that the shareholders exercise true control in real banking and to prevent banking or commercial interests being sacrificed unduly. The scheme provides for decentralisation, for absolute control by the shareholders in the domestic concerns of the bankers in the province, while at the same time the general policy of the country, the general good of the country would not be allowed to be sacrificed for the sake of private interests, however legitimate they may be, by the State control which is provided there. There would be necessity for various modifications therein, but I submit that in essence it is a sound scheme and provides both State and shareholders' control

. . . . . .

The Vice-President :—"I must remind the Hon'ble Member that he is coming to the end of his time."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"Then, Sir, there is the important question of purchasing gold and silver. The independent treasury system in India has created a very large number of treasury experts. Similarly, there would be every likelihood that a State bank would encourage the growth of a large number of banking experts, European and Indian. After all we are human; I suppose we would like to help our own friends and kith and kin, and therefore it legitimately follows that the Indian interests—however lofty and high-minded people particular individuals may be sometimes—would not receive the same encouragement under an amalgamated private bank as under a system of State management and control. I, therefore, submit to the consideration of the Council the immediate necessity for asking the Government to establish a central bank, inasmuch as there are so many interests which have to be conserved, encouraged, solidified, without mutual friction or risk of friction. I submit that the control of the State ought to be much larger than may be possible in the case of a private central bank, and that can be provided for without sacrificing any interests whatever, in the scheme outlined by Professor Keynes. I, therefore, submit that an analogous scheme, modified by the lessons which have been taught by the war, should be adopted immediately by the State, because, I think, there is no problem of more vital importance than this question of improving the banking facilities in India. The Industrial Commission has asked for it. Hon'ble Members will also see that whereas Government loans were only a few crores of rupees prior to 1916, when the Government vigorously undertook to advertise and to show the people the necessity for coming to their assistance, about 40 or 50 crores were forthcoming in a year. Therefore, we have abundant resources; our agricultural resources are not poorer than those of any other country if properly developed We may not have as much gold and silver as in other countries in a fluid form which can materially help the progress of the industries and commerce of the country; but still if the Government should undertake the development of banking as the people have got very very great confidence in what the Government undertakes, deposits would be readily forthcoming, and from the hoards if there be any. Much has been done for co-operative credit, much has been done for agriculture; but I think what has been done is a very very tiny fraction of what has to be done; and unless we have a broad liberal policy of expansion—and we cannot have a broad policy unless there are experts behind the Government to advise and initiate the broad policy and to encourage and to put it into effect—I do not think there is a bright future before us. We cannot after all expect a private banker, however eminent and high-souled he may be, to sacrifice his own profit for the sake of the general good. Past history shows that a laissez faire policy will not do if we are to achieve any real or rapid progress. I, therefore, submit that this Resolution deserves to be accepted by the Council."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi :— "I rise to accord my cordial support to this Resolution. The question of the establishment of a State Bank in India is an old one. It seems the Government has not yet been able to make up its mind in this question, but in view of its importance, I would strongly urge an early settlement. At the present time the Government performs many functions which belong, strictly speaking, to a State Bank. It reserves to itself the monopoly of Note Issue; it holds large sums of money in its treasuries; it manages the cash balances and portions of the Reserves; it regulates the foreign exchanges. All these functions are performed by one of the Departments of the Secretariat. They are, on the whole, performed well, but a State Bank is likely to provide a more efficient and expert machinery which will be in greater touch with the commercial world and be more cognisant of the financial needs of the people. It will also enable the Government to take over in the interest of the community other banking functions. The present arrangement is defective in many respects. Vast sums of money now lie idle in coffers of the Government during the months of the year in which the stringency of the money market is the greatest. This is hardly satisfactory. The proper utilisation of the various reserves—which, I hope, will henceforward be held in India—is also an important matter. But the most important question is the financing of the industrial and commercial concerns of the country. In an able Note prepared by Mr. J. M. Keynes, in collaboration with Sir Ernest Cable, for the use of the Chamberlain Commission, Mr. Keynes pointed out the many advantages of a State Bank to the Government and to the business-world.

"I do not wish to dilate on these advantages, but I may add that the advantages to the people are likely to be quite as great. In the words of Mr. M. deP. Webb 'a State Bank of this character, undertaking the whole of India's monetary business, internal and external, whilst adding greatly to the Government's power and prestige, would at the same time greatly encourage the banking habit amongst India's timid millions and would thus be a source of strength to the great masses of the people as no other institution could.' Mr. Keynes has also replied to the adverse criticisms of the proposal, and these replies appear to me to be quite convincing.

"In this connection I may be permitted to observe that an amalgamation of the three Presidency Banks will not solve the problem and would be open to very serious objection. Referring to Mr. Dickson's scheme of 1867 for amalgamating the three Presidency Banks, Lord Mayo wrote to the Secretary of State: 'I submit that it is not for the interest of a State that a great institution of this kind should grow up for all India, the interest of which may in time be opposed to those of the public, and whose influence at any rate may overshadow that of Government itself.' These words are as true to-day as they were in 1867.

"Indian opinion is practically unanimous in its demand for a State Bank. Our worthy Colleague, Sir Dinshaw Wacha, in reviewing the evidence recorded by the Indian Currency Commission, expressed himself in favour of the proposal. Mr. J. M. Keynes, a member of the Chamberlain Commission and a great authority on questions of Indian Finance, is a strong advocate of a State Bank. Sir Lionel Abrahams, after carefully weighing the advantages and disadvantages of the proposal, gives his opinion in its favour. Among European merchants, Sir Ernest Cable and Mr. Webb welcome the proposal. But opposition comes from the Presidency and Exchange Banks which fear a strong possible rival. But the 'vested interests' question is not really so serious as it seems. It is, I believe, quite feasible to safeguard all legitimate interests.

"In 1901, the Government said, 'it would be distinctly advisable, if practicable, to establish a Central Bank in India, so as to relieve Government of its present heavy responsibilities and to secure the advantages arising from the control of the Banking system of a country by a solid and powerful Central Institution.'

"I trust the Government sticks to this view, and I hope it will establish a Central State Bank at an early date. At present India and the United States are the only important countries of the world which have no State Banks. In the United States efforts are being made to start a State Bank, and, I believe, it will not be for long that India will lag behind."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"Sir, I rise to give my hearty support to the proposal contained in the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma's Resolution. It may seem a rather large order recommending to the Governor General in Council that a State bank on the lines suggested by Professor Keynes should be established at an early date. It may be said that this is a case in which the appointment of a Committee further to consider the question and to report would be the natural and more reasonable course. I think, having in view the past history of this question, the framing of the Resolution should not be too severely scrutinised. I hope the Government will see their way to declare their intention of taking early steps to have this matter investigated. There has been a large body of expert opinion which holds that there should be a State bank established in India. The history of banking in this country is somewhat unsatisfactory. I do not wish to take up much time over this question, but, I think, I should draw attention to what I said on the subject before the Industrial Commission. I there urged 'that the question of a Central State Bank having branches in every province should be taken up at an early date. The Presidency Banks have rendered inestimable service to Europeans in carrying on trade and commerce with India. They cannot under their existing charter help industries.' 12-15 P.M.

"The position of the Presidency Banks has been an obstacle in the way of the creation of a State Bank in this country, and it is very necessary briefly to refer to the work of the Presidency Banks. When the Government withdrew the right of issuing notes from the Presidency Banks in 1860 they agreed to help them by allowing them the use of public balances The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma has pointed out how huge these balances have recently been, and I think it is time for the Government to consider the situation. In a Finance Department memorandum of the 20th December 1860 to the Bank of Bengal [quoted by Sir (then Mr.) James Brunyate at page 81 of his valuable work 'An Account of the Presidency Banks'] the extent to which the Government admitted the obligation to compensate the Banks for the withdrawal of the right of issue was indicated as below :—

> 'The Bank of Bengal cannot be admitted to have any claim as of right to compensation, but they are certainly in a position deserving of much consideration and one in which they may equitably look for all reasonable support on the part of Government.'

"Government agreed to compensate them by giving them their cash balances without interest to the extent of 70 lakhs to the Bank of Bengal and 50 lakhs to the Banks of Bombay and Madras. In practice, as Mr. Sarma said, these balances have been very heavy. Sir James Brunyate points out in his book at page 39 :—

> 'Long before 1876 the Secretary of State had come to the conclusion that the Banks had been sufficiently compensated for the loss of their note issue.'

"It is high time therefore for the Government to consider the question whether these balances will be placed with Presidency Banks. If a decision is arrived at that the Government is not bound and that it is not fair in the interests of the public that these heavy balances should continue to be placed with Presidency Banks, the question arises how is the Government to deal with these balances? The need for a State Bank is obvious. I submit, therefore, that this proposal should be taken up earnestly at an early date and disposed of in an equitable and practical way. The proposal for a single Bank of India to take the place filled by the three Presidency Banks was before the Government of India between 1860 and 1876, but no decision was arrived at on the subject. The question was taken up by the Royal Commission on Indian Finance and Currency. They expressed no final opinion upon it, but recommended that it should be taken up at an early date. They said in paragraph 222 of the Report:—

> 'We regard the question, whatever decision may ultimately be arrived at upon it, as one of great importance to India which deserves the careful and early consideration of the Secretary of State and the Government of India. We think therefore that they would do well to hold an inquiry into it without delay and to appoint for this purpose a small expert body representative both of official and non-official experience, with directions to study the whole question in India in consultation with the persons and bodies primarily interested, such as the Presidency Banks, and either to pronounce definitely against the desirability of the establishment of a State or Central Bank in India at the present time, or to submit to the authorities a concrete scheme for the establishment of such a bank fully worked out in all its details and capable of immediate application.'

"That was in 1914; then the war came and the question was postponed and the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma has rendered a service to the Government and to the public by bringing forward this Resolution so that the question may be prominently brought to the front.

"Now, Sir, the next point which is a matter of importance is, what is the Government going to do? I do not know what the Hon'ble Mr. Howard will tell us; I hope he will tell us that the Government have decided to take up the question without any further delay and have the matter properly considered so that the Government may be in a position to decide upon the course to be followed. Personally speaking, I submit that there cannot be two opinions now about the need and the utility of a Central State Bank. When we look round and see the tremendous changes which have taken place in other countries, and when we compare the system of banking in India with the systems prevailing in the United Kingdom, in the United States of America, in Germany and in Japan, one cannot help feeling a great regret that this question of Banking in India should not have been tackled in a better way during all these decades. Japan was in a very backward condition in 1872. In the year of Restoration it had a very poor system of banking. The Japanese Government on the advice of Prince Ito invited a gentleman from London to organise its finance department. He introduced a sound system of banking, and the Financial Annual of Japan now shows what enormous progress they have made. It is a great pleasure and satisfaction to see how they have extended their system of banking and how they have helped their trade and commerce with their banks. I need not refer to the system of banking in Germany, because it is well known that her recent huge commercial prosperity was built up by her Banks. The United States of America have very extensive State Banks, and they have all been put on a sound footing, I venture to say by the federal system they have adopted which is a guarantee against disasters to individual banks. Now, the Government of India have it under their contemplation that there should be a great industrial development in this country. Industrial development needs banking facilities. It is impossible to think of any great development of our trade and industries unless there is a sound system of banking. That system has not only to be sound, but it has to be extensive too. The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma has pointed out how great is the need of having branches of Banks in various parts of the country. This need cannot be met unless the Government tackles the problem in a serious way, unless the Government examines the whole system of banking which is necessary for India. It is not only in one department, but in various departments, that the need for banking facilities is felt. The European community is receiving a certain amount of support. I do not know whether they have any complaint that more facilities are needed, but most certainly the Indian community does need many more financial facilities for the purposes of trade and commerce, and of industries. Apart from this, I submit that in a country like India with all the enormous sums which are available to the Government, it is a pity that there should not be one Central State Bank which should serve as a reservoir in which all the surplus revenue of the country should be gathered and which should be, so to say, the fountain to feed the different provinces and activities in different directions in different parts of the country. The building up of the Government of India, has been a great achievement, to our British friends, but it is some time now that they supplemented the administrative side of it by developing and building up to its full extent the financial and banking side also. We have to promote very great development in the direction of Railways, in the direction of industries; we have to promote irrigation; we have to promote co-operative credit societies and co-operative banks, and we have to promote small industries, and every one of these and many more will mean an organized, sound and extensive system of banking in the country. To my mind, the keystone of the whole system of banking would be a well-organized State Bank; and I therefore strongly commend the consideration of this question to the Government. I hope we shall not have to wait long to hear that the Government have decided to appoint a Committee of experts to advise on the question and to invite public opinion with the determination to decide this question before long. I hope that India will not have to wait long for such a time. I do not want to touch upon the other questions connected with the proposals now before the Council, questions as to how our currency and silver and other cognate subjects should be affected by the decision of Government upon this question. I am content to draw attention of the Government to the great need of having this question properly and fully considered. I hope the Government will do the needful and earn the gratitude of the people."

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard:—"Sir, I can say at once that Government are wholly in accord with a great many of the remarks which have fallen from previous speakers. We fully recognise the importance of a very large increase in banking facilities in this country and the necessity for their very much wider distribution. This is essential, as the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma and other speakers have pointed out, if the economic development of India is not to be impeded, and if the people are to be weaned from their habits of hoarding coin and bullion. This subject has been ventilated in this Council and, as the Hon'ble Pandit has also stated, has also been placed in the forefront of the recommendations of the Industries Committee. The necessity for it has further, I may say, been impressed upon us during the various currency difficulties that we have had in the last few years, as has also the necessity of greater co-operation between us and the banks. 12-38 P.M.

"I do not therefore think that I need labour this aspect of the case any further. It is sufficient to say that we are at one as to the necessity for increase in the development of banking, and the only possible point of difference between us is the best method of securing our object. I think most Hon'ble Members will have seen from the announcements that were made in a tentative way at the last half-yearly meetings of the three Presidency Banks, that the question of their amalgamation is under consideration. I can, I think, without divulging any confidence, state briefly the history of what has taken place. During the war we all of us felt that our banking arrangements left a great deal to be desired, and also that much greater co-operation is desirable between the three Presidency Banks themselves. The proposal suggests the fable of the old woman with the bundle of sticks. When the sticks were tied together they held, whereas the single stick might break. Well, we were unable, any of us, to take the question very much further at the time. I do not think a great many people realise how exiguous our own staff was; Government had its hands absolutely full of current problems which were engaging their attention, and we had not time to devote ourselves for many things which, though per se very desirable and almost essential, could not be attended to at the time. The banks again were all very short-handed and they have been themselves very hard put to it to carry on. We had, for example, a great many complaints at the delay in the issue of our loan scrip; but I think, in the circumstances, it is marvellous that the banks were able to do what they did, and Government owe all concerned a very great debt for the assistance they have given to us. Practically as soon as the Armistice was declared, the three Presidency Banks came together, and when Sir James Meston went to Bombay he was confidentially approached by them as to the way in which the Government would look on the question of their amalgamation. Well, we were only too glad to receive any advance of this kind on the Banks' part. Some informal discussions with the Banks followed, and they eventually put before us a scheme which we have passed on with our observations to the Secretary of State.

"It comes to this then, that we have before us a definite scheme for making a start in the direction of an improvement in banking facilities . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"May I ask the Hon'ble Member to give us some idea of the scheme that he has in hand?"

The Vice-President :—"If the Hon'ble Member wishes to make a personal explanation he may rise; he has no right to rise otherwise."

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard :—"I was just about to justify my statement by saying that the development of banking facilities was put forward as the basis of our discussion with the Banks, and they have undertaken, if this scheme goes through, to put before themselves the ideal of opening a branch in every district in India, and have further undertaken, within the first five years, to open no less than 100 branches in different districts, of which Government shall have the option of nomination 25 per cent. I think Hon'ble Members will admit that that is a very great and rapid advance, and that if this scheme goes forward, we shall at any rate make as reasonably rapid a step on the way towards the extension of banking as we can hope for.

"I have myself quite an open mind as to the relative theoretical merits of a State and a private bank as the central institution. But apart from any question of theory, the essential thing now seems to me to be to get on with the business. I therefore quite agree both with the Hon'ble mover in not suggesting any further references to a Committee, and with the Hon'ble Pandit that the delay involved by a reference to a Committee is undesirable. I should, however, like just to make one or two remarks about the question of State vs. non-State banks which have fallen from Hon'ble Members. The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma held up to us the examples of the State banks in France and Germany. What has happened there? Being State banks, their resources have during the war been absolutely exploited by their Governments. Loans have been taken from them on a huge scale with the result that those banks are now, I believe, in a very parlous position, certainly the bank in Germany is. The function of a bank towards Government loans is not to take them all up in block and embarrass its resources. The function of a bank in this respect, whether a State bank or a private bank, is to act in the way of a sponge; take a certain amount off Government in the first instance with the object of distributing part of it among bona fide investors. That function has only in part been performed by these large State institutions on the continent, who have been embarrassed if not crippled as a result of their direct connection with the Government. I merely mention this as a fact and not that I rely on it to support any theoretical view on one side or the other, because I realise that there is a great deal to be said on the theoretical side, and possibly also on the practical side, for a State institution.

"The case of the United States too is again quite different. There, again, they have not got to start to build up a new machine as it were ab ovo ; they had merely to put the coping stone on a very large congeries of running institutions which exist throughout the length and breadth of North America. I believe the national banks in America number something like 8,000, but I am not quite certain of the figure. This meant that, not only had they something to build upon, but they also had practically unlimited personnel with which to man the new institutions which they were setting in operation. Mr. Keynes' scheme of course presupposes that we should build on our existing Presidency Banks. There are, however, always two parties to such an arrangement. I do not know how the Presidency Banks would like to be taken over lock, stock and barrel like that. We certainly could not force them into anything of the kind. We could refuse them a renewal of their charter, but it would be quite open to them to carry on as ordinary banks, and if we in those circumstances wished to start a State Bank, we should have to start with nothing to build on at all. That seems to me to be quite out of the question, and the only real practical solution, looking at it as a commercial proposition, seems to me to be to use the machinery which we have, which is in running order and which commands public confidence. It does not follow, however, that by any initial step we take now, we are definitely committed for all eternity to a private bank as compared with a State bank. My only point is, it is quite clear that however we start, we must, if we wish to get a move on at all, start with some existing institutions, so that we can get on with the minimum of delay. When we have once proceeded as far as an amalgamation and have secured some closer co-operation with Government than is practicable under present conditions, the new institution, the Imperial Bank of India, can then be allowed to develop in the way in which development seems to be best required; whether in the direction of a State Bank or not I should not like to commit either Government or the Banks or anybody else now ; but there is nothing to prevent it from developing as necessary.

"I have spoken of the possible closer connection with Government. It would be out of place for me to go in any detail into the new arrangements which the Banks have proposed, and which we are inclined to favour, because they have still to be approved by the Secretary of State and to be laid before the shareholders of the Banks. I may say, however, that they contemplate that the new Bank should have at the top a central board, which should have on it representatives of all the Banks. That Board, however, could not meet weekly or daily as would be required of a managing agency. The representatives could naturally not be continuously absent from their local section of the new Bank where they would be required in order to carry on their own business.

"There will therefore have to be a smaller working body or Executive Board for current management. The spheres of the local boards of the new banks will at first correspond to the existing spheres, that is to say, Bombay, Madras and Calcutta. On the Central Board with representatives of these will be associated the Controller of Currency. The central Executive Board will consist of three or four representatives, of whom one will be the Controller of Currency. It is proposed that the Controller of Currency will, apart from being a member of this Board, have power to require the Board to hold up any matter which he may consider to be of vital importance as affecting either the financial policy of Government or the safety of its balances.

"I think that I can best deal with the other points which arise in the order in which they have been raised by Hon'ble Members. One very important point which the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma raised was the future treatment of the Gold Standard Reserve and of the Paper Currency Reserve. Well, as regards the ultimate future, I regard this as an open question, but with the constitution of the new bank, as it is proposed, it is very doubtful whether management of either of these could rightly be entrusted to that bank at the outset. Mr. Keynes himself postulated that the Paper Currency Reserve should so be taken over by the State Bank. But even in London, where very large paper currency issues were made during the war, and their future is uncertain, Lord Cunliffe's Committee recommended that it would be out of the question to make over the control of the £1 note issue to the Bank of England until matters had come back to normal. In any case our Paper Currency administration could not be made over to the Central Bank until conditions again reached normality, and that may be a question not of one year or two years, but it may be five years or more. At any rate that question must be at present and continue to be an open one. As I think the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma himself realised it might very well be an open one whether the bank is a State-owned Bank or whether it is not.

"Similarly, with regard to the Gold Standard Reserve, I think the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma rather implied that Professor Keynes contemplated that the State Bank should take over the Gold Standard Reserve. . . .

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"No, there has been a change since."

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard:—"At any rate, that was not the case. He merely contemplated that the bank should intervene in connection with the Gold Standard Reserve,—I think I am correct in stating that—when it had to be utilised for the purpose of regulating exchange.

"We now come to the very important question of our balances. The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma has recognised, and the Hon'ble the Pandit has also recognised, the importance of Government balances being placed, as far as possible, at the disposal of trade. We have gone a long way in that direction in the last few years. The reserve treasuries are at present exiguous. They very seldom now-a-days run to more than a crore. It is necessary to retain as much as that when you have three separate institutions, as otherwise it would be very difficult to provide at call the funds necessary, say, in Bombay to meet Council Bills. It is true we have recently gone very much further than in the past in that direction by placing our reserve treasury balances with the banks; but this is due to two causes, first, and more important from the public point of view, in order that the money market should be rendered as easy as possible for trade; then, for Government operations, if the market gets tight, we have more difficulty in floating our loans and great difficulty in carrying on. That is the second reason. However, our present contracts with the banks are not, as one or two Hon'ble Members seem to think, rather one-sided. Until the war they were a constant bone of contention between us and the banks. We received every year, if not oftener, representations from the banks that they were very inadequately recompensed for the important services which they render to Government. This was recognised. The question of a modification of the existing banking arrangements kept on cropping up, and it was decided to ask the banks not to move for revision of their contracts immediately, until some of these other larger and more important questions were settled, but it was at the same time arranged that we should place with them rather larger balances at their head offices as a standing matter than they were strictly entitled to under their contracts.

"Mr. Sarma has referred to the large sums which are kept at the branch offices of the banks. These, however, are not kept at these offices merely for the use of the banks, but because we have at several of these branches very important liabilities continually coming upon us and we have got to keep a sufficient balance there in order to meet them. It may be said that these branches include not merely small out-of-the-way places but large towns like Rangoon, Karachi, Cawnpore and Lahore. At Karachi, for instance, we have huge disbursements to make, say of 50 lakhs, or more, while in Rangoon we have, I believe, to keep a balance of at least 40 lakhs. We should have to keep very much more money in these places if we only had treasuries there. A good deal of this money is only 'till money,' and the same applies to the money kept at our present district treasuries. The latter balances (which are not of course held at the banks) ordinarily run to 6 or 7 crores distributed probably over 200 treasuries, that is to say, our average balances at each of these treasuries run to something like 3 lakhs only. The amount at individual treasuries is therefore small; it is 'till money.' There is no question of making over this 'till money' at the district treasuries until the Presidency Banks extend their operations by opening branches at the places where these district treasuries exist. That is to say, if the Presidency Banks in one year open 20 new branches, well, then, they will automatically secure the control over twenty times 3 lakhs. But that again is not a very great additional recompense for the work which the Bank will do at those treasuries. It will always have to find funds for us when we want to spend them, but it helps its cash and, therefore, possibly may help to make it profitable to open branches at those places

"Another question which the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma asked was, would it be legitimate for us to give our funds to one bank only as distinct from other banks? Well, I can only say that the surplus funds which we keep are relatively small; though we have to keep a very large sum as a working minimum in order to keep going. We have got these very large disbursements to make from day to day. We may have to pay out 50 lakhs at one place and 20 lakhs at another, and you cannot without notice either take that money away from a bank or provide it at a treasury without making some arrangements. In fact, we find it very difficult to work with a total balance of less than 14 crores. Now and then for a week or two we may have large balances; for instance in the last week of the loan (about the end of August) we received four or five crores; it may be another week or two before that money is spent. It will be necessary for me to explain to Council to-morrow that so far from our being full of resources as some Hon'ble Members here have said from time to time, we have, from day to day, from week to week and from month to month, with the very greatest difficulty, been carrying on.

"From another point of view also I should like to say that these arrangements with the banks have not been altogether one-sided. If we have any surplus we are very glad to leave it with the banks for the reasons I have just said, namely, that it helps us in our own operations and helps trade also. On the other hand, if we have not got any money surplus to our requirements and the banks still want some assistance, we ask them to take a loan from us of that money and charge interest to them for that loan, and we have done so on more than one occasion. In their turn the banks have always showed themselves ready to help us whenever we have been in a tight corner, as we have unfortunately been more than once. I shall not be disclosing any secret when I say that they have charged us only 3½ per cent. which compares very favourably with the rates at which we are generally able to raise such money by way of treasury bills or otherwise. Last year we received advances to the extent of 17 crores; and this year also we have similar advances to the extent of 13 crores.

"There is just another point which arises here. I think it was rather implied that if the banks had to take responsibility for holding larger balances on behalf of Government they would require to be strengthened. It is proposed that the banks should raise additional capital.

"Then there was some question with regard to the relative treatment of Europeans and Indians, with reference to which I should just like to make a few remarks. I think that it is not generally realised, the extent to which presidency banks do even at the present time help internal trade. Apart from operations connected with business at the presidency-towns, they do help the financing of the internal trade of India to a very large extent by their purchases and re-discounting of internal bills of exchange, known generally as 'hundis'. The shroffs, mahajans, chetties and others who either directly or by their relations with smaller 'banks' of the same kind largely finance the movement of produce and of important articles of commerce, such as piece-goods in the up-country markets, rely to a very great extent upon assistance from the presidency banks when in a season of active trade their whole capital is fully employed. On some occasions, for example, the amount of hundis held by the Banks of Bengal and Bombay has exceeded a third of their total advances, and during the busy season the proportion is rarely less than a quarter. The connection of the Presidency banks with up-country trade is thus already very close and intimate. It must not be understood that the financing by these banks of the internal trade and the assistance given by them to Indian financiers and merchants is limited by the extent of their hundi business. A substantial portion of the cash credits given by the Banks represent advances made directly against produce hypothecated to the banks by Indian traders. Again, loans against Government and other approved securities are frequently made to Indian concerns. In any case, with the increase in the number of branches up-country it is clear there will be a substantial increase in the assistance given by it to help the internal trade of the country.

"Mr. Sarma referred in this connection to a statement made apparently by Mr. Vidya Sagar Pandya that the shareholders in the Presidency Banks were predominently European. I am not sure of the other banks; but taking the case of the Bank of Bombay, I find that there are 20,000 shares in the Bank, of which 7,447 are held by Europeans and 12,553 by Indians. Mr. Sarma then developed his argument by saying that on that account the Indian trade did not get its proper share of advances. As I have said just now, the amount of the hundi business alone, apart from other advances, has been sometimes one-third of the whole advances and at any rate not less than one-fourth even during the busy seasons. The bank of Bombay have kindly furnished me with the figures of their advances to Europeans and Indians respectively. The advances to Indians amounted to 654 lakhs, while the advances to Europeans amounted to 140 lakhs. Of this advance to Europeans, 35 lakhs were advanced against the new loan to enable them to subscribe to it; the corresponding figures for Indians were two lakhs; so that if we deduct these figures from the total, you get about 650 lakhs for Indians and 105 lakhs for Europeans, that is to say, approximately 6 to 1. I have not got similar figures for the Bank of Bengal; but Sir Norcott Warren informs me that the relative proportion is probably 49 per cent to Indians and 51 per cent. to Europeans; that is perhaps not unnatural, as the jute trade at this time of the year absorbs very large advances indeed. As regards Madras, I have the figures given to the Hon'ble Pandit before the Industries Commission. Approximately 110 lakhs are advanced on the average to Indians and about 80 lakhs to Europeans I think it is perhaps not unnatural that the Bank of Madras, with reference to whom most of these allegations have been made, is able to do the least in assisting trade of all the Presidency banks, whether European or Indian. It must not be forgotten that the resources of that bank are very much smaller. That fact is reflected again in the further fact that the bank rate is invariably, I think, 1 per cent higher than the other presidency banks' rates. I may say that Sir Bernard Hunter has frequently complained that he did not have resources to help trade in his presidency in the way in which he would have liked. I should like to quote here one remark which he made before the Industries Commission. He was asked by the Hon'ble Pandit 'you yourself feel that these are not sufficient for the financing of industries in this presidency?' Sir Bernard Hunter said 'I have always thought that India is underbanked and one difficulty is to get resources with which to open more branches. We have got to remember that a bank has two sides; on one side it borrows and on the other side it lends. In new branches my experience is that it is always in one way that banking facilities are wanted, that is facilities for loans. There is no object in opening branch banks when you have not got enough money to go round. That is the sole reason of the want of development of banking in this presidency.' Well, I may say that Sir Bernard Hunter has told me often that he is very anxious to open as many branches as he can in spite of that difficulty, and, I think, it is only because of the war that the Bank of Madras did not two or three years ago increase the number of branches. That difficulty will very largely be remedied in so far as Madras is concerned by the institution of a central bank when it will be possible in the slack season in Calcutta or Bombay for the central executive agency to allocate funds to Madras.

"Then there was just one further point about which I should like to make one remark, and that is the question of assistance by the central bank, whether it is a State bank or a non-State bank, to industries.

"We contemplate of course that any Central Bank must help to finance industries as far as it can do so on the security of liquid assets. There can be no question of any Central Bank which is a bankers' bank financing new industries, where it will be necessary to lock up its funds for an indefinite period; if it did that it would endanger the whole banking arrangements of the country.

"I think it will be seen from these remarks that we do agree with a great deal of what Mr. Sarma has said, and I am glad to have this matter ventilated in the Resolution. We do want to get on with the business quickly, but we are unable to go into the theoretical side of the question and to consider what in some circumstances would be the best, namely, whether a State or a non-State Bank. It is for these reasons that I regret the Government cannot accept this Resolution."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"Sir, we are deeply grateful to the Hon'ble Mr. Howard for his clear statement of what the Government proposes to do in this matter; we are glad that the Government recognise that additional banking facilities will have to be placed in the hands of the people. I should like, however, to state that we regret that the Government should have come to a decision about the practical steps to be adopted without following the procedure recommended by the Industrial and Currency Commissions, and giving the public opportunity for discussion. I can understand that one of the objects in doing so may be that the Government wanted to push on this question as quickly as possible from the practical point of view, and that the only procedure which seemed open to them was to amalgamate the three Presidency Banks as a first step; and the rest was to come later as circumstances permitted. But, Sir, I think this statement, so far as it has been disclosed to us, does not seem to be satisfactory from the Indian point of view. Instead of the Presidency Banks working separately, except occasionally when they meet 1-2 P.M.

together for the purpose of formulating a general policy to govern them, which policy it is optional with any of them not to adopt, they are going to have a central board of management. That is so far to the good; then so far as the Government are concerned, they propose to place the treasury balances at the disposal of the central bank, the extent of which would be dependent partly on the development of their branches. The only control so far as I can see to be exercised by the Government from what was explained to us, is that of the Controller of Currency who is to be on the board when there is a question of general financial policy involved, or when he feels that the safety of the Government balances may be endangered by any proposals. I do not see that the control of the Government is intended to be very effective in any other direction. The only return for the placing of necessary balances at the disposal of the bank by the Government is going to be that the amalgamated bank undertakes to open 100 branches in five years. Ordinarily the Central Banks would be interested in opening branches only where they can make a large profit, but 35 of these places are to be chosen by the Government. There is no doubt that in the ordinary course of business the Presidency Banks would have increased their capital in so far as it might have been necessitated by trade, but they have now promised to do so and no one disputes this fact that a large proportion of the business that has been done in the past was with Indians, but it must be so inasmuch as the vast majority of the traders are Indians. But the point is, whether there was not an undue preference where there was an option and it would not continue to be so in future. It is a natural consequence from the composition of the shareholders and the management, and we must try to regulate the future so that nobody may be prejudiced and have reason for complaint. The Hon'ble Mr. Howard gave figures for Bombay but not Madras or Calcutta, the Madras figures are against him; the vast majority of the shareholders were in 1913, Europeans. The shareholders of the Bank of Bengal were mainly Europeans in 1909 according to the Capital, I do not know how far that is correct now. The fear of the Indians is when the three banks are amalgamated that the management would be almost exclusively European in the Central Bank and in the absence of rigorous control by the State, the condition of things may be worse in future than it is at present. It may be that a province which is far distant from the centre like Madras may instead of being benefited be occasionally sacrificed for the trade interests of other provinces or centres. My submission is that under the new system the Indian community, commercial, banking, industrial or agricultural, is not likely to fare better but worse than under the old system; except that as the result of additional money being forthcoming, it would result in an advantage to all. Another point is that so far as I can see it does not look very advantageous to the public that the State should sacrifice interest on crores of rupees, though the aggregate sum may be varying from day to day, for the sake of only 100 branches being opened in five years. I do not think that is a profitable financial bargain. I realise that the Government have difficulties and that they have not here a very large number of efficient Banks which they can utilise for building up a State Bank, and the most influential banks are the Presidency Banks. But my submission is that it would be absolutely wrong if the tentative proposals are not placed before the Indian Bankers and Indian commercial and public men, before the Secretary of State pronounces upon them and before a final decision is arrived at. That is our quarrel. Let these tentative terms be published. Let all the Indian Bankers know what they are and how they would affect them, and let there be public criticism, and let this criticism be forwarded to the Secretary of State and let him, after going through these criticisms, arrive at his conclusions, and let the final negotiations and bargains 'be struck,' let there be an expert committee consisting of Indians as well as Europeans by whom these questions can be threshed out; the Presidency and other banks and the Government sitting together at a round table may consider what the various difficulties are and arrive at some solutions. But I submit, Sir, that the whole of the private negotiations between the Government and the three Presidency Banks, however well meant they may be, will be taken amiss, and for justifiable grounds. This is of course but a repetition of the old procedure; when a matter is under communication with the higher authorities it is a secret and cannot be published. When the higher authorities have pronounced an opinion, it comes too late for the public to suggest any modifications, and the public will be asked to wait for a reasonable time to see how the thing works and that takes years. This is extremely unsatisfactory. Therefore, I submit, that the public and the Members of this Council ought to be given an opportunity to pronounce upon these tentative proposals before definite conclusions are arrived at and before it becomes too late to suggest a revision. My submission therefore is that it was wholly unwise on the part of Government that they should have kept these negotiations secret. I knew from the answer which the Hon'ble Sir James Meston gave to my question in Delhi that he was not favourably disposed towards the appointment of a committee, as suggested by the Commissions, and that is the reason why I have brought forward this Resolution in a somewhat definite form, it was also because the proposals for the amalgamation of the Presidency Banks were maturing.

"Sir, there are some matters of detail to which I would like to refer for a moment. I never thought that industries would be directly financed from the Central Bank or that it can deal with any but liquid assets. It must be a bankers' bank. The point is as to whether we have anything on record to justify the assumption that in the past any very great zeal was exhibited by the Presidency Banks in forwarding the cause of Indian industries, manufacturing or agricultural, and from our past experience we have no reason to believe that our future would be so bright. That is the reason why we are asking for greater Government control.

"Then with regard to the treasury balances, I knew that with regard to the branches, much of it, as was stated in the Commission's Report, is there for Government treasury purposes. But as was pointed out, there are occasions when large sums like 3 crores, 6 crores and 9 crores could be utilised without interest much in excess of what has been agreed to. Of course if the terms and the services as between the Government and the amalgamated bank have been arranged already, well let us know exactly what those terms are, and let us know how much interest is going to be sacrificed for those services, and what those services are going to be; the mere opening of 100 branches, and the promise to increase the capital are, I venture to submit, not services worth having for such a heavy price. I realise that the working balance would have to be about 14 crores and the amounts would be fluctuating, but still I submit that we have on record that sums to the extent of 5, 6 and 7 crores have been with the Presidency Central Banks and they could utilise them, and hereafter, as I have said, with the additional money that would flow from increased taxations and currency, the resources would be improved and the amounts would be larger .

The Vice-President:—"I must ask the Hon'ble Member to bring his remarks to a close as his time is up."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I therefore propose that if the Hon'ble Member could give me an assurance that this question would be more favourably considered than it has been, and the proposals would be published for public criticism before the Secretary of State would pronounce upon them, I have not the slightest objection to withdraw this Resolution; but if he says that nothing can be done, I should press the Resolution for a vote."

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard:—"Sir, may I say a word or two in answer to the points raised by the Hon'ble Member? Firstly, I do not think that we can publish the scheme before the Secretary of State has had an opportunity of expressing an opinion. He may or may not accept the proposals which have been put forward. Any publication of the scheme before he has done so is to be very much deprecated because it would obviously lead to speculation in the shares.

"With regard to shares the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma seems to make rather a grievance that more shares . . . .

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I am stating only the facts."

1-17 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard:—"I do not know against whom he makes a grievance that more shares are not held in Madras or Bombay, but I know as another fact that there is no prohibition in the Statutes of the Banks against Indians or others acquiring shares of the Banks.

"There is another point I should like to refer to, and I should be very glad if the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma would give me some help. He says that we are sacrificing a great deal of interest, as a result of the branches of the banks taking over our balances at our District Treasuries. I should like to know how else we can get interest at present on what is only 'till money' and if Mr. Sarma would explain, I should be very grateful.

"Then there is another point which, I regret, I omitted to mention. The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma suggested that the only control that we shall have over the banks will be that exercised by the proposed position of the Controller of Currency on the Administrative Board. That is not the case. The proposals, if agreed to, or in whatever form they are agreed to, will obviously have to be embodied in a new Act which will involve an entire re-casting of the present Presidency Banks' Act, and the details of that will certainly have to come before this Council and considered by this Council. Of course Government may at that stage be committed to some main principles, but there will still be several important questions of detail, for example, the nature of control to be exercised by the Controller of Currency and so forth. That is all I have to say."

The Vice-President:—"I understand the Hon'ble Member desires to press the Resolution before the Council."

The motion was put and the Resolution was rejected.

RESOLUTION re ELECTRIFICATION OF RAILWAYS.

1-20 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum:—"Sir, I beg to move that—

> 'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council the immediate consideration of the electrification of the suburban railways within 25 miles of Calcutta and of the improvement generally of local passenger transport and terminal facilities.'

"Sir, about a fortnight ago the Hon'ble Mr. Phelps moved a Resolution in the Bengal Council to the effect that a Committee should be appointed to discuss the question of the rise in rents in Calcutta. The Resolution was accepted by Government, and therefore in a way it may seem rather premature that I should move this Resolution about improving communications; but without doubt one of the reasons for the rise in rents in Calcutta is that the demand for land in the immediate neighbourhood of Calcutta has outstripped the supply, and therefore it is absolutely necessary that people who want to live near Calcutta at reasonable rents must go outside. This has been the case, of course, in most of the big towns of Europe; London, Manchester, Liverpool all have very large suburbs which have steadily increased, and as they have increased, the railway communications with them have improved. Already there is a very large number of the working population of Calcutta who come in every day. In the year 1903 by the railways round Calcutta there was a daily influx to Calcutta from within 25 miles of 10,663 passengers. In the year 1918 this had risen to 25,792. The railways by which these passengers come in are the Eastern Bengal State Railway, the East Indian and the Bengal Nagpur Railway and the two small railways, the Howrah-Amta and Howrah-Sheakhala Railways. To give the Council an instance of the number of people who come to Calcutta daily, the proportion who come to Calcutta, I may instance the clerks in my own office. We have 276 clerks. Out of this no less than 99, or 36 per cent. come in daily by train to Calcutta. Out of these 99, 55 have to leave their houses before 8 o'clock in the morning and do not get home till 7-30; and of course there is no doubt about it, that the reason is bad communication. I might take as an instance the East Indian Railway. Between 5-20 and 6-20, which is the time when most people go home from the offices, there are three trains between Howrah and Bandel, that is a distance of 25 miles. Each of these trains takes a little over an hour and 20 minutes to do the journey, and they stop at every single station, 15 stations. Now, if that line was electrified and you had more frequent services of trains, and instead of having long and expensive trains to run, you could have short trains of three or four carriages, you could have a frequent service of trains, and instead of stopping at every station they could stop at every two or three If you are able to run your trains, electric trains, so that they stop at every two stations, you would do that 25 miles in 50 minutes instead of one hour and 20 minutes, thus saving half an hour on each journey, or an hour a day for every passenger who came backwards and forwards to Calcutta And I daresay that could be still further improved, and you could have the trains stop at every three stations perhaps. Of course it is perfectly obvious that it would be an advantage to the travelling public who have at present to wait half an hour if they miss a train, to get another in ten minutes. The same applies to all the other lines, and I am perfectly well aware that there are only three of these lines which concern the Government in that the Howrah-Amta and Howrah-Sheakhala are purely private lines. But perhaps the Howrah-Amta and Howrah-Sheakhala need this electrification more than any other because they are more crowded and the conditions of travelling are distinctly worse than they are on the big railways. For that reason though I would not expect for one moment that Government should consider themselves the electrification of these railways which are private railways. But, I think, it is very desirable that any Committee which meets in Calcutta or elsewhere to discuss this question should also consider the question of these two small railways.

"Then we come to the point as to how this electrification is going to be carried out, because it is a very expensive project to consider the electrification of so many railways. I understand that the cost of actually electrifying the railway, that is providing the necessary rolling-stock and the wiring for carrying the electricity and so forth, is about double the cost of the power station. And before the war the total cost of electrifying the Eastern Bengal Railway for 25 miles or 30 miles was estimated, I think, at something like a million pounds. That would include the power station. If, however, the railways could all be persuaded at the same time to electrify, the cost of a central power station would be very much decreased. Therefore, I would like to suggest that, if Government are willing to consider this question, they should consider the question of a central power station. In that case I have the assurance of Sir Rajendra Nath Mukerjee that he would be prepared also to electrify the two small lines. It is a lot of money to be found and I have spoken about that to several people in Calcutta before I left, and the conclusion that I came to was that if Government would be prepared to guarantee to a certain extent that they would take-power from the central power station for these various railways, I think there would be no difficulty in finding the money for the central power station in a somewhat similar way to that in which private railways are financed. But it is not only with the railways leading to Calcutta that I would ask that the Government should deal, but with the facilities in Calcutta itself. The Hon'ble Mr. Bompas the other day, in a note to the Improvement Trust of Calcutta said: 'There is no city of the same size outside China so badly provided with public means of locomotion as Calcutta.' Even if you get the passengers to Howrah or Sealdah, they have still got a very long way to move before they get to their offices. A few years ago, I believe, the question of a central station in Calcutta was considered, and it was abandoned on the score of expense; and presumably if the expense was too great then, it would be far too great now. That was for a central station in the neighbourhood of Bowbazar.

"What I think the Government might consider is, whether it would not be feasible to electrify the Port Trust line from Chitpore down towards the jetties, and whether passengers could not be brought in from Sealdah in that direction. There is no doubt, I suppose, that we would have certain vested interests in the form of the jute balers and other people who have jute presses and land and jute godowns along that line raising objections. But when this matter of removing the jute trade was considered by the Port Facilities Commission about five years ago, the Commission reported that they were willing to agree that the jute trade should be left there for the present, but that if the line was required for other more important reasons, the question of its removal would have to be decided.

"I have no doubt about it that it is a very important thing for all our clerks in Calcutta that they should be able to get nearer to the actual business premises, and, for these reasons, I hope that the Government will be able generally to accept my Resolution, which is only asking for an inquiry into the whole question."

1-30 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes :—"I may say at once, Sir, that the Government fully realise the importance of the subject-matter of the Hon'ble Member's Resolution, and have no hesitation whatever in accepting it. The electrification of our railways in the neighbourhood of the great cities of India is of great importance, because by that means, as the Hon'ble Member has pointed out, we shall increase the carrying capacity of our railways in dealing with suburban traffic and shall make it more possible for people to live outside the great cities. In this way, a considerable step will be made towards solving the housing problem, which Mr. Crum has told us is so acute in Calcutta and which, I am sure, my Hon'ble friend Mr. Nigel Paton would say is even more acute in Bombay. But I should not like the Hon'ble Mr. Crum or other Hon'ble Members to think that we have taken no steps in the direction of investigating the possibilities of electrification. In 1914, the Government appointed some experts to go into the question of electrifying the railways running into Calcutta, and a report was made by those experts ; but, unfortunately, in 1914, the war broke out, and all these projects have had to stand over. The scheme in question was favourably reported on, but it has, as I say, suffered the fate of many other projects during the war. The scheme referred to the Eastern Bengal Railway only. The East Indian Railway had also had under consideration the electrification of a part of their system, the part that is nearest to Calcutta, and there has been a suggestion of a joint powerhouse to serve both these systems, i.e., the Eastern Bengal Railway and the East Indian Railway. I do not know at the present time what the views of the Bengal Nagpur Railway are, but the Bengal Nagpur Railway management has never been backward in adopting a forward policy.

"I was glad to hear the Hon'ble Member suggest that the electricity needed should be provided by some central power-house, and I gathered from what he said that private enterprise in Calcutta would be willing to embark upon this. There seems to me very considerable advantage in private enterprise coming in here, always provided that the electric current can be provided for the railway systems in question at a reasonable rate, because, if private enterprise comes in and supplies the power-house, we shall have so much more money available for railway development in other directions. Mr. Howard has just told me that the amount set aside in this year for capital expenditure on railways in India is 17·7 millions sterling. That is a large sum but, as you all know, our railways have fallen into very bad repair during the past five years, and we want an enormous sum to set our open lines in order.

"As regards the question of how I can best help this project along, I would suggest that when I come down to Calcutta, as I hope to do during the cold weather, I should call a meeting of the three big systems interested and, if the Hon'ble Member thinks it advisable, I should be very glad to invite those who are in control of the two smaller systems which he also mentioned and one or two representatives of the Bengal Chamber and the Bengal National Chamber. Let us all sit round a table and see if we cannot evolve some scheme for furthering the project outlined in the Hon'ble Member's Resolution. I should like, however, to remind him that the needs of Calcutta for electrification do not stand alone; the need of Bombay is even more urgent, for the housing problem there is extremely acute, and I am sure that the Hon'ble Members who represent Bombay would be quick to point this out.

"Sir, I shall be very glad, as I say, when I come down to Calcutta, to discuss this question, and I hope the course I suggest will meet the Hon'ble Member's wishes."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—"Sir, I am very pleased that the Hon'ble Member has accepted my Resolution and I do not think there is anything more to say. I am very grateful that the Government will take the matter in hand, and the method by which the Hon'ble Member proposes to do it is, I think, exceedingly satisfactory." 1-35 P.M.

The motion was put and the resolution was adopted.

The Vice-President :—"The next Resolution on the list is the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha's Resolution. I do not know whether he thinks he will be able to finish it before 2 o'clock."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"I do not think so, Sir. We might take it after the recess"

The Vice-President :—"After this the 'deluge,' so far as Resolutions are concerned. We shall not sit after 2 o'clock."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"Then I shall move it now."

RESOLUTION re APPOINTMENT OF AN INDIAN MEMBER TO THE ARMY IN INDIA COMMITTEE.

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"Sir, I rise to move the Resolution which stands in my name and which runs as follows:— 1-36 P.M.

'This Council recommends to the Governor General in Council that he may be pleased to make a representation to the Secretary of State for India (or, if need be, to His Majesty's Government) that an Indian member chosen from the non-official Indian members of this Council be appointed to the Indian Army Commission recently constituted.'

"As the Council may be aware, the Secretary of State has recently appointed an Indian Army Commission, and the constitution and the personnel of this Commission have been duly announced. The personnel of the Commission, Sir, has not given satisfaction to the public either in England or in India, and I find that on August 6th Mr. Fredrick Roberts asked a question in the House of Commons of Mr. Montagu on the subject. He asked the Secretary of State for India—

'whether the Indian Army Commission will inquire into the grievances of the Indian section of the Army and of Indians generally with regard to the military policy of the Government; why no Indian is appointed a member of the Commission; whether the omission will be made good before the Commission commence their work; whether the Right Hon'ble gentleman is aware of the strength of the feeling against Sir Michael O'Dwyer for his recent administrative acts in the Punjab; and why he has been appointed in the face of such feeling?'

Mr. Montagu replied:—

'Under the terms of reference the Committee is concerned with general questions of military administration and organisation, not with grievances; but I am considering the appointment of an Indian member. I do not see that recent administrative acts in the Punjab have any bearing on this inquiry.'

"Captain Ormsby-Gore also asked the Secretary of State for India 'why no Indian has been appointed on Lord Esher's Committee on the Indian Army?'

"Mr. Montagu replied. 'The appointment of an Indian to the Committee on the Army in India is under consideration.'

"That will satisfy the Council that even in England exception has been taken to the constitution and the personnel of the Committee. In India, since the announcement was made, public opinion has been insistent that there should be at least one Indian public man to represent the Indian point of view on this Committee. It has also been given out, Sir, though not formally, that an Indian gentleman has been offered a seat on this Committee and that he has accepted it, but no formal announcement has been made so far of that. The name of the gentleman said to have been appointed, however, has not satisfied Indian public opinion, and for this reason that the gentleman whose name has been given out is known to be merely a military expert and can thus advise the Committee on military matters only, but he is not in a position, regard being had to his experience of Indian problems, to advise the Committee on the financial aspects of Indian Army administration, nor on those which affect the public at large. It was under the impression that an Indian gentleman had already been appointed, or was going to be appointed, that I first desired to word my Resolution in the way that there should be an additional Indian Member, but when I learnt that no formal announcement had been made to that effect, I altered the Resolution to the form in which it stands now on the agenda paper However, I hope that the Hon'ble Sir Alfred Bingley will look into the spirit of the Resolution and not take up the wording of it. As the resolution stands, you will notice, Sir, that I make no distinction between the elected non-official members of this Council, and the nominated ones. There are 32 non-official members of this Council, of whom 27 are elected and 5 nominated. I have no desire to make any invidious distinction between the two classes of members, and therefore I have not put the word 'elected' in my Resolution. I leave it open to the Government to choose whomsoever they like, an elected member or a nominated one. At the same time, I hope that in order to satisfy the public demand the gentleman chosen by the Government will be one who comes within the definition of a public man. I need not mention names to the Council; there are many elected members of this Council who are well-known public men, and any of them would be able to make a very good member of this committee. I have been told that the question of appointing an Indian public man does not arise inasmuch as that committee has been constituted not with a view to going into any special grievances of Indians or about any other matters except those of military administration and organisation. That may be, and in that view there may be no harm in appointing an Indian military expert to advise the committee. At the same time I take it that this committee will deal with financial problems also. Unless I am greatly mistaken it will be impossible for the committee to consider the military administration of the country without going into the financial aspects of the case. Indian public opinion for the last fifty years has been insistent that there has been an ever-growing and increasing expenditure on the Indian Army, far beyond the resources of the people of India; and therefore, I think it highly desirable that on this committee there should be somebody who can put forward not only the expert military view of the matter, but also that which the people of India hold on this question. When I speak of the people of India I know my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Macpherson, will get up and say 'There are certain non-political classes who have said nothing about this matter'. But when I say 'the people of India' I am not talking of these non-political classes, the 'dummies and mummies'; I am talking of those who are politically minded, those who think out things for themselves; and I say that this class has been insistent that during the past fifty years the Indian Army has been a very expensive luxury for the people of our country, that it costs a very large sum of money, far beyond the means of the people. I, therefore, contend that there should be a second Indian member on the Committee, who will be a public man chosen from among the elected members of this Council, and who can best advise the Committee on this particular point.

"I have only one word more to say, as I am speaking against time. It is sometimes said :'Oh, well, in a technical matter like this, how can an Indian public man be useful ?' But that contention seems to me to be futile. In England we have civilian Secretaries of State for War and Under Secretaries of State for War; they are not, so far as we know, drawn from the ranks of the Army; but they are taken from civilian classes. Here on this committee I understand there are to be two civilians, Sir Godfrey Fell and one other gentleman. In this country we find our civilians not only advising on military affairs, but doing all kinds of things, as heads of telegraphs and post offices, police, education, and various other departments. Therefore, I think that there can be no serious objection to an Indian civilian, by which I mean an Indian public man, being appointed on this committee; and I hope Government will see their way to accept my Resolution, and that they will recommend somebody from this Council from amongst the elected Indian members whose appointment will give satisfaction to the public. With these remarks, Sir, I beg to move the Resolution."

The Hon'ble Major-General Sir Alfred Bingley :—"The Resolution which the Hon'ble Member has just moved is one which Government is quite prepared to accept and has, indeed, anticipated. The Secretary of State, with the concurrence of His Excellency the Viceroy, has appointed the Hon'ble Major Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan Tiwana, who is a member of this Council, to be a member of the Army Committee. 1-45 P.M.

"Sir Umar Hayat Khan has served in France and in Mesopotamia and has rendered valuable service in connection with recruiting. He belongs to a class which has rendered conspicuous service throughout the war, and his knowledge of the army and of the races from which it is recruited will be of special value to the Committee, as it is knowledge gained in the fiel as under peace conditions.

"As there seems to be some doubt as to the composition of the Committee I may mention that the other members are :—

President :

VISCOUNT ESHER.

Members :

SIR MICHAEL O'DWYER, late Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR H. V. COX, Indian Army, Secretary, Military Department, India Office.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR W. C. JACOB, Indian Army, Commanding 2nd Army Corps, Army of the Rhine.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR H. HUDSON, Indian Army, Adjutant General in India.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR J. P. DU CANE, late Commanding 15th Army Corps in France.

SIR G. FELL, Indian Civil Service, late Financial Adviser, Military Finance Branch, Finance Department, Government of India.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR W. GILLMAN, late Chief of the General Staff in Mesopotamia.

Secretary :

BRIGADIER-GENERAL C. M. WAGSTAFF, Royal Engineers.

"It may be of interest if I make a few remarks as to the objects of the Committee. It is considered that the time has now arrived for reviewing our military position in the light of the experience gained during the last five years.

"The system of army administration now in force is the system which was introduced in 1906 on the highest military advice then obtainable, namely, that of Lord Kitchener.

"The sponsors of that system—the then Secretary of State for India and his expert advisers laboured however under an important disadvantage—a disadvantage for which they were in no way responsible—they had not the recent experience of a great war to guide them.

"Needless to say it does not follow that a system which is found workable in peace time will necessarily prove a sound one in war. However smoothly things may run when conditions are normal, defects are liable to disclose themselves under the strain and the altered conditions of actual war.

"The Admiralty system of administration in England has existed for a long period of years without undergoing any radical alteration. This is because it has been handed down from the period of the great naval wars, and because it may be said to be founded on the proved requirements of war. It has seldom been the subject of attack and may be said to have the confidence of the Empire.

"The War Office has not been so fortunate. During the latter half of the last century no other public department came in for so much hostile criticism. Great changes were frequent and stability of administration was not attained until a comparatively recent period.

" Our military system in India has just been subjected to the strain of the greatest war in history. It was but natural that defects and shortcomings should have revealed themselves—in fact it was in the light of what I have said inevitable that it should be so. Nevertheless, in spite of these defects, the system now in force has enabled India to more than double her army in the course of the war and to raise over a million of men. It has enabled her to maintain great Expeditionary Forces overseas and to play a distinguished part in the word-wide struggle now happily ended. To achieve these results, it has been necessary to remedy defects as they appeared; but it will be readily recognized that anything that could be done in this direction was necessarily in the nature of a temporary expedient. Any general revision or reconstruction of the system of military administration had to await the conclusion of the war.

" It now behoves us to turn to the best possible account the invaluable experience acquired during the past five years, experience which has been bought at a great price and which, let us hope, is unlikely to recur in the lifetime of those who have survived. We want to extract the last ounce of benefit from the lessons which the war has afforded us, and to ensure that for the expenditure we incur on the Army of the future, we secure the maximum of efficiency. The best way of doing this is to bring to bear on the problem the best brains and the most recent experience available. The Committee which is about to assemble is composed of men of great ability and distinction, and all of them have special qualifications for the work before them.

" It will be the business of the Committee to—

(1) Inquire into and report, with special reference to post bellum conditions, upon the administration and, where necessary, the organization of the Army in India, including its relations with the War Office and the India Office, and the relations of these two Offices with one another.

(2) Consider the position of the Commander-in-Chief in India in his dual capacity as Commander-in-Chief and Member of the Executive Council, and to make recommendations.

(3) Consider and report upon any other matters which they may decide are relevant to the inquiry.

" It will be realised that the problems with which the Committee has to deal are difficult and complex, and that their task is one of great magnitude; but I think that this Council and the public may rest assured that the matter is in thoroughly competent hands.

" The Hon'ble Member has suggested that there is a desire in Indian circles, and more especially among the Indian elected Members of this Council, to provide for the safeguarding of Indian interests, particularly as regards military expenditure, by appointing an additional Indian Member to the Committee. I can assure him that this is a function that can safely be left to the Government of India, and that there is no necessity for going beyond the terms of his Resolution. Nevertheless, if any Members of this Council are anxious to explain their views in regard to military expenditure or any other matter coming within the scope of the Committee's inquiry, I have no doubt that the latter will be glad to examine them and consider their recommendations."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" Sir, I am disappointed at the reply which the Hon'ble Sir Alfred Bingley has given. It was well known very long before notice of this Resolution was given by the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha that our Hon'ble Colleague Malik Sir Umar Hayat Khan was to be a member of this Committee. Without saying one word 1-52 P.M.

regarding his qualifications as a military man, I may say in this Council without a semblance of disrespect or discourtesy to him that the announcement did not satisfy the Indian public interested in the question of the proper and efficient administration of the Indian Army. And not only was dissatisfaction expressed in this country, but I think the Hon'ble Mr. Chintam, the editor of the 'Leader' wrote an article in the 'Times' or some paper expressing that view. Now it was in order to give expression to those sentiments that the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha gave notice of his Resolution. He has not said one word against the Hon'ble Sir Umar Hayat Khan, nor do I wish to say one word against him as regards his qualifications to express an opinion upon military matters. But it will be recognised by the Council that the questions which have been referred to this Committee, which I am glad will be presided over by Lord Esher, are of very deep importance to the people of this country as a whole. The Government have recognised the importance of this question by nominating a very strong Committee. There are eight gentlemen who represent the civil and military elements among the European element. Now there is one Indian member on this Committee. Putting aside everything regarding the high qualifications of the Hon'ble Sir Umar Hayat Khan as a military man, I ask the Council, I ask the Hon'ble the Army Secretary to say whether he is satisfied that this is fair, whether in a matter of such public concern to the people of India, for we Indians constitute a large fraction of the Indian Empire, we Indians pay the taxes which support the Army, we supply effective soldiers and labour and we are affected by mismanagement and inefficiency, in the medical or other services which are a necessary part of the army administration. We Indians are deeply and vitally interested in the question. Is it right, is it fair of the Government to take only one Indian member to represent the Indian point of view and to put forward the Indian point of view? I submit that it is not. The bulk of the Army is Indian; Indians are interested, they suffer along with their British fellow subjects from mismanagement in the Army. We have had complaints of mismanagement in Mesopotamia; there have recently been complaints about the medical arrangements in the Afghan war. Did Indians suffer or did they not suffer? Look at the question from any point of view, look at it from its military aspect, it affects Indians much more than their British fellow-subjects, look at the financial aspect, it will be seen that it affects the Indians much more than their European fellow-subjects; look at it from the medical or any other aspect and you will find that Indians are more deeply and vitally affected than Europeans. Therefore it is only fair that this Committee should be increased by an Indian. I do not complain of any member who has been appointed, but you owe it to the public to put on some other Indian gentleman who may be able to watch the inquiry from the point of view of the general Indian public. It may be said that the questions to which Sir Alfred Bingley referred will be purely questions for military experts. Military experts will be wanted there and, they are there, but there are other questions which affect the general civil population. In England, as the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha pointed out, military questions are not left entirely to the military. Military men are very good and they deserve our gratitude for the sacrifices they make and for the dangers to which they are expo ed. But I may be permitted to remark that there are questions which are not purely expert in their character; there are questions in which civilians may be allowed without being considered impertinent to offer an opinion. Such questions are discussed in the English Parliament times without number. Was not this great system which you are going to rectify the result of a discussion between a civilian Lord Curzon and a military man Lord Kitchener? Has not the experience of the war shown that the views held by Lord Kitchener were not correct and that there was much in the views of a civilian like Lord Curzon to commend themselves to the consideration of military men? If this was so you cannot dispense with the views of civilians. You cannot dispense with the views of Indian public men, are they not interested, have they not sons and relations who have fought in the war? Have these men not contributed towards the success that has been achieved by His Majesty's arms in the war?"

It being 2 o'clock:

The Vice President.—"I am afraid I must call upon the Hon'ble Member to resume his seat."

The Council then adjourned to Wednesday, the 24th September 1919, at 11 A.M.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

(5 & 6 Geo. V, Ch. 61.)

The Council met at the Council Chamber, Viceregal Lodge, Simla, on Wednesday, the 24th September, 1919.

PRESENT:

His Excellency BARON CHELMSFORD, P.C., G.M.S.I., G.M.I.E., G.C.M.G., G.C.B.E., Viceroy and Governor General, presiding, and 45 Members, of whom 37 were Additional Members.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha asked :— 11 A.

Articl the I Social Reform and T of Indi increa salari

1. " (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to a contributed article in the Indian Social Reformer of Bombay of August 17th last, headed 'The Epidemic of Increased Salaries' and to an editorial note thereon in the same issue of that paper headed 'Economy in Public Expenditure' in the course of which it is stated that 'in our opinion the prospects of the success of the Reform Scheme are gravely imperilled by these measures' (increase of salaries)?

(b) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the following observations on the same subject in the Times of India in its issue of November 1918:

> 'Unless there are radical changes, one effect of this scheme (of Reforms) will be largely to increase the expense of the administration at the top, when any reasoned survey of the Indian administration must show that it is already too expensive at the top and not expensive enough at the bottom. It would not be unfair to describe the Indian administration as one where very large > salaries, with very costly additions like migrations to the hills and other heavy expenses are provided for those at the top, whilst in very few cases are those at the bottom paid a living wage. None can study this question without being convinced that the greatest need of the day is economy at the top and greater expenditure at the bottom ; unless there is a radical change in our ideas, these inequalities will be perpetuated and extended.'

(c) Will Government be pleased to state the names of the various services, the scale of salaries of the members of which has been increased since the publication of the Report of the Public Services Commission, the amount of increase in each grade of the various services so affected for the better and the total additional cost to be incurred as the result of the reorganization schemes already sanctioned ?

(d) Which are the services schemes for the reorganization of which are at present under consideration or in contemplation ?

(e) Do Government propose to increase the salaries of the members of all the services that are as a rule recruited in Great Britain and Ireland, or is there any one of these which it is not proposed to bring under the salary-increasing reorganization scheme ? "

" (a) and (b) Government have seen the articles referred to.

(c) The attention of the Hon'ble Member is drawn to the reply given by the Hon'ble Mr. Howard to the Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma on the 12th instant. In the case of most of the services mentioned in that reply grades have now been abolished, and it is therefore impossible to work out the definite comparison of cost asked for.

(d) All the services detailed as annexures I to XXIV of the Report of the Public Services Commission are, as the result of that Report, the subject of consideration.

(e) There is no general scheme for increase of salaries as suggested in the question—The case of each service is being examined separately as the result of the recommendations of the Public Services Commission. The majority of the cases have been submitted for the orders of the Secretary of State ; and the recommendations made refer not only to those sections of the Imperial Services, which are recruited in the United Kingdom, but also to those sections which are recruited in India, and to the provincial services. The Secretary of State has in a recent answer given in the House of Commons stated that he will deal with all these cases as expeditiously as possible, and the decisions arrived at will be made public as soon as they are communicated to the Government of India. In these circumstances, it is not possible to give any more definite information as to the proposals of the Government of India in the case of each service. "

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha asked :—

Speech delivered by the Hon'ble Sir Benjamin Robertson in connection with the Afghan War.

2. " Has the attention of Government been drawn to the following passage in the speech of the Hon'ble Sir Benjamin Robertson delivered by him on the 22nd of July last, as the President of the Legislative Council of the Central Provinces :—

' If India would have to pay a heavy bill for the Afghan War, she will only be paying for the agitation against Government which influenced the Amir in his foolish enterprise.'

(b) Have Government in their possession any statement made by the Amir that he was either going to invade India or had done so in view of or because of any '.agitation against Government' by the educated classes of Indians? If so, will Government be pleased to quote the said statement, or to lay it on the table?

(c) If the answer be in the negative, do Government propose to inquire from the Hon'ble Sir Benjamin Robertson the basis or justification for the said observations and to embody the same in the reply to this question? If not, will Government be pleased to state their reasons?

(d) Do Government propose to discourage agitation by the Indian people for constitutional reforms because the Amir or any other head of a foreign State may be able to make it a pretext for embarking on a 'foolish enterprise'? If not, do Government propose to make a statement to that effect?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"(a). The Government of India have seen a passage, which the Hon'ble Member has not quoted accurately, from the speech referred to.

(b) The Hon'ble Member is referred to paragraph 3 of the Home Department Resolution of May 10, 1919.

(c) Does not arise.

(d) The Government of India do not consider that the question of constitutional reforms is relevant."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha asked

Instructions to Magistrates re: declaration and demand of security from newspapers.

3. "Will the Government be pleased to state whether any instructions have been issued to Magistrates that they are to call for a report from the police and the Criminal Intelligence Department (commonly known as the C. I. D.), concerning any person applying for a declaration regarding either a press or a newspaper or a periodical and are to be guided by that report in deciding the question of declaration and the demand of security?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"The Government of India are not aware of any such instructions."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha asked :—

Number of newspapers periodicals and presses dealt with under the Press Act, 1910.

4. "Will Government be pleased to lay on the table an up-to-date statement showing :—

(a) the total number of newspapers and periodicals and presses respectively dealt with under the Press Act of 1910;

(b) the names of such newspapers, periodicals and presses, together with the names of their printers, keepers, publishers or editors;

(c) the place, province and the language in which such papers and periodicals were or are printed, and the place at which the presses were or are located;

(d) the nature of the penalty imposed upon each under the said Act giving reasons for the same;

(e) the name of newspapers, periodicals and presses which ceased to exist as a result of the action taken; and

(f) the names of newspapers, periodicals and presses which could not start at all in consequence of the demand of security or refusal to grant the required declaration?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"The Hon'ble Member's attention is invited to the statements laid on the table on March 12th, 1917. Information for the years 1917-1919 will be collected and presented when ready."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha asked :—

Papers, journals and periodicals proscribed by Government.

5. "Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement—

(a) showing the names of papers, journals and periodicals the circulation of which has been proscribed in the various provinces from time to time, the date of the order of proscription and the name or designation of the authority which passed the said order, and

(b) indicating the papers, journals or periodicals against which the ban still continues in one or more provinces?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"The Government will cause information regarding the action taken during the past three years to be laid on the table during the Delhi Session. They trust that the Hon'ble Member will be satisfied with this limitation of the range of his inquiry."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha asked :—

The Seditious Meetings Act.

6. "(a) Is the Seditious Meetings Act in force in the Lahore and Amritsar districts of the Punjab?

(b) Is it not a fact that both these districts have been completely free from any disturbances for over four months?

(c) If so, do Government propose to take any steps in the matter of the withdrawal of the operations of the said Act from these districts? If not, why not?"

"(a) and (b) The answer is in the affirmative.

(c) In view of the recent occurrences in these two districts, the Government of the Punjab considers that the unrestricted holding of public meetings might cause excitement and possibly result in disturbances. It does not therefore propose to withdraw the notifications issued under Act X of 1911 at present."

Deportation of Dr. Ghosh of Peshawar to Burma.

7. "(a) Has one Dr. Ghosh of Peshawar been deported to Burma? Have any other persons been deported from Peshawar to Burma? If so, how many and when have they and Dr. Ghosh been deported?

(b) Will Government be pleased to state the circumstances justifying the deportation of Dr. Ghosh and such other persons? How long is it proposed to keep them so deported?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

"(a) Yes. Dr. Ghosh and twelve others were deported from Peshawar to Burma on 13th of May last.

(b) The persons deported were persons who had been active in fomenting feeling against Government and were thereby directly or indirectly assisting the King's enemies. They had created a state of excitement in the city and its environs which could not be tolerated when war was in progress on the adjacent frontier and when enemy agents were present and active in the city itself. It is reported that there was a plot for mobs to break out and damage a number of buildings and stores of vital military importance in Peshawar, on hearing that fighting had commenced at Landi Kotal. It was consequently decided to surround the city with a cordon of troops and to arrest certain prominent enemy agents, and at the same time to remove the persons referred to in the question whose activities were a support and encouragement to such agents. The arrests were effected with some difficulty. Arrangements have been made for the immediate release of ten of the thirteen men, and the other three will probably be released shortly."

Industrial ventures.

8. "(a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the following statement in an editorial paragraph headed 'Occasional Notes' in the Statesman of September 6th 1919 :—'The past few months have seen a prodigious investment of capital in new industrial ventures, some of them Indian controlled'? Is this statement correct?

(b) Will Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing, year by year, the names of the joint stock limited liability and private limited liability companies registered in British India during the last two years (August, 1917 to July 1919) or up to such other period for which statistics may be available—the amount of the nominal capital of each and the constitution of the directorate of each as showing whether it is a foreign or an Indian concern?

(c) Is it not a fact that by far the larger number of these companies and an overwhelmingly large percentage of the capital subscribed are owned and controlled by natives of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland?

(d) Have Government in their possession any material tending to show that the announcement made by the Secretary of State for India, on the 20th of August, 1917, as to the gradual establishment of responsible government in this country, has deterred the United Kingdom capitalists from making investments in this country since the date of that declaration? If so, will Government be pleased to state the same or to lay it on the table."

"(a) The only official knowledge which Government possess with regard to the subject-matter of the paragraph in question is contained in the monthly returns of new companies registered, issued by the Department of Statistics, copies* of which I lay on the table.

As regards the second part of the question I lay on the table* monthly returns from August 1917 to July, 1919, issued by the Department of Statistics, which give the names of the Joint Stock companies and Private Limited Liability companies registered during this period, and the amount of the authorised capital of each company. These statistical returns do not show the constitution of the directorates, but a list of directors is in each case filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock companies and is open to the public.

With regard to the third part of the question I invite the Hon'ble Member's attention to the reply given by Sir Thomas Holland on the 21st of March 1919 to a somewhat similar question asked by the Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi of Kasimbazar, a copy* of which I lay upon the table for the Hon'ble Member's convenience. It will be seen from the figures given by Sir Thomas Holland for the six months ending the 31st of January 1919, that it was estimated that out of the 113 companies registered, 65 were promoted by Europeans, 44 by Indians and 3 by Europeans and Indians together. The Government have no reason to think that the relative proportions have varied widely during the last few months.

*Not included in these Proceedings.

With regard to the fourth part Government have no reason to believe that the announcement of the 20th August 1917, has deterred capitalists of the United Kingdom from making investments in this country."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha asked :—

The Bengal and North Western Railway.

9. "(a) Is it a fact that there was recently a strike on a fairly large scale by the employees of the Bengal and North Western Railway ? If so, will Government be pleased to state the circumstances under which the strike occurred, the reasons urged therefor by the employees, the terms on which the strike was brought to a close and any other matters of public interest connected with the same ?

(b) Are Government aware that there has been for a long series of years amongst the public of Bihar and of the United Provinces very great dissatisfaction with the working of the Bengal and North Western Railway and that at several sessions of the Provincial Conferences of both the above mentioned provinces, resolutions have been unanimously passed condemning the administration of that railway for the unpunctuality of its train services, the want of adequate passenger accommodation, especially for those travelling in the third class, the absence of proper arrangements for lighting the trains and platforms and supplying water to passengers at stations, and for failing to provide the necessary comforts and conveniences, such as through carriages to even first and second class passengers ?

(c) If the answer be in the affirmative, what steps, if any, have been taken to bring about an improvement in the working of that line ? If the answer be in the negative, do Government propose to institute an inquiry into the accuracy of the complaints enumerated above ? If not, why not ?

(d) Is it a fact that of the large and important lines in this country, the Bengal and North Western is the most cheaply worked and that it pays the highest dividend to its share-holders ? Is there any other line of equal length which has paid during the last ten years a higher dividend ? If so, which and when ?

(e) Is it a fact that a large number of shares in the Bengal and North Western Railway are held by a peer or his family ? If so, who is that peer, and how many shares does he or his family hold out of the total number ?

(f) Are Government aware of the popular impression that the Government of India are unable to interfere with the administration of the Bengal and North Western Railway because of the great influence exerted on the Home Government by the said peer or his family ? If so, is there any basis for the said impression ? If not, do Government propose taking steps to improve the administration of the line ? If not, why not ?"

"(a) The majority of workshop employees and a portion of the traffic staff of the Bengal and North Western Railway went on strike on the 28th and 31st

August, respectively. The Agent of the Railway has reported that no previous signs of disaffection had been shown nor had petitions been received from the workshop employees, while in the case of the traffic staff a new scale of pay had been framed and was about to be issued. The traffic staff resumed work from the 1st September and the revised scales of pay are now in force. The workshop staff have now resumed work unconditionally.

In reply to (b) and (c), individual complaints regarding this line have been received by the Government of India. The question of punctuality is one which receives constant attention, but the railway is a difficult one to work on account of the many junctions which exist on the system, a large proportion of which are foreign, and the consequent liability of through trains to detentions if connections are to be maintained. I may explain for the information of the Hon'ble Member that the railway is inspected on behalf of Government once a year. The Inspector has instructions to report on such matters as directly affect the public, namely, conveniences for third class passengers, waiting rooms, refreshment rooms and so forth, and copies of the reports for the year ending 31st March 1919 are laid on the table. Government take such action on these reports as they may consider necessary in the interests of the travelling public, but if the Hon'ble Member will bring to the notice of the Railway Board any specific cases in which public interests are considered to have been neglected on the Bengal and North Western Railway, they will be carefully investigated.

(d) It is not a fact that the percentage of working expenses to gross earnings is lower on the Bengal and North Western Railway than on any other important system, nor are the dividends declared by that company the highest. The ratio of working expenses to gross receipts is lower on the East Indian Railway, while dividends declared by the Southern Punjab Railway are higher than those distributed by the Bengal and North Western Railway. The Southern Punjab is, it is true, worked under special terms by the North Western Railway, but the percentage of gross receipts retained by the working railway is greater than that at which the Bengal and North Western is worked. For complete information as to the relative working costs and net earnings of Railways, I would refer the Hon'ble gentleman to the Administraion Report issued by the Railway Board.

(e) and (f) Government have no information, nor are they aware that any impression such as that referred to by the Hon'ble Member exists in the public mind. It may be noted that the Bengal and North Western Railway proper has been constructed entirely out of funds provided by the general public, and does not enjoy any guarantee or other financial assistance from Government."

10. "Will Government make a statement showing, province by province, the progress made in the matter of development of agricultural and other economic resources of the country, in pursuance of the resolutions adopted at the War Conferences held at Delhi and at the different Provincial headquarters ?"

Development of agricultural and other resources.

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"The Hon'ble Member's question can conveniently be dealt with in two parts :—

(a) The development of agricultural resources ;

(b) The development of other economic resources.

With regard to (a) the detailed information asked for is not in the possession of the Government of India. The failure of last year's monsoon, however, rendered it almost impossible, and the subsequent cessation of hostilities made it unnecessary to develop the agricultural resources of the country with special reference to war needs.

With regard to (b) it is impossible to say precisely which of the industrial activities of the Indian Munitions Board, of the Provincial Industries Departments, and of Controllers of Munitions were undertaken in consequence of the War Conferences, and which in pursuance of their pre-existing scheme of work. An account of all these activities is, however, given in the Indian Munitions Board Handbook which explains what has been done to develop India's industrial resources for war purposes; describes some of the general industrial development which has taken place during and on account of the war; and discusses the possibility of further development in future."

Imperial Customs Service.

11. "(a) How many subordinates have been appointed in the Customs Imperial Service by nomination, since 1910?

(b) How many of these are Indians? Which posts were they selected from?

(c) How many Indians are there at present in the Appraisers' Department of the Calcutta Customs House? What proportion does the number bear to the total strength? Has it come up to the figure laid down by the Secretary of State yet?

(d) Were any of these ever promoted to the Imperial Service?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"(a) Since 1910, only one officer from the subordinate Customs Services has been permanently appointed to the Imperial Customs Service by nomination.

(b) He is not an Indian and was selected from the Bombay Customs Preventive Service.

(c) The present strength of appraisers in the Calcutta Custom House is 27, and the Bengal Civil List shows that out of these 8 are Indians. The Secretary of State for India has not laid down any rule regarding the number of Indians to be employed in the Appraisers Department.

(d) None of them have ever been permanently promoted to the Imperial Customs Service."

Admission of Indians into the Appraisers' Department.

12. "Will Government be pleased to state whether the orders of the Secretary of State governing the admission of Indians into the Appraisers' Department of the Calcutta Customs House have any reference to the Preventive Service as well?

(a) Is it a fact that the Preventive Service has not been thrown open to Indians?

(b) Have any applications for appointment in that service been received from Indians?

(c) If so, will the Government be pleased to state how those applications have been disposed of?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"Rules based on the first Public Services Commission Report, and permitting the appointment of Indians to both the Appraising and Preventive branches of the Customs Service, were framed by the Bengal Government and approved by the Government of India and the Secretary of State in 1891. As regards the latter branch the Bengal Government represented to the Government of India in 1900 that preventive officers were subject to great exposure in all weathers, that the conditions of their service were such that no ordinary native of Bengal would be able to discharge the duties adequately, and that in fact no application from an Indian for appointment in the Preventive Service appeared ever to have been received by the Government of Bengal. The Government of India, while considering that there were practical objections to the appointment of an Indian, save in exceptional circumstances, to be a Preventive Officer, were of opinion that the time had come when the Government of Bengal should try the experiment of appointing more Asiatics to Appraiserships, as in Bombay. In 1909, at the instance of the Secretary of State, the Government of India invited the attention of the Government of Bengal to the above-mentioned orders, and requested them to issue necessary instructions to the Collector of Customs, Calcutta, with a view to the adoption of the principles which were decided on in 1900.

"The Government of India have no information with regard to points (b) and (c). The control of the Preventive Service rests with the Local Government who make all appointments thereto."

Customs Club.

13. "(a) Is it a fact that the Customs Club is housed free in a Government building and that the Superintendent of the Preventive Service is the ex-officio President of the Club?

(b) Are Government aware that a rule has recently been passed by this Club rendering Indians ineligible for membership?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"(a) In 1916, the Government of Bengal made certain proposals for the construction of quarters for the junior members of the Calcutta Preventive Department subject to the condition that the scheme would not be carried out until financial exigencies permitted and the necessary funds were available. They proposed to provide for a Recreation Room, a Reading Room and a Billiard Room on the premises. The scheme was accepted by the Government of India, but, as far as they are aware, the quarters in question have not yet been constructed.

(b) The Government of India have no information on the point."

Memorial for increase of pay by the Preventive Officers.

14. "(a) Is it a fact that the Preventive Officers of the Calcutta Customs House have submitted memorials to the Government of India for an increase in their scale of pay on the ground of their present emoluments being insufficient?

(b) Are Government aware that qualified Indians are available for service as Preventive Officers on the existing scale of pay?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"(a) No memorial has been received by the Government of India from the Preventive officers of the Calcutta Customs House for an increase in their scale of pay for a number of years past until two days ago, when a memorial was received from them through the Government of Bengal for the substitution of an incremental system of pay for the present graded system, on the grounds that the latter has now become obsolete and that the present rate of pay is no longer sufficient owing to the high cost of living at the present time.

(b) The Government of India are not aware that any qualified Indians are available for service as Preventive Officers on the existing scale of pay. They understand that the question of appointing Indians to this branch of the Custom House has been engaging the attention of the Collector of Customs for a considerable time lately, and that that Officer reports that, though he has interviewed one or two likely candidates, he has not found anyone who could be regarded as suitable for the Service."

Register of applicants for appointment to the Preventive Service.

15. "(a) Is it a fact that the Superintendent of the Preventive Service keeps a register of applicants for service in the department in which they are divided into two classes :— (a) Educated and (b) Uneducated?

(b) If so, how many of class (b) are now in the Department?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"The Preventive Service is under the control of the Local Government and the Government of India have no information on the subject."

The Hon'ble Maharaja Sir Manindra Chandra Nandi asked :—

Indian Preventive Officers.

16. "(a) How have the non-Indian Preventive Officers worked in the Calcutta Customs House?

(b) How many of these have been dismissed, suspended or compelled to retire during the last twelve months for suspected smuggling or acceptance of bribes?

(c) Are there Indian Preventive Officers in the other ports?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"The answer is the same as to the previous question, namely, the Preventive Service is under the control of the Local Government and the Government of India have no information on the subject."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum asked :—

Expenditure of Indian Revenue on the Imperial Institute.

17. "With regard to the statement in paragraph 132 of the Report of the Industrial Commission that there is no longer any justification for the expenditure of Indian revenue on the Imperial Institute, will Government be pleased to state :—

(a) what annual grant is paid to the Imperial Institute ;

(b) whether they are aware that it is held in certain quarters that the work of the Imperial Institute is of considerable value to merchants ; and

(c) whether they will consult Chambers of Commerce before taking action in the matter ?"

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"(a) An annual grant of £1,300 is paid to the Imperial Institute from Indian revenues, namely :—

(1) a maintenance grant to cover all charges in connection with the Indian Section other than the Scientific and Technical Department of the Institute.	1,000
(2) For the Scientific and Technical Department ...	200
(3) Half the pay of the Indian representative appointed by the Secretary of State on the Managing Committee of the Institute.	100

The institute also enjoys the interest on a special sum of £34,000 contributed by India, which was invested as an Endowment Fund.

(b) The Government of India are aware that the Imperial Institute is occasionally consulted by merchants in India, but they anticipate that inquiries on commercial subjects will in future be addressed mainly to the Indian Trade Commissioner in London who has been appointed for the special purpose of giving assistance of this nature.

(c) The Government of India are in correspondence with the Secretary of State on the subject of continuing their contributions to the Institute, and they cannot at present give any undertaking on the subject ?"

Indian People's Famine Trust Fun

18. "What is the present financial position of the Indian People's Famine Trust Fund ? How much money from the Fund has been allotted during the present scarcity and famine season and to what provinces, and what were the amounts allotted to each such province."

The Hon'ble Mr. R. A. Mant replied :—

"Owing to the absence on tour of the Honorary Secretary to the Fund I am unable to give an accurate statement of its present financial position, but I lay on the table a statement* showing the assets of the Fund on the 31st

*Not included in these Proceedings.

December 1918. On that date the Endowment Fund was Rs. 28,10,000 and the other assets amounted to Rs. 12,89,032-10-3. During the present famine and scarcity the following allotments have been made :—

	Rs.
Bombay	4 lakhs.
United Provinces	3 lakhs.
Central Provinces	1 lakh.
Madras	20,500."

The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal asked :—

Unclaimed balances in Banks.

19. "(a) Is it a fact that there are large unclaimed balances left with the various banks and assurance companies throughout India, that the amounts in most cases have been unclaimed for generations past, and that the amounts have been absorbed by the banks and included in their assets ?

(b) Do Government propose to cause a return to be made by the various banks of the balances left with them as unclaimed during the past twelve years and take steps to recover the amounts as having escheated to the Crown and at the same time make legal provision absolving the banks from any future responsibility to claimants once the deposits or claims have been made over to the Government after the statutory period ? "

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes replied :—

"The Government of India have no information regarding the unclaimed balances left with the various banks and assurance companies. The point raised by the Hon'ble Member will, however, receive consideration."

The Hon'ble Rai Sahib Seth Nathmal asked :—

The Influenza Epidemic.

20. "(a) What was the number of deaths in the various provinces during the period of last influenza epidemic ?

(b) What sum, if any, was allotted by the Government of India for the relief of distress to the various provinces ?

(c) How much money has been spent by the various Local Governments, from the provincial funds, and how much by the local bodies from their own resources ?

(d) Do the Government of India propose to place at the disposal of the Local Governments substantial grants from their funds and also to instruct the Provincial Governments to help the local bodies to the fullest extent to relieve distress ? "

The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi replied :—

"(a) The number of deaths from all causes during the period of the influenza epidimic of 1918 is shown province by province aud month by month in the statement* which is placed on the table.

(b) No application for financial assistance was received from any province, and consequently no allotment was made by the Government of India.

(c) The information, as far as available, is to be found in the reports of Sanitary Commissioners. Further information will be requested and the replies, when received, will be laid on the table.

Vide* Appendix A.

(d) Expenditure on combating epidemics such as influenza, forms a charge upon provincial revenues. The Government of India are able to assist by the supply of influenza vaccine. The steps which have been taken by the Government of India in this and other matters are explained in a circular letter from the Education Department no. 441, dated 14th July 1919, which was published at the time. It will be seen that Provincial Governments were asked to assist local bodies in the distribution of vaccines. It also appears from the reports of Sanitary Commissioners that during the epidemic of last year Local Governments gave assistance to local bodies. Thus, in the Central Provinces, grants amounting to Rs. 2,60,000 were made for this purpose and in the United Provinces all applications for financial assistance received from local bodies were immediately sanctioned in full."

Printing Presses and Newspapers.

21. "What is the number of the printing presses and newspapers against whom action has been taken (a) since the 30th March, 1919, (b) since the commencement of the war, and the nature of such action and the amount of security forfeited?"

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent replied :—

" The Hon'ble Member is referred to the answer given to a similar request for information made by the Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma asked :—

Rate of exchange in fixing the salaries of Europeans in departments of the Government.

22. "(a) Will Government be pleased to state whether in originally fixing the salaries of Europeans in the various departments of Government, the exchange value of the rupee was taken into consideration and, if so, at what rate it was so taken ?

(b) Will Government be pleased to state whether in fixing the increase in the emoluments of Europeans in (a) the Indian Civil Service (b) the Army and (c) the other services, the salaries and allowances and pensions payable were fixed in sterling and then converted into rupees, and, if so, at what exchange rate they were so fixed ?"

" (a) Without a very exhaustive search into old records, it would not be possible to say whether, when salaries of Europeans in the various departments of Government were originally fixed, the exchange value of the rupee was taken into consideration; but the Hon'ble Member will readily recognize that not only would the search be very laborious, but even should it appear that in some cases this was a factor in deciding pay, it would have little bearing on present circumstances, since not only have rates of pay been frequently revised in the interval without reference to this factor, but the purchasing power of the rupee has greatly varied.

(b) In no case in which recommendations have been made of recent years for the increase of pay of Europe recruited members of the services has the general principle been followed of fixing salaries or pensions in sterling and subsequently converting them into rupees. Such recommendations as have been made are based on the purchasing power of the rupee in India."

At this point the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma rose.

The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes:—"I think my Hon'ble friend is under the impression that we are dealing with the next Bill on the list."

THE IMPORT AND EXPORT OF GOODS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

11-30 A.M. The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes :—"My Lord, I beg to move that the Bill to extend the operation of, and otherwise to amend, the Import and Export of Goods Act, 1916, be taken into consideration."

11-31 A.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, I earnestly request the Council to take into consideration the question as to whether it would not be well to postpone the consideration of this important Bill to another date. My Lord, I must confess that I had not the Act with me when this Bill was introduced on the last occasion, and I did not realise the importance of the subject at the time. The time at my disposal was so very short, that I could hardly understand the true significance of this Bill. I venture to say that this Bill is one of the most important of the Bills that has been introduced during this Session into this Council, because it enables the Governor General in Council to continue the policy which was in force during the war and which has been allowed to be in force for six months after the war for another period of two years and a half. Under this Act XI of 1916 the Governor General in Council may by notification in the Gazette of India prohibit or restrict in any way he may specify in such notification the import or export of all or any goods or any class of goods from or to any country or place or from or to any person or class of persons. This gives very wide powers and affects the commercial community very closely. I know perfectly well that your Excellency's Government can pass an Ordinance, can also come here with its official majority and carry any measure it likes at any time it pleases. But, my Lord, I pray that sufficient time may be given to the public at large, to the agricultural community which would be affected by this Bill, as well as the Commercial community, to consider what the provisions mean and how they would be affected by them. The Bill was introduced, as I said, only last week; it was directed to be published in English. Well it is too late for me to quarrel on that point. But where was the time for the people to consider and understand the true significance of this Bill? I submit that absolutely no opportunity has been given to the public to understand what the significance of this Bill is. Now, under this Bill the Governor General in Council . . . . .

11-33 A.M. The Hon'ble Sir George Barnes :—"May I say one word, my Lord. I understand that the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma's objection is that sufficient time has not been given, and I admit that the time has been very short. The present Act will be in force till the Delhi Session for it remains in force for six months after the end of the war and the official end of the war has not yet arrived. I am willing, therefore, to fall in with the Hon'ble Member's suggestion that the Bill should be postponed till the Delhi Session, if the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma really thinks that any purpose will be served by the postponement."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"I thank the Hon'ble Sir George Barnes for having consented kindly to postpone the consideration of this Bill till the Delhi Session. I have studied the Bill myself and have formed certain opinions on it; but it is for others than myself that I am speaking, and on their behalf I thank the Hon'ble the Commerce Member for his kindly consenting to postpone this Bill."

The motion was by leave withdrawn.

THE INDIAN PAPER CURRENCY (FURTHER AMENDMENT) BILL.

11-35 A.M. The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard :—"My Lord, I beg to move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Indian Paper Currency (Amendment Act, 1917, and to amend the Indian Paper Currency Act, 1918. The effect of this Bill will be clear to Hon'ble Members from the Statement of Objects and Reasons. Briefly, it proposes to give Government powers firstly to increase their issue of currency notes against securities by 20 crores, raising the maximum from 100 to 120 crores, and, secondly, to hold as part of their paper currency reserve gold acquired by the Secretary of State on their behalf if held in the United States or in transit therefrom to India.

"I wish to say at the outset that it is with great reluctance that the Government have found themselves forced to bring this measure before the Council. I think, however, that I can very shortly convince the Council that they have no other alternative. Briefly, the position is this. During the war we were obliged to meet a very large amount of expenditure by issuing short term debt. That amount of debt has since remained outstanding and has increased. Though I do not pretend that our position is as difficult or critical as it was many times during the war, it has for the past few months been extremely difficult, and in the last week or two it has become absolutely acute, so much so, that the Controller of Currency, who is responsible for the provision of funds at places where they are wanted, is finding it impossible to carry on. I have just referred to our short term debt. The amount of our treasury bills outstanding has for some time past stood at a level of about 50 crores; it dropped a little while the loan was under flotation, but it is now rising again, and we have also been obliged, during the course of the last month or so, to take large ways and means advances from the Presidency Banks; these ways and means advances amount at the present time to Rs. 13 crores. Just to show what sort of difficulty we have to meet, I shall give an account of the position with which we were faced at the commencement of the present month. Our incomings in India were estimated to be no less than 20 crores less than our outgoings, those outgoings including payment of treasury bills amounting to no less than 13 crores. The obvious ways of bridging this gap may be said to be three in number, firstly, by issuing more treasury bills, secondly, by taking further ways and means advances from the Presidency Banks and, thirdly, by securing remittances of gold or silver from the Secretary of State. As regards treasury bills, we have recently increased the rates, and we hope that it may be possible during the current month to cover the September maturities. This, however, is merely postponing the evil day, for most of the fresh bills which we are at the present moment selling are three-month bills which will mature in December. We are thus merely throwing forward our liabilities to a date when matters will probably be still more difficult for us. When the busy trade season comes on and the trade demand for money becomes brisker, there will naturally be more difficulty in meeting these bills.

"Next, as to the advances from the Banks, we took Rs. 8 crores last month and Rs. 5 crores this month; and at present it seems improbable that the Presidency Banks will let us have any more. In fact here again as the busy season goes on, it is more likely that they will have to ask us for repayment of some of the advances already outstanding. The unhappy Finance Department, therefore, is in the position of a juggler who is compelled to spend his life trying to keep a large number of plates in the air at once, none of which he can afford to allow to fall to the ground.

"Turning now to remittances of treasure, the Secretary of State has fortunately been able to secure a substantial amount of gold for us. I need not say anything about silver as, I think, Hon'ble Members are fairly cognizant of the position as regards silver. The Secretary of State has, however, secured a substantial quantity of gold for us and this is, or will shortly be, on the way to India; and we hope we will be able to go on obtaining help in this way. It is for this reason that we are asking Council to allow us to take into account as part of our currency reserve this gold after purchase and while it is in transit. It is of course far less objectionable to issue notes against gold in this way than against securities. While it is in the reserve it forms the best backing that we can have for our notes, apart from our silver rupees, and, when we come to issue the gold or to sell it, it automatically redeems the notes.

"There is a possible fourth method of course of relieving our position, namely, to reduce the amount of Councils which the Secretary of State is now selling, but I am sure that no Hon'ble Member would in the present circumstances, difficult as the exchange position is, wish us to adopt this course. Later on, the position will, we hope (though our hopes are not always realised), become easier if the recent alterations which the Secretary of State has effected in the gold acquisition rate, and the relaxation which he has made in the control and restrictions exercised over exchange, do operate to stimulate the private import of gold. That will of course reduce the demand on us for meeting the Secretary of State's Council drawings.

"Looking a little further forward, October, November and December are all deficit months. In December, as I have just said, we shall have a very large number of treasury bills to meet. I think that we have already about 15 crores of maturities banked up in that month. Unless, therefore, the Secretary of State is able to help us to bring back our funds from London to India more rapidly than we can at present anticipate, the time will come when we shall obviously not be able to carry on; and we shall in that case therefore be driven to fall back on a further issue of notes issued against our funds held in London which will of course then be held in the Paper Currency Reserve in the form of securities. It is just conceivable indeed that we may be able to carry on by hook or crook for another few weeks or even for a month or two; but it seems inevitable that, before this Council meets at Delhi, we shall be obliged to have recourse to the expedient which is now before the Council. We felt that it would be extremely undesirable, with this obvious necessity impending over us, to defer taking these powers till the adjournment, when we should have necessarily to proceed by Ordinance; and we thought that it was essential that we should place our position frankly before the Council, and ask them to give us the necessary powers now. I should like at this stage to express my regret that we have been obliged as it were to spring the matter on the Council at such short notice and ask them to pass this Bill through at a single sitting; but this necessity has arisen from our very reluctance to have recourse to the step we now propose till the last possible moment, and it is for this reason that we have deferred our appeal to the Council until we were absolutely forced to make it.

"I should like, however, to assure the Council that we have no intention of using these powers prematurely. We shall only use them as we require them bit by bit, for we are as much convinced as any Hon'ble Member here present of the undesirability of increasing unduly our fiduciary issues. I can say at once that we have no intention of indulging in an indefinite issue of currency notes which would endanger the stability of our issues and lead to the risk of suspension of their encashment. During all the anxieties of the war we steadily avoided that calamity, for so it would then have been, and managed to carry on, although, as I think, everybody knows, it was a case more than once of 'touch and go.' Now we can reasonably feel confident that the spectre of inconvertibility has been safely laid. We are in a far stronger position now than at any time during the latter part of the war. I will give some comparative figures, for instance, of the amount of our reserves. At the beginning of July last year, that is, when the reserves had been greatly depleted at an anxious time, our total circulation was 115 crores; against that we held a metallic backing of 36 crores only, that representing a percentage of 31. By the middle of September last, that is to say, practically about a year ago, our circulation was 134 crores and the metallic reserve 48 crores, the percentage having risen to 36. Our total circulation is now 169 crores; against that we hold a metallic reserve of 70 crores, the percentage having risen to 41. In other words, during 15 months our metallic reserves have risen two-fold, from 36 to 70 crores. Apart from that, we are at present in a much stronger position as regards encashment in several ways. The unrest and unsettlement of the past years has passed away, the difficulties in respect of our notes have disappeared, and people have got accustomed to them. We also hope that the Secretary of State will now be sending out more gold to help us to build up our reserves, any gold that we are selling being more than set off by this, while our sales of gold should tend to reduce the demand on us for rupees. Last, but not least, of our total reserve at present of 70 crores no less than 32 crores are held in coined rupees, and we have 18½ crores of uncoined bullion, a total of 50 crores of silver, which is far more than our total metallic reserve was a year ago.

"There is, however, another aspect of these possible additions to our currency about which the Council will probably expect me to say something, since this point was raised by Mr. Mant in a debate the other day, namely, their effect on prices. Mr. Sarma, I think, hit the right nail on the head when he expressed the opinion that the real difficulty of our situation in this respect was not merely inflation of currency within India, but consisted in the great inflation of currencies and the serious rise in prices all over the world. With this view I fully agree. To put the matter in the widest way the effect of additions to the currency of an individual country with a world-wide trade is necessarily distributed or dissipated over price levels of the world as a whole. Our additions to the currency have been on a far smaller scale than the additions that have been made elsewhere. This is a very abstruse and technical matter, and I can only touch on the fringe of the technicalities of such a question. Perhaps I can best illustrate India's position by a simile. It is that of a lagoon connected by a channel with the sea. When the tide rises outside the water must flow through the channel into the lagoon, naturally causing its level to rise till it reaches the sea level. This is what would have happened in India in normal conditions. With the balance of trade setting strongly in her favour money must have flowed in in one form or another, whether through the Secretary of State's Council Bills or by the import of gold to be tendered at our currency offices in exchange for internal currency, with the result that internal prices would naturally rise. But in practice there have been restrictions on trade, and control has been exercised in various ways, with the result that the channel into our lagoon has been choked, and the water level inside has not risen as rapidly as the tide outside. We have had at the same time our local deluges, with the result that the water in the lagoon has also been added to by streams flowing down from the land—possibly set off by evaporation, where the circulation has disappeared through the hoarding of rupees. Consequently the level of our lagoon is still below that of the level outside. In other words, our price levels have not risen to the same extent as they have elsewhere.

"There is another very important factor in the price question to which I should like to refer. It is one on which Mr. Mant very rightly laid great stress the other day, it is the effect of higher exchange on prices. Much as we deplore the lack of stability in exchange and its consequences to trade, the increase has had one great counterbalancing advantage. A higher exchange is the best and most important mitigant of higher prices. I thought of pursuing my simile rather further and saying that we have in effect now constructed a lock between the lagoon and the sea, which will now prevent it from continuing to rise with the tide outside. But that would not explain exactly what has occurred, so I had better mix my metaphors and explain that the higher exchange has had the effect of causing a real change of gear between rupee prices and prices in sterling in countries outside.

"I expect some Hon'ble Members to say 'that is all very well, but what is to be the end of it?' I can only answer that there is no immediate and sovereign remedy, but, I think, we may hope that as the air clears and as matters become more normal and there are signs of this, we shall gradually be able to bring back to India our reserves in London and at the same time to fund our temporary debt in India. At the same time, it is essential from the facts of our position, as I have stated there, that we should use every possible measure to conserve our financial resources. I cannot do better than quote Sir James Meston on this subject :—'Coupled with courageous outlay on essentials of progress, a strict economy in all non-essentials will in the near future be more necessary than it has ever been'.

"My Lord, I do not wish to conclude these remarks on a note of pessimism. Difficult as matters undoubtedly are in many ways, we have at any rate the comfort, it may be cold comfort, that we are suffering much less from the financial aftermath of the war than almost any other country. The very difficulties to which our embarrassments have largely been due, namely, those connected with the exchanges, are in a way evidence paradoxically enough of the fundamental soundness of our position. It is more than 50 years since 10 rupees could buy £1 sterling, and generally the pronounced strength of our foreign exchanges itself shows that the purchasing power of the rupee has undergone far less depreciation than is the case with currencies elsewhere, and this fact is a sure index of India's solvency and indeed of her high credit."

"There is just one word of explanation which I would like to offer before I close. This legislation is temporary legislation, because it amends Acts which are in themselves temporary Acts and lapse six months after the termination of the war. We shall of course have later on to reconsider the whole question of our currency reserves and their constitution after we have received and considered the Report of the Committee on Exchange and Currency."

11-53 A.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, we have listened to a very clear and lucid exposition of the whole position, and we must convey the obligations of the commercial community to the Government for making the situation clear. I am not a pessimist. We have struggled through the war, and I am sure we shall struggle hereafter also successfully. But, my Lord, I feel that we shall not be doing our duty to the Government of India or to His Majesty's Government if we do not clearly say that our interests must be considered to be of paramount importance, and that this tinkering cannot go on very much longer, as it would involve a poor country like India in manifold difficulties. My Lord, at the Delhi Session we were looking very hopefully to the statement of the Hon'ble the Finance Member for stability in our currency. The Hon'ble Sir James Meston hoped that it might be possible even to reduce the note-issue. In paragraph 75 of his speech the Hon'ble Sir James Meston said :—'The second task before us is some contraction of the Paper Currency. Four years ago, the effective circulation of Notes was under 60 crores : to-day it is close on 150 crores'. Then he went on describing the various evils. 'Some of us would probably like to go further, and reduce the Outstanding Note circulation until we hear no more of forced discounts in the country-side and their hardships on the people ; but it is not easy to see how this adjustment can be effected until silver comes out of hoards and resumes its duty as a circulating medium.'

"From this speech we had at any rate some hope that the Note issue will not be added to, but we have been grievously disappointed. From 150 crores the Note issue has gone up to 169 crores in the space of about five or six months. Well, I do not say that the Government enter into this Note issuing process with an easy heart. But, my Lord, what is the real position ? We find large funds belonging to us locked up in London. We find that our exports are much in excess of our imports, and consequently large sums of money are due to us from the outside world. In the ordinary course of things it is met by our imports of bullion, and we can only get the value in the form of gold or silver, because we take it that all merchandise are included under the head of 'Imports.' Now gold and silver we cannot get in the normal course of trade, because the interests of other countries will not permit of this normal channel to be used for the purpose of equalising the trade balance between India and other countries of the world. Well, then, Council Bills have to be paid. That means to say the export merchants, the agriculturists who export their produce, have to be paid either in silver coin or in Notes. Silver is also very highly priced. The net result is we multiply our currency both by way of increasing the metallic currency if possible as well as the Note Issue. We are thankful to the Government of India for so far trying to back up every Note issued by metal. That is sound and safe, but there is no going away from the fact that for every rupee we are coining, we are also issuing from the press one-rupee Notes, that is, we are increasing the Note circulation by two-fold. My Lord, there is one danger, namely, if we cannot go on multiplying silver, which is itself a danger, we go on multiplying the Notes, i.e., we have to issue Note Currency in the absence of silver. That is a great danger ahead. I am afraid that even during the flotation of the recent loans printing presses were placed at the disposal of the Presidency Banks for getting the notes and the loans back from this, and I am very glad to see that the Hon'ble Mr. Howard recognises that it is very dangerous to go on like that. But what is the sequel ? We are now asked to give our consent to the issue of 20 crores of rupee notes against British Treasury Bills. That means to say, not a penny worth of gold or silver need come into India to reduce the trade balance, I mean the Bills which would issue, they are in themselves good, but here we have to manufacture notes to the value of 20 crores of rupees and give them to the public to meet the demands of exports or imports. That is an extremely unsatisfactory state of things, and, I think, we shall have to tell His Majesty's Government and the Secretary of State representing our interests that they should not be allowed to go on one minute longer like this. The normal channels must be opened to the Indian public just as they are to other countries. The normal imports of gold must be the only channel.

" My Lord, the Hon'ble Mr. Howard said that it is recognised every where that to a certain extent prices of foodstuffs would rise if the currency be increased. That is acknowledged every where. Of course, its exact ratio cannot be told, but it has that effect if things are allowed to go on as at present. In a poor country like India, her commercial interests and the interests of the poor people demand that we should not add to our Note Issue or currency any longer. I therefore implore the Government to do its level best to impress upon His Majesty's Government to safeguard the interests of Indian trade and Indian agriculture which are supreme in this matter, that the normal channels should be allowed to be utilised for the purposes of reducing the Note Issue, and that we cannot afford to lock up more money in England for the purpose of multiplying our notes here and pay the people with these Notes

" With regard to the second aspect of the question, of course the thing is not so bad. Of course, we have gold to back our Note Issue, but, I think, my remarks with regard to the increase of currency will apply to this question also. I therefore hope that it would not be considered by His Majesty's Government that the Indian public do not feel keenly this apparent neglect of our interests. I sympathise with their difficulties, but at the same time we as a poor people cannot afford to ignore our interests any longer and now that the war is over, I hope there will be no addition to this Note Issue, and that the Hon'ble Mr. Howard will find it possible not to issue Notes to the value of 20 crores of rupees as he proposes."

The Hon'ble Mr. W. E. Crum :—" My Lord, I should like first to congratulate the Hon'ble Mr. Howard on the extremely lucid exposition he 12 P.M.

has given us of the currency position and the necessity for the present amendment, and there is no question about it that the Council must support this amendment whole-heartedly. At the same time, the position is such that I do not think it should be allowed to pass entirely without comment. Mr. Howard has told us that since July 1918 the note circulation has risen from 115 to 169 crores, and of course since pre-war days I fancy it has nearly trebled. There is a very satisfactory feature, however, of this rise since July 1918, and that is that, whereas the note circulation has risen by 54 crores, out of that 44 crores has been backed by precious metal, and the increase in security backing is only 10 crores.

"Now, my Lord, there is one point about this redundancy of currency which I do not think has been brought out, and that is that, as prices rise, so currency also must increase, and when it is said that the increase of currency in India affects the prices and thereby increases prices, it must also be borne in mind that the increase of prices outside India demand in India a great increase of currency. And therefore I do not think that we can entirely blame the Government of India for the increase of currency, because to a certain extent that is necessary.

"Then, my Lord, we have got the point that whereas before the war the treasury and other balances held in the United Kingdom were only £30 millions, they have now gone up to something over £100 millions; and by issuing Councils, as the Hon'ble Member has pointed out, which are absolutely necessary for the trade of the country, we only increase that balance on the wrong side. Well it is very necessary, and I agree with Mr. Sarma in that, that this balance should be righted as soon as possible, and I do think there is a feeling that the Secretary of State has not quite used the opportunities that he might have, both in buying silver at certain times and in buying gold. I think when the Hon'ble Mr. Howard was in Calcutta the other day the opinion was expressed in certain quarters that the Secretary of State perhaps might have looked forward to the busy season of August, September, October, when money is always wanted for export here, and that a considerable time ago he might have foreseen the possible rise in silver and bought silver. At the same time, though I understand that he is now doing everything he can to buy gold and get gold from any quarter from which it is available, I think there is a feeling that he has to some extent missed his market with regard to gold. And I would on behalf of the commercial community, very strongly urge on the Government of India that they should do everything in their power to persuade the Secretary of State to increase his purchases of gold, and as soon as possible to transfer that balance which is in England over to this side."

12-5 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard:—"My Lord, I would like to make one or two remarks with reference to what has fallen from Mr. Sarma and Mr. Crum. The first point which I wish to mention is, the very technical one which Mr. Crum has raised, and incidentally Mr. Sarma has also raised, as to the relation between cause and effect of currency and prices. This question is always, from the nature of it, extremely difficult to answer. It is as troublesome as the old puzzle whether the first hen came out of an egg, or the process was initiated by the first hen laying an egg. But I rather intended to imply by my lagoon simile very much what Mr. Crum said, namely, that, though our successive additions to currency no doubt do cause prices to rise or facilitate their rising, they are to some extent necessitated by the rise which has taken place in prices. Let us just place before ourselves for a moment what would happen if we refrained from making such additions. It is possible that the effect of this might be temporarily to keep down prices. But what would the result of that be? The first person it would hit would be the agriculturist whom Mr. Sarma said he was anxious to help. Transactions in his produce would become impossible. Again, business and industries would be hampered and unemployment and discontent would follow. I do not think I need go beyond India for an example of this. I do not know whether Mr. Crum can remember as far back as 1900 or 1901. I am not certain of the exact year. That was a time about seven or eight years after the closing of the mints when large amounts of gold were being imported into India. The Government of India had thought at that time that they were not going to have to coin rupees at any rate for a considerable time. As a result of this, this gold was tendered, on arrival in India, to the Government of India at their currency offices and mints and the hungry exporter wanted rupees in return. There were no rupees, and the condition of business at that time I believe, until Government could buy silver and put more rupees into circulation, was very grave indeed. The fact is that in all these cases currency is really the flux which makes capital fluid. Unless there is enough currency, business becomes difficult and impracticable. I saw curiously enough only a day or two ago in the papers another very striking instance of this kind—where an increase in currency followed a rise in prices—in the case of Siam. There was a great external demand for Siam's rice, but prices of rice in Siam had risen very considerably. The cultivators wanted to sell, but they would only sell at a certain price; and as a result, in order to get out the rice at that price, it was necessary to double the note issue in a very short period of about three months. I have forgotten what the figures were; they were expressed in tikals, I think, a currency with which I am not very familiar.

"I should like to add a few words about what Mr. Crum said about the possibility of our bringing back our funds from London. In this matter we are rather between the devil and the deep sea. We are asked on one hand to help trade by selling Councils—we have had several piteous appeals to sell more Councils,—and, on the other hand, we are asked to move our funds back to India. The effect of selling Councils is to take our funds home. But the Secretary of State is fully conscious of the necessity of doing what he can do to help us by acquisition of the precious metals. But even without the Secretary of State in the market the price of silver has, during the last two or three months, gone up from the low fifties and even during the last day or two has crept up to 62 pence an ounce. What would have happened if the Secretary of State had been buying large quantities of silver? I can only answer Mr. Crum by asking a question myself. As regards gold, the Secretary of State is fully alive to the importance of securing gold. It is possible he might have secured certain consignments to which Mr. Crum referred, about £5 millions which are popularly believed to have gone to Japan and South America; but after all gold was practically unprocurable till about three months ago. The United States had a prohibition on its export. The Bank of England had contracts with mines within the Empire, and they would not let gold go. The Secretary of State could not get hold of it if he had wanted to. Now he has been able to make a start—I believe he has got about five millions so far—and, I hope, he will be able shortly to get considerably more."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard:—"My Lord, I introduce the Bill and I also move your Excellency to suspend the Rules of Business to admit of the Bill being taken into consideration."

The President:—"I suspend the Rules of Business."

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard:—"My Lord, I move that the Bill be taken into consideration."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Mr. H. F. Howard:—"My Lord, I move that the Bill be passed."

The motion was put and agreed to.

THE INDEMNITY BILL—(contd.)

12-13 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I move that the Bill to indemnify officers of Government and other persons in respect of certain acts done under martial law, and to provide for other matters in connection therewith, be taken into consideration.

"The main principles of this Bill have been fully debated only a few days ago, and it would be idle for me now to waste the time of the Council by covering the same ground again. Such details as have been criticised by Hon'ble Members are the subject of amendments which are before the Council, and I need not address Council in regard to them at present."

12-14 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord I beg to propose that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. This is a very important Bill, my Lord, it involves very important questions of law, and, I submit, it is not a measure which should be hurried through the Council without its provisions being examined in a Select Committee. I suggest, my Lord, that the Select Committee should consist of the Hon'ble the Law Member, the Hon'ble the Home Member, the Hon'ble Sir Edward Maclagan, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma, the Hon'ble the Maharaja of Kasimbazar, the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha, the Hon'ble Sardar Sundar Singh Majithia, the Hon'ble Mr. Crum and myself. There will be no harm, my Lord, if the Bill is delayed a little while; its provisions are so important that they ought to be examined in Select Committee. I therefore move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Hon'ble Members whose names I have mentioned . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"Do I understand that the Hon'ble Member is moving an amendment to the motion?"

The President:—"Is the Hon'ble Member moving an amendment to the motion which is on the paper?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord I have put forward what I had to say, I do not wish to add to or subtract from it."

The President:—"What I want the Hon'ble Member to give me a clear answer to is this. Is the Hon'ble Member putting forward an amendment to the motion which is on the paper?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, I do not know whether I should call it a technical amendment. I am endeavouring on the motion before us to put forward the proposal that I have put forward, for the consideration of this Council. If a technical amendment is needed, my Lord, I will say that it is a technical amendment, but, I submit, that it is not necessary that there should be an amendment. On a motion made by the Hon'ble the Home Member, I am entitled to put forward the view I have done for the consideration of the Council."

The President:—"The Hon'ble Member is perfectly within his rights to oppose a motion which is before the Council, but if the Hon'ble Member wishes to move an amendment, he must move it now. I take it from the Hon'ble Member that he is opposing the motion and not moving an amendment."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, if an amendment is the only proposition which is before the Council on a question like this, I put it forward as an amendment."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"Then, my Lord, I take objection to the motion, on the ground that I have had no notice of the amendment."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"I submit, my Lord, that the Rules do not require notice. I beg your Excellency to refer to the Rules."

The President :—"Will the Hon'ble Member refer me to the rule under which there is no necessity to give notice in the case of an amendment such as he proposes ?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"I think, your Excellency, that the Member who objects should show under what rule it is necessary. If the Hon'ble the Secretary of the Council will send me a copy of the Rules, I will refer your Excellency to it."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—"May I suggest that the practice here is, when we have got a motion before the Council, your Lordship as President has only that one motion to put to the Council. It is only if an amendment is moved to it, that your Excellency can put another motion to the Council. At present there is only the one motion before the Council."

The President :—"It is true that, under rule 28, when a Bill is taken into consideration by the Council, any Member may propose an amendment of such a Bill of which three days' notice should be given. What the Hon'ble Member suggests is not an amendment of the Bill, and, I think, he is in order and the Hon'ble Member can move the amendment as he proposes. Do I understand the Hon'ble Member has moved the amendment ?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, I beg to move the amendment which I have placed before the Council."

The motion was put and negatived.

Then the motion that the Bill be taken into consideration was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, I move as an amendment— 12-22 P.M.

'That in the preamble of the Bill for the words 'it has been necessary for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order to resort to martial law' the words 'martial law has been enforced' be substituted.'

"During the debate on this Bill it was apparent from the speeches of many Hon'ble Members that the recital in the preamble was interpreted by them as a quasi-admission that this Legislative Council accepted the view that the declaration of martial law was necessary; among other Members, my Hon'ble friend, Mr. Sinha, drew particular attention to this point. I then said that we would consider the question of amending the preamble, and the present amendment is proposed to give effect to that intention and to make it abundantly clear that there is nothing in the Bill which can in any way be interpreted as meaning that this Council has ratified or admitted the necessity for the enforcement of martial law.

"The amendment as proposed merely makes a statement of absolute fact, which no one can controvert, that martial law was enforced."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I think, my Lord, the 2nd* and 3rd* amendments on the list would fall to the ground having regard to the acceptance of the first."

The President:—"That is so. No. 4† goes as well."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"My Lord, the amendment I propose is . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, may I suggest that, with your Lordship's permission the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha should take up this amendment, which is really a consequential one, along with a subsequent amendment of his."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"I shall do so with your Lordship's leave. I propose that—

> 'In the second clause of the preamble the word 'certain' be inserted between the words 'indemnify' and 'officers' and I also propose . . . . . .

The President:—"I think if the Hon'ble Member would postpone this until he comes to the clause, it will be more convenient to take it on the clause."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"I shall do so, my Lord. I now propose that in the same clause 2 of the preamble the words 'purporting to have been ordered or done' be omitted. The reasons for the proposal are these. Acts which are either done or ordered to be done for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order are acts which we can all understand. But it is difficult to understand acts to which the words in the preamble refer, namely, acts 'purporting to have been ordered or done'. As this might cause some confusion without any substantial object being gained, so far as I know, I propose that these words be omitted."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, the Government are not prepared to accept this amendment. The words are perfectly innocent in themselves, and they appear in most of the indemnity clauses, which so often find a place in our Acts. The object is to avoid any dispute as to whether an act was actually done for a particular purpose or only intended so to be done though it may not have effected that purpose. Assuming that there is any question as to whether any act was done in good faith and in the belief (we shall come to that point later) that it was necessary for a particular purpose,

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—

* 2. That for the first paragraph of the preamble the following be substituted, namely:—

'Whereas for the purpose of suppressing the recent disorders in certain districts of the Punjab and in other parts of India, and restoring order therein martial law has been resorted to'.

3. 'That the words 'maintaining or' in paragraph 1 of the preamble be omitted.'

† The Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya:—

4. 'That in the first clause of the preamble, the words 'maintaining or' be omitted.'

its justification ought not to depend upon whether as a matter of fact the purpose was attained ; if it was intended to attain that purpose, the act ought to be covered by the Indemnity. When we come to the question of good faith, Hon'ble Members have got many amendments on the paper, and they may possibly succeed in striking out the words in that clause ; if so then it might be reasonable to omit these words ; but we could not omit them at the present stage. I am quite willing, my Lord, to defer a vote on this amendment until we have done with the 'good faith' amendments, if my Hon'ble friend thinks there is any chance of their being carried ; but I do not think there is any great chance of that."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"As to the question of any chance of our amendments being carried, I have not the slightest hope at all ; I would not defer consideration on that account."

The motion was put and negatived.

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, I beg to move 'that in the second clause of the preamble, the words 'maintaining or' be omitted. My Lord, it is an abnormal position to my mind for which no support is found in the ancient Statutes of Parliament, though it may be found in some of the more recent enactments in some of the Colonies, that you should resort to martial law for maintaining order. Maintenance of order should be secured by the ordinary police assisted, when it may be necessary, by the military troops. I therefore submit that these two words 'maintaining or' should be omitted from the second clause of the preamble."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, I submit that it is essential that these words 'maintaining or' should be retained. It will be obvious to Members of this Council that once martial law is declared, or enforced, officers of the Government have not only to suppress active disorder, but they have to maintain order as well. For instance, my Lord, supposing there was a disorderly mob about to collect for some improper purpose, it would in such circumstances obviously be necessary for the military commander to issue orders prohibiting the assembly, and, if necessary, prevent such assembly by force. Otherwise indeed his position would be an impossible one ; he would have to wait until mischief was begun and then begin to suppress it. It will be clear to the Council therefore, I hope, that the retention of these words is absolutely necessary." 12-30 P.M.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, I think that the Hon'ble the Home Member might reconsider this question. His objection to Mr. Malaviya's amendment is, that during the suppression of a disorder, order has to be maintained ; it can only be maintained under martial law, and consequently the words 'maintaining or' would be thoroughly appropriate, because there would otherwise be no one to maintain order during that period.

"What is mentioned here is 'or for the purposes, the general purposes of maintaining or restoring order.' That raises a large question, namely, whether in future where disorders are to be suppressed martial law can continue for the general purpose of maintaining order, if the officers charged with the duty of suppressing disorders should be indemnified under this Act in respect of acts done after the disorders had been suppressed. My submission is that this would lead to the acceptance by the Legislature of the principle that martial law can be resorted to by the Government for the purpose of maintaining order although they had suppressed disorders, and that any person who uses extreme measures thereafter for maintaining order should be protected. The ordinary law is that the civil arm must meet all contingencies and maintain order once violent armed rebellion is suppressed. My submission is that we in this legislative assembly should not accept any other principle. I do not want to raise this question merely for an argumentative purpose. I submit that this Act will be quoted as a precedent. It may be open to a future Government, whenever a riot cannot be quelled, to have recourse to martial law. The police and the magistracy have the right to invite the co-operation of he military for the purpose of quelling a riot and all necessary force can be used, but the civil power and the military assisting it have to take cognisance of the fact that if unnecessary force be used the officers would be liable to punishment. I do not think there have been any cases where the officers in such circumstances have been protected by an Indemnity Act. I will quote a passage from Dicey showing that protection lasts only as long as the necessity lasts for suppressing disorder, but no longer. This is what Dicey says :—

> 'Martial law in the sense in which the expression is here used, means the power, right or duty of the Crown and its servants, or, in other words, the Government, to maintain public order, or in technical language the King's peace at whatever cost of blood or property may be in strictness necessary for that purpose. Hence martial law comes into existence in times of invasion or insurrection where and in so far as the King's peace cannot be maintained by ordinary means, and owes its existence to urgent and paramount necessity. The point to be borne in mind is, that the power to exercise martial law which is not ill described by an expression known to the American Courts, namely, that of 'War power' as it originates in so it is limited by the necessity of the case. The only principle on which the law of England tolerates what is called martial law is necessity, its introduction can only be justified by necessity, its continuance requires precisely the same justification of necessity and if it survives the necessity on which alone it rests for a single minute it becomes instantly a mere exercise of lawless violence.'

There are a number of other passages :—

> 'Such legal right or duty always lasts so long and so long only as the circumstances exist which necessitate the use of force.'

"My submission is that the Government would be right in asking for the protection of their officers during the suppression of the rebellion and for the purpose of maintaining order during that period, but they cannot ask and they should not ask this Council for the acceptance of this novel principle that whenever order cannot be maintained by the police and the military force is used, its officers should be indemnified. I therefore submit that the words 'maintaining or' should be omitted in the second preamble."

12-38 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—" My Lord, as I pointed out the other day, martial law steps in when the ordinary civil courts are unable, I use the words deliberately, to maintain order or to suppress disorder. The Hon'ble Pandit and the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma have suggested that the insertion of the word 'maintaining' created a new doctrine without a precedent. It is, if I may say so, nothing of the sort. It is inconceivable to me that Mr. Sarma should say this after reading the passage he did from Dicey. Let me read it again :—

> 'Hence martial law comes into existence in times of invasion or insurrection when, where, and in so far as the King's peace cannot be maintained by the ordinary means.'

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" What page ? "

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—" My Lord, I decline to be interrupted by the Hon'ble Pandit. When the ordinary courts cannot maintain order or suppress disorder, you must have martial law. The maintenance of order is one of the definite objects with which martial law is put into force. The Hon'ble Pandit also said that there was no precedent for this, and yet during the past few days I have lent him and every Member of this Council who has asked for them, the South Africa Acts which are the latest examples of martial law and Indemnifying Acts. In each one of them you find that martial law was used for maintaining order. I will not trouble the Council with many extracts, I will read the first that comes to hand. Section 1 of the Act of 1900 says—my Hon'ble friend will find the same in them all—

> 'All acts, matters and things whatsoever in good faith advised, commanded, ordered directed or done, as necessary for the suppression of hostilities or the establishment and maintenance of good order and government'

It is the same in most of the older Acts. We are introducing nothing new, nothing without precedent."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, the Hon'ble the Law Member quotes a sentence from Dicey in which he says that where order cannot be maintained by the civil courts martial law steps in. That is very different from saying that that sentence gives support to the proposition he advances. Our point is that you do not find this authority in the Acts of Parliament. You had some authority in the three Acts of Parliament but, my Lord, these three Acts of South Africa ought not to be a model as against the Acts of Parliament. I should like the Hon'ble the Law Member to quote any Act of Parliament in which for the purposes of maintaining order martial law has been justified. Then, my Lord, I gave a certain authority which the Hon'ble the Law Member will not disregard . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, may I interrupt?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, I object.'

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"Very well. The Hon'ble Member does not want it. It is there."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"The Hon'ble the Law Member was afraid to let me have the page of his quotation, which is the smallest courtesy that any Member of this Council is entitled to. We are coming to bad ways."

The President:—"I quite agree. Will the Hon'ble Member proceed."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"Thank you, my Lord.

"Now, the Earl of Halsbury in Vol. VI of the Laws of England says:—'The Crown may not issue commissions in time of peace to try civilians by martial law: but when a state of actual war, or of insurrection, riot, or rebellion amounting to war exists, the Crown and its officers may use the amount of force necessary in the circumstances to restore order, and this use of force is sometimes termed martial law. When once this state of actual war exists, the Civil Courts have no authority to call in question the actions of the military authorities; but the powers of the military authorities cease and those of the Civil Courts are resumed ipso facto with the termination of the disorder.'

"I submit, my Lord, that this is an authority which the Hon'ble the Law Member cannot disregard or make light of, and it is entirely in support of the proposition which I have put before the Council, namely, that the words 'maintaining or' should be omitted from the second clause of the preamble."

The motion was put and negatived.

12-45 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"My Lord, I beg to move that in paragraph 2 of the preamble the words 'in a reasonable belief that they were necessary' be omitted.

"My Lord, as far as I can see, the words used in all the enactments dealing with Acts to indemnify officers are 'done in good faith as necessary for the said purpose.' I have not been able to come across these additional words 'in a reasonable belief that they were necessary.' On that ground alone I might ask the Council to follow the precedents set to us by the Legislature of various countries and drop the words 'in a reasonable belief that they were necessary', because they would lead to an inquiry of a somewhat elaborate character on which no safe conclusions can be come to. But I have a greater objection, and it is this. As the Bill stands, the person who comes into the Court to seek redress will have to show two things, first of all, the act of which he complains was not done in good faith, and, secondly, that it was not done in a reasonable belief that the act was necessary for the purpose. I would first like to ask the Hon'ble the Law Member to explain clearly for what purpose these additional words have been used, and how they would not be covered by the same words 'good faith,' and if some additional meaning is sought to be imported, what that additional meaning is. But as they stand, my difficulty is, the person aggrieved will have to prove two things instead of one thing which generally he is asked to do by almost every Legislature. Then with regard to the words 'reasonable belief.' Supposing a person has to show that an officer did not believe that an act was necessary, I think it is almost impossible for him to prove it. But you may say that the words 'reasonable belief and in good faith' are there. There, my Lord, comes in the difficulty. Supposing in a particular community there is a belief entertained that particular measures, however wrong they may be from the moral standpoint, are necessary for achieving a certain end. Now, taking the moral atmosphere of Germany, for instance, it was considered by all alike, professors, philosophers of law, philosophers of morality, by military men and in fact by all classes, that certain measures which were condemned by the rest of humanity as non-civilized methods could be employed. Well, if you are to judge a German officer labouring under that impresston, could not these words 'reasonable belief' protect him, because he believed that they were necessary, the atmosphere in which he moved led him to believe that they were necessary also. Therefore, if you are to judge him by that standard, certainly he ought to be protected. Similarly, supposing the atmosphere in the Punjab in those days was such that the several gentlemen who were responsible felt that there must be a deviation, a departure from standards which are generally considered to be humane and civilized. I need hardly allude to the Salaaming order and several other orders that were passed to which allusion has already been made, because it will only tend to embitter feelings and do no good. There are certain orders which cannot be justified by any standard of morality. Now supposing the officers, having regard to the mental atmosphere surrounding them believed that those acts were necessary and reasonable, my Lord, will they be protected? I submit an elaborate inquiry of that description might be opened, I will not say would be opened, but might be opened, if the various theories on which States like India are held and can be held in subjection are to be brought before the law Courts. Therefore there is no precedent for it, it might lead to various difficulties, and I therefore earnestly request that these words be omitted."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—" My Lord, I regret I am unable either to omit these words or to explain any more clearly to my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sarma than I did on the last occasion what the real intention and object of the words are. We had a clear admission of the propriety of this clause in his previous speech when he asked us to adopt the actual wording of the South Africa Acts which the Hon'ble Pandit so violently disputed.

" I explained last time that the words ' in a reasonable belief that the acts were necessary ' are only a translation from the wording of the South Africa Acts ; we could of course use the actual words of the South Africa Acts, that is, acts '.done as necessary.' I think this means ' done as being necessary,' that is, the acts were so done because the men who did them believed that they were necessary. We do not stop there. We say ' reasonably believed ' that they were necessary. We only propose to indemnify men who had a reasonable belief that their acts were necessary. I am sure the Council will accept this as at all events a fair translation of the words which my Hon'ble friend Mr. Sarma would have preferred to have in the Bill.

" Then he talked about the mental atmosphere being immaterial. He forgot, I am sure, the quotation which I read from the speech of perhaps one of the greatest Lord Chancellors in the House of Lords. I quoted it at some length and I do not propose to read it again,—it is here and my Hon'ble friend can see it if he wishes to. Lord Thurlow says that you must take into account the mental atmosphere, that you must consider the circumstances under which a man had to make up his mind as to what he should do in an extreme emergency, and if he made up his mind reasonably, you should not consider ex post facto whether the acts he did were necessary. The real test should be whether he had a reasonable belief at the time that they were necessary, and did them in good faith. If Hon'ble Members are going to insert amendments like this in an Act which is intended to protect officers who did their duty in good faith under very trying circumstances, I say an Indemnity Act from this Council is not worth having."

The motion was put and negatived.

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, 12-50 P.M. I beg to propose that—

> ' In the second paragraph of the preamble for the words ' and in a reasonable belief that they were necessary for the said purposes, ' the following be substituted :—
> ' necessarily and properly, in furtherance and execution of the objects for which martial law was proclaimed as aforesaid. '

" My Lord, I have taken this clause from an Act of the laws of St. Vincent, Act No. 189 of 1862. After indemnifying certain officers against acts done by them during the prevalence of martial law, the Act proceeds—' provided always an indemnity hereby granted is granted on this supposition and condition that all such acts, matters and things shall have been done or shall be done bona fide necessarily and properly in furtherance and execution of the objects for which martial law was proclaimed as aforesaid. '

" Now, my Lord, I think that this is a much more reasonable provision to adopt than the one that stands at present in the Bill. Here you say that a man should have acted bona fide, that is in good faith, and necessarily and properly. That would include a consideration of what humanity demands. That will include also that the thing should have been done, and a reasonable belief will be implied in the phraseology I have suggested. He must act reasonably in finding out that it was necessary and in a proper way.

I hope this amendment at least may find acceptance at the hands of Government."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"If I heard the Hon'ble Member aright he said he had taken these words from an Act of St. Vincent. That is no doubt out of compliment to the Hon'ble Member who is in charge of the Bill. I can see no other reason for his having done so. The Act of St. Vincent goes back to 1862, that is getting on to 60 years ago now, whereas we have tried to follow a more recent model. I have nothing really to add to what I said on the last amendment. The point is this, as I tried to explain, that we do not want in this Bill to make the test whether things were or were not in fact necessary. The fact that they were unnecessary, judged ex post facto, is not the test for indemnity in the case of acts done under these very difficult circumstances. What we have got to find is, whether they were reasonably believed to be necessary at the time, taking into account the conditions under which the men who did them had to act. We are not going to examine them on an ex post facto basis, or consider, looking back now when all is over, we think they were really necessary or not. That is not my idea of an Indemnity Act. I regret Government is not able to accept this amendment."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, we have had some novel arguments, but the most novel argument I have heard to-day is the argument of the Law Member that a thing is to be rejected because it is ancient. I fear much will have to be put aside in favour of modern ideas as to what should or should not be done. I take it that the fact that a thing is ancient is rather a recommendation. At any rate I am prepared that the matter should be considered on its merits. Let us consider which is better, the provision which is now being proposed by the Government, the paraphrase of the words 'done as necessary' of the Acts of South Africa, or the language of the enactment from which I have borrowed my phraseology, namely, that the indemnity shall be granted upon this supposition that all such acts matters or things shall be done bona fide, that is in good faith of course, 'necessarily and properly in furtherance and execution of the objects for which martial law was proclaimed as aforesaid.'

"If this phraseology is adopted, where it would be reasonable to extend indemnity it would be extended, but it would cut off a lot of other acts which may not have been done properly and which may not have been necessary. The Hon'ble the Law Member would not allow any discussion of the question whether certain acts were necessary or not by the phraseology which he has chosen to adopt. How is a man to know what the belief of a particular individual was when he was acting? If you put it on the ground that he should show whether the thing was necessary, that he should show that it was proper, then you are on solid ground, but you are in the regions of vagueness and uncertainty in putting in the phraseology that a thing should be done in a reasonable belief. I therefore hope that unless the Government can find some more substantial argument against my proposition than that it is somewhat ancient as compared to the provisions in the South Africa Acts, they will reconsider the position This will mean a great change in the outlook of those who may be concerned with such cases. If you retain the phraseology 'in good faith and in a reasonable belief,' you make it a very difficult thing, if not a practical impossibility for the plaintiff to establish a case for damage against a person who may have injured or repressed him. He may come into the box and swear that he reasonably believed that this was necessary and that would be an obstacle. The Act even saves him the necessity of swearing even to that, because the third section of the Act says that that will be presumed if a certificate has been obtained by a Secretary to Government. I therefore think we are carrying things too far if putting the provision in the present form, and if you accept my suggestion and substitute the words 'necessarily and properly in furtherance and execution of the objects for which martial law was proclaimed,' you would leave a fair chance to plaintiffs to have the justice to which they may be entitled. I therefore press this amendment on the consideration of the Government."

The motion was put and negatived.

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, may I again suggest that the Hon'ble Member should take up this amendment* with his amendment No. 32. I would suggest, with your Lordship's permission, that it would be more convenient to the Council. The present is a consequential amendment on the later one."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"I have no objection to that; even if No. 32 is rejected it comes to the same thing."

The President:—"No. 10 *will stand over."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"My Lord, I 1 P.M. move that—'

'In clause 2, for the words 'any officer of Government whether Civil or Military,' the words 'any police officer of or below the rank of Assistant or Deputy Superintendent of Police and any soldier or non-commissioned officer of His Majesty's Army acting under the orders of their superior officers' be substituted.'

"My Lord, the reason for this amendment is obvious. In the course of his opening speech the Hon'ble the Home Member insisted repeatedly that if this Indemnity Act was not passed, it would be putting in a very serious predicament a large number of soldiers and inferior officers who had taken part in carrying out the orders of their superior officers. I, therefore, propose to limit this class by giving a definition of the officers concerned, as to who the officers will be who will be indemnified by this Act, for all acts done by them. As regards the superior officers, they will be under the common law protected for all acts done in good faith. But if it can be established that certain acts were done by them, or ordered by them not in good faith, if they committed an atrocity or something that should not be done, the law will not protect them. For this reason I propose my amendment."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"I think when I explain to the Council what the effect of this amendment would be, every Member of this Council, every reasonable Member, including the Hon'ble mover, will be convinced that it really is an impossible amendment for acceptance. Reading the amendment, it will be seen that it would limit the protection afforded by the Bill to the case of police officers and soldiers. Now many other officers besides police officers have been engaged in the suppression of the disorders, officers both civil and military.

"I am, for instance, informed that tehsildars and other revenue officers have been so used. There was also an Indian Sub-divisional Officer at Kasur and there was an Indian Deputy Commissioner in one district besides European Deputy Commissioners in other districts whose services were similarly used, and there is really no reason why the protection which is given to police officers should be refused to officers of this class. Then, again, in the case even of police officers, why is an Assistant or a Deputy Superintendent of Police to be exonerated for acts done in good faith, while a Superintendent of Police is not to receive the same protection? Is that fair, is that reasonable? Is there any reason for instance why Mr. Heron, Superintendent of Police in one of the districts, whose name I have heard quoted —I do not happen to know him myself—if he has acted bona fide and in the reasonable belief that his action was necessary, should not receive the protection of this Act? Is there any reason why a subaltern or commissioned officer of the Army who has had to take part in quelling these disorders and who would be excluded by this amendment, should not receive the benefit of the Act? I am sure, if he thinks over the effect of his proposal, that the Hon'ble Member will withdraw his amendment."

* The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma:—10 'That to paragraph 3 of the preamble the following be added 'in certain cases and subject to the limitations specified herein below.'

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"I desire to say in reply that the reason why I framed the amendment in this way was that I considered that those officers who may be held to have initiated a certain policy should not receive the protection of the Indemnity Act unless of course, they can show that their acts were done in good faith. That was the only principle on which I framed my amendment. I have nothing further to say."

The motion was put and negatived.

The President:—"With the rejection of that amendment the amendment to be moved by the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha, No. 5* on the paper, with regard to the preamble, will, of course, drop."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"My Lord, I move—

> 'That in clause 2 for the words 'person acting under the orders of any such officer' the words 'person acting under the orders of any Magistrate, police officer not below the rank of Deputy or Assistant Superintendent of Police, and any commissioned officer of His Majesty's Army' be substituted—

The reason for this amendment is that otherwise the private individual, for whose benefit this clause is intended, might plead that he did a certain act under the orders of a chaukidar or a constable. That would be certainly carrying, I would not say the joke too far, but the point too far, and, therefore, I have brought in these words to give some substance to the proposition that the officer concerned must be one of a certain standing and not anybody or everybody. On this ground I move my amendment."

1-5 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"This is an amendment of much the same character as the last one: the acceptance of it would involve this consequence, that any person acting under the orders of, say, an Inspector of Police—and I believe an Inspector of Police was actually the senior officer present at one place, Tarn Taran, though I have not verified this point—any person acting under the orders of an Inspector of Police would not be protected, however properly he had acted; however bona fide his action might have been. Again, there were many places in which non-commissioned officers of the Army were placed in positions of great responsibility. Is the man who obeyed, bona fide, the orders of such an officer not to be protected, if he has acted properly? Was it his duty to ascertain the badges or rank of an officer giving the orders or to inquire of a Police officer 'What are you exactly? Are you an Inspector of Police or an Assistant Superintendent?' I do not think that this amendment will commend itself for one moment to this Council. And I again suggest to the Hon'ble Member that, instead of putting an amendment of this character to the vote, he should exercise a wise discretion and withdraw it."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha:—"There is nothing to withdraw, the result will be the same. It will be defeated."

The motion was put and negatived.

* That in second clause of the preamble the word 'certain' be inserted between the words 'indemnify' and 'officers'. Vide page ~~[illegible]~~ ante.

The Honble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"This* is practically the same as the last amendment which I moved (No. 12) and, as that was not accepted, it is no good pressing this."

The motion was by leave withdrawn.

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, I beg to withdraw my amendment †."

The motion was by leave withdrawn.

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"My Lord, I move 'that in clause 2 after the words 'British India' the words 'where martial law was established' be inserted.

"My Lord, I do hope that the Hon'ble the Home Member will see his way to accept this amendment, because it will bring the preamble into consonance with the section. The preamble very properly lays down:—

> 'Whereas owing to the recent disorders in certain districts in the Punjab and other parts of India, martial law has been enforced.'

In section 2 no such limitation is placed and the very general and wide words 'British India' are used. It might lead to some serious difficulty if this Act were applied in other places than the districts of the Punjab or certain other places specified in the preamble. Therefore, I think, the Government might see their way to accept my amendment that the words 'British India' should be limited by the words 'where martial law was established."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, I submit this is an unsound amendment. The use of words 'martial law was established' implies in some way that a proclamation of martial law or some formal action of that kind is necessary before martial law is enforced. That is however not the fact. A proclamation of martial law is only the means by which the fact of martial law being in force is made known to the public, I presume that the Hon'ble Member meant by the words 'martial law was established' that martial law had been proclaimed."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"I mean exactly what the Hon'ble Member meant by changing the preamble himself from the words 'it has been necessary for the purpose of maintaining order to resort to martial law' into the words 'martial law has been enforced.' If he will accept the same words in this clause, I shall be quite happy to withdraw the words of my amendment 'where martial law was established."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"Very well, my Lord. I am informed by my Hon'ble Colleague the Law Member that the use of the words 'where martial law was enforced' is not open to objection, and I am prepared to accept the amendment as modified."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"I am very grateful to the Hon'ble the Home Member."

The amended motion was put and agreed to.

* 13. 'That in clause 2 the words 'or purporting to have been ordered or done' be omitted.

† 'That in clause 2 the words 'maintaining or' be omitted.'

1-12 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, I beg to move 'that in clause 2 for the words 'the 30th of March 1919' the words 'the proclamation of martial law therein' be substituted.'

"Then the clause will run :—

> 'No suit or other legal proceeding whatsoever, whether civil or criminal, shall lie in any court of law against any officer of Government, whether civil or military, or against any other person acting under the orders of any such officer for or on account of or in respect of any act, matter or thing ordered or done or purporting to have been ordered or done for the purpose of maintaining or restoring order in any part of British India where martial law was enforced on or after the proclamation of martial law therein, etc.'

"This is an important amendment. From the opening words of the Hon'ble the Home Member when speaking to the previous amendment, I can see in a way what the object of putting this particular date, the 30th of March 1919, is. Now, my Lord, we are here on a very important question as to whether this Indemnity Bill is to cover acts done when the civil power was in authority, but merely asked the military to aid it in suppressing disorder as it is entitled to do under the Criminal Procedure Code, or whether it is to be restricted to acts done by officers after the proclamation of martial law.

"In the former event we come to this that it is open to the executive Government to enable its officers, civil and military, to do whatever may be done during the operation of martial law even prior to the proclamation of martial law, when civil courts are sitting and in full assumption of authority and indemnifying them thereafter. My Lord, I submit that is a very dangerous doctrine to lay down. It would be extremely mischievous if the civil authorities or the military authorities who assist them, during the time of peace when the civil authorities are in full direction of the maintenance of order, are to consider themselves as entitled to protection for their acts which are legally indefensible. It would lead to very grave consequences if officers, civil and military, were to be under that impression, or if any indulgence should be shown to the executive Government by protecting their officers in respect of acts which cannot be justified under the ordinary law of the land. I know there are certain passages which can be quoted in support of the position that martial law is after all a technical term for military law, which enforces order when there is grave necessity even though there may be no proclamation, and that proclamation might possibly be construed by constitutional writers as being intended for the protection of the public not to violate certain orders. But, my Lord, (we sitting here as a Legislature, and knowing full well that the people have no real voice in the Government, should not allow the executive of the land to take such wide powers or allow executive officers in the country to believe that they can seek protection even for absolutely unjustifiable acts on theoretical grounds.) I submit, therefore, that the definition of martial law put forward by constitutional writers tentatively should not be relied upon by the Government as justifying the insertion of the words '30th March 1919.' My Lord, this is a very important question, for the simple reason that martial law was confined chiefly to the province of the Punjab, though, I believe, it was in force in the Bombay presidency for a day or two and never in Delhi at all. It is admitted that before the 10th of April there was no collision between the military, the civil authorities and the people. Consequently, I cannot understand the reason for the insertion of the date 30th March. Martial law was proclaimed by His Excellency the Governor General in Council only on the 14th; it might have been intended to be proclaimed a little earlier, but the earliest date was the 14th April 1919, so far as I can see. It is just prior to that period that various acts of a highly unjustifiable character according to the people were committed. I need hardly allude to the Jallianwala Bagh incident, the belly crawling incident or the aeroplane incident. Those were acts for which the civil and military authorities would have to justify themselves before the ordinary courts in the land in the usual way. To raise a presumption in those cases would be, my Lord, a violent confiscation of the rights of the subject. It may be that those officers can justify themselves before the Committee of Inquiry or before a judicial tribunal; but for us, my Lord, to raise a presumption in their favour on our present information, as this Bill proposes to do, would be absolutely unjustifiable and a travesty of justice. I think, on the other hand, as to the persons who have issued these orders, who have exercised those acts in a transparently high-handed character absolutely—I do not want to prejudge matters one way or the other, but as things stand we have to go upon certain facts—I submit to enable those officers to reap the benefit of these provisions would be to ask the people to believe that the executive Government would do anything to protect its officers whatever may be their high-handedness, and however unjustifiable may be the acts. I hope and pray that the Government will have some regard for public sentiment and re-establish itself in the confidence of the people by showing clearly that it is immaterial how high the officer may be and that justice would be done. We were told that it was under the authority of the civil power that aeroplanes were used in Gujranwala, and that the incidents which occurred on the 13th April at Amritsar, were after the civil power acknowledged its inability to enforce order. Consequently, I think, it ought to be open to the judicial tribunals to go into the question as to whether by the constitutional law of the United Kingdom or India it is open to the civil power to employ aeroplanes under such circumstances or under any circumstances. My Lord, to take protection for all those acts which have been condemned in England even during the time of the war, would, I think, be going too far even in India. I hope, therefore, that the protection will be really given only in respect of acts done after martial law had been proclaimed and not a minute before. Let those officers, if any, be brought either by the Government or by the public before the judicial tribunals in the ordinary course. It is perfectly open to them to show that they acted in good faith and in a reasonable belief that they were only maintaining or restoring order and justice, that the civil power had asked them and that the civil power was justified in asking them to do so. That is a question of fact, as has been proved by constitutional writers, which has to be determined by the judicial courts, namely, the justification of any particular act done in a state of war is ultimately examinable in the ordinary courts. But in the absence of an Indemnity Act the law goes so far as to say that the justification of any act * * * * * is a question which can be brought up in a civil court. When the law is so stringent in the absence of an Indemnity Act, we ought to be very careful as to how far we interfere with the common law of the land and the statutory law of the land which lays down the policy for civil and military officers. There are the Criminal Procedure Code and the Indian Penal Code; there are various other penal laws which show clearly the limits within which officers should act during peace time, during the time the civil arm is supreme. No one will venture to say that the civil arm was not supreme before the proclamations. I therefore submit that the Council will see their way to accept my amendment which follows logically and as a natural consequence the acceptance of the principle that an Indemnity Bill follows the enforcement of martial law. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent has told us in the beginning of his introductory speech in substance as follows 'Martial law has been proclaimed, people have acted on the faith of that; we have proclaimed on the 14th April or some such date that support will be given to every civil and military officer in enforcing order; and acting on the strength of that proclamation we are keeping our good faith with the officers who acted, and here are Hon'ble Members opposing us.' My Lord, I am not referring at all to what has been done after that promise was held out. But that promise was made only on or after the 14th April. There is another point also. Various acts committed prior to the proclamation of martial law would come within the purview of this Act, if 30th March be taken into consideration. Even taking the theory that martial law really means law which the military would enforce when the civil arm is weak or unable to maintain order, even assuming that, my submission is that these proclamations were issued for the purpose of giving notice to the people. Even taking that doctrine, my submission is that the 30th March is absolutely unjustifiable, and I hope Government will be able to accept this amendment."

1-22 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent.—" My Lord, the Hon'ble Member now proposes that the period prescribed in this clause for the protection of officers should begin from the proclamation of martial law. If Hon'ble Members will look down the list of amendments they will see, however, that he proposes that the termination of the period during which protection should be given should be the 23rd April, a date long before our notification withdrawing martial law was issued. The date of commencement is to be postponed and the last day up to which protection is to be given is to be antedated. But, my Lord, I want to pass to very much broader objections than this to the amendment. It is one of a series of amendments intended to whittle down the whole effect of this Act. General principles were discussed in great detail in this Council lately, and there was a general consensus of opinion that the principle of the Bill should be accepted; I think there were only three or four Hon'ble members who did not take that view. In such circumstances, it is a very common move to say, 'well, if we have to pass the Bill let us make it ineffective by a succession of amendments,' and the present is one of the amendments intended to effect that object. My Lord, our view is that the whole of these disturbances are one connected whole; that they began with the disturbances of the 30th March at Delhi, and from that date onwards, from time to time, it was necessary to enforce martial law in different places. There was no definite proclamation of martial law in some places at all, nor is any proclamation the essence of the matter. The real question is, when was martial law actually enforced? The Hon'ble Member is aware of the weakness of his position when he said that various quotations would be made to prove that he was incorrect. I have a number of authorities on the point here. I will cite one, a quotation from the Law Quarterly Journal: Mr. Erle Richards, Lord Justice. 'A proclamation is not in any sense essential to the exercise of these powers; it is a convenient notification to the inhabitants that the Commander has assumed control of the district but in no way affects the legality or illegality of his action.' Then I will read a joint opinion by the Attorney General and the Solicitor General in regard to certain disturbances which arose in Canada. 'In any district in which by reason of armed bodies of inhabitants being engaged in insurrection the ordinary course of the law cannot be maintained, we are of opinion that the Governor may, even without any proclamation, proceed to put down the rebellion by force of arms'.

" There are numerous other authorities on the same question, and the law is perfectly clear. In fact, I am not aware that martial law was at any time proclaimed in the Bombay Presidency. If it was I have not seen any notification, I speak subject to correction. If that is so the effect would be if the Hon'ble Member's amendment were accepted, that the officers of Government in Bombay in those places in which martial law was enforced would not get any protection at all under the Bill. There were also certain districts in the Punjab in which the military authorities had to take over control when the civil authorities were not able to cope with the situation, and where martial law was enforced long before it was formally proclaimed by the Government of India. Thus, in Amritsar, the local military authorities in order to preserve peace, had to take over the situation long before or at any rate some time before martial law was proclaimed. The Hon'ble Member went on to say 'why were the ordinary laws, the Criminal Precedure Code and the Indian Penal Code not utilized?' 'Why did these gentlemen not look up these laws and act according to them?' That, my Lord, is exactly the position that I said in the opening debate was impossible. When there is serious disorder which the civil authorities are entirely unable to deal with, an insurrection against the King, is the officer who has to quell it to run and look up the Criminal Procedure Code or the Indian Penal Code, to discover if there is a section that will protect him before he takes effective action ? Such a position is absurd.

"For these reasons, my Lord, it is impossible for the Government to accept the date of the proclamation of martial law as the date from which this clause of the Bill is to protect officers for bona fide action."

[At this stage the Council adjourned for Lunch till 3 P.M.]

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, the position taken up by the Hon'ble the Home Member does not come on some of us as a surprise. Hitherto we understood that an Indemnifying Bill was to be introduced in the areas where martial law had been proclaimed and because martial law had been proclaimed. But now the position taken up by the Hon'ble the Home Member is that a proclamation of martial law is not essential, and that if the military take charge of a place where there has been a disturbance, that is sufficient to bring the area in which this happened within the operation of this Bill. My Lord, it is a dangerous extension. It is meant to cover cases which could not be justified without such extension, and it is a great wrong to those who suffered in those areas where martial law had not been proclaimed. 3 P.M.

"My Lord, it is hopeless to expect that the Government will go back upon the position taken up by the Hon'ble the Home Member, but we feel that we must enter our protest against this departure. The Hon'ble the Home Member complained that the series of amendments which have been put forward by some of us had only one object, namely, to whittle down the Bill. My Lord, when we cannot entirely prevent the passing of the Bill the next best thing that we can do, is to minimise the evil which its provisions contain to safeguard the interests of the public as much as we can, and to object to as many provisions as are clearly objectionable, and to endeavour to put in as many safeguards as we may be able to press upon the consideration of the Government. I do not think the complaint that has been made by the Hon'ble the Home Member is justified. I hope that if the Government cannot see their way to accept this amendment, they will at any rate recognise that we have reason on our side, and that they have the votes on their side."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, we still hope that the Hon'ble the Home Member will confine the operation of the Bill to areas where martial law had been proclaimed. The Hon'ble Pandit Malaviya has also referred to the very great danger of extending it to areas where the civil arm was exercising its jurisdiction, although the civil officers had to call in the aid of the military for the purposes of enforcing order, it being thought that the police were not able to cope with the evil. There seems to me, my Lord, another great danger, and that is this. It means that any Local Government without coming up here under the provisions of section 71 of the Government of India Act for the purpose of asking the Government of India to frame regulations for their presidencies when the ordinary law is not sufficient for the purpose, can, by virtue of the doctrine now enunciated practically extend martial law to any area within their jurisdiction the moment they feel that the civil power is temporarily unable to cope with disorder in any town or village. I think that was never intended by the constitution. Section 71 of the Government of India Act says 'that the Local Government of any part of British India to which this section for the time being applies may propose to the Governor General in Council to draft any regulation for the peace and good government of that part with reasons for the proposed regulations.' The Government may or may not accept this proposal; that is quite a different matter. Here Hon'ble Members will see that the Punjab Government approached the Government of India . . . . : 3-2 P.M.

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—"My Lord, I must protest again at the Hon'ble Member solemnly quoting from the Regulation section of 3-5 P.M.

the Government of India Act which only applies to certain territories like the North-West Frontier. It has no application whatever to the Punjab, to Bombay, to Bengal or to any of the major Provinces."

3-6 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"There was a power, I know, by which the Presidency Governments were also empowered by Statute to approach the Government of India for aid where they felt the ordinary law was insufficient. My argument does not cease to have any force even if section 71 is inapplicable to this particular case. My argument is that whether the Regulation applies to this case or not, the new doctrine that martial law can be enforced by a Governor or the head of a province and people can be handed over to the tender mercies of the military who can frame new laws, new penalties and do anything they like the moment they feel that law and order cannot be temporarily coped with with the aid of the civil force alone, is entirely a wrong doctrine. My point was that the law takes note of these difficulties where the civil arm is insufficient and makes it an incumbent duty upon the military officers to help the civil. But in all these cases prior to the actual proclamation of martial law the civil power would be responsible and the ordinary law would guide the courts in deciding the legality of the actions of men who have acted during that period. Now the constitutional writers who refer to the fundamental basis of martial law merely refer to the common basis of the power of the Crown to enforce order whether martial law is proclaimed or not. They simply say that necessity is the basis of martial law. Ordinarily, therefore, even without the proclamation of martial law the civil power has got jurisdiction to arm itself for certain purposes to quell disorders, but only so much force as is necessary should be employed. Therefore the fact that there is a common basis for the two does not, I submit, empower the executive Government to treat the two as exactly parallel and ask that the civil or the military officers who had exercised jurisdiction are entitled to seek the protection of an Indemnifying Act even before the proclamation of martial law. I would only suggest, if there be any difficulty about the fixing of dates, the words 'the enforcement of martial law' may be used so as to cover any difficulty, but I do not think that the real point would be met. But I throw out this suggestion to the Hon'ble the Home Member, because on a previous occasion instead of the words 'proclamation of martial law' he accepted the words 'enforcement of martial law'. Of course whether the words 'enforcement of martial law' would cover a particular case will be dealt with by the Tribunals when the cases come up."

The motion was put and negatived.

3-10 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I move 'that in clause 2 for the words 'the commencement of this Act' the words 'the 26th of August 1919' be substituted.'

"My Lord, when I moved for leave to introduce this Bill, this clause which extended the period during which special protection was afforded to our officers up to the commencement of the Act, was the subject of justifiable criticism. Since then I have again looked up the dates on which martial law was actually proclaimed and the dates on which it was withdrawn in the different areas. The dates on which it was proclaimed vary from the 13th April to, I think, the 22nd of April. The dates on which it was withdrawn vary from the 28th May to the 28th of August. I ought to explain, however, that after the 11th of June martial law was enforced only in railway lands in the Punjab, and that it was enforced there only by reason of the military requirements during the Afghan campaign. It was then obviously of paramount importance that military operations for the transport of troops and munitions should not be impeded by any disorders on the railway or by any interruption of communications.

"The areas of the Punjab in which martial law was at the time in force were disturbed areas, and there was considerable risk of communications being interrupted if we relaxed military control of the railways: for that reason martial law was continued in the railway areas only up to midnight of the 25th of August this year, and that date has therefore been fixed upon now as a convenient date up to which the special protection afforded to our officers should be extended."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"If this amendment is accepted my amendments entirely fall to the ground, because the amendments I have suggested, are that the operation of this Bill should be confined to the 23rd of April. The reason why I suggested the 23rd of April was that, as far as I could gather from the Press Communiqués which were quoted in the book 'Punjab Disturbances,' the disturbances ceased on that date. I see that there was real trouble with regard to railway and telegraph communications, wires being cut and so on, until about the 21st of April. I pointed out on a previous occasion that both the Communiqués of April 22nd and May 2nd showed that the Province had quieted down, although it may be as a matte rof precaution the military were there to see that no further disturbances broke out. The following Communiqué was issued:—'Lahore April 22nd, situation well in hand and reports of the districts contain no disturbing items except cutting of telegraph wires near Chakki bridge, Kangra District.' 3-12 P.M.

"And then a Communiqué of May 2nd gives a list of all the occurrences with reference to the cutting of wires and the derailment of trains and so on, and as far as I could gather, the period that this covers is up to about the 21st of April. Later on the Communique states:—'The injury which has occurred since 21st April, but the operation of martial law had by that date already begun to have their effect and subsequent interruptions were comparatively few.'

"I shall proceed on the basis that martial law had this effect, even assuming for argument's sake that there were a few interruptions later on.

"I have stated already the fact that martial law can be legally enforced only so long as there was necessity therefor and not one moment longer. It would be a usurpation of absolute power, an exercise of lawless law, if it is kept one moment longer. I realise that you may have to keep the force active in order to guard against a future recurrence of events, but my submission is that that would have to be done under the ordinary law of the land, and martial law proper would cease to have operation the moment the disturbances are quelled, and that is a very important doctrine to maintain in a country like India, because the executive are not really controlled by the Legislature, and it is necessary that they should be chary of any attempt to keep these lawless laws in operation one minute more than is absolutely necessary. I submit that any action that might have been taken by the Government subsequent to that should be considered as having been done under the ordinary law of the land, that is under the civil power, and should not be brought within the jurisdiction of the military courts. It is only for that purpose that I have brought in this amendment that martial law should, as martial law, be considered to have ceased on the 23rd of April for the purposes of this Bill."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"I am glad at last to obtain an admission from the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma that up to the 23rd of April there was serious disorder, because for some time in this Council a definite attempt was made to make out that nothing occurred at all but a little local rioting which was not of a serious character . . . . . . 3-16 P.M.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"May I say I did not agree with the question; I assume it was so."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" The Hon'ble Member may now use the word 'assume.' What he did do was to admit the fact and it is a great advance on previous statements. The Hon'ble Member went on to suggest that, at any rate, this violent form of disorder had ceased on the 23rd April. But, my Lord, I drew attention just now to the position of the Hon'ble Member in this matter. He did not wish clause (2) to take effect from the date on which the disorder began. Then he said 'No, you must stick to the date of your proclamation.' But when it is a question of determining the period during which protection by the Act should be afforded, he will not take the date on which the notification withdrawing martial law was issued. He says, 'No, you must come back to the actual facts, irrespective of the date on which martial law was withdrawn. And I maintain there was no disorder after the 23rd.' Well I suggest to the Council that this is not reasonable. Responsibility for declaring martial law rested with the Government of India, acting on the advice of the Local Government, and I read to this Council the telegram upon which we acted. The position then of our officers was this, they were aware that martial law was in force ; they were therefore acting under orders. Provided that they acted bona fide and in a reasonable belief that their action was necessary, are they to be deprived of protection because Members of this Council may say the Government continued martial law too long, or are they not entitled to plead 'We were acting on the orders of the Government as set out in notifications which had been issued in the Gazette'? I want the Council, however, again to remember that we do not claim the protection of those men if they have acted mala fide or improperly ; it is bona fide action taken in a reasonable belief that it was necessary alone that is protected. Now is it much to ask the Council to protect such men for such action during a period while the Government of India themselves rightly or wrongly declared that martial law was necessary ? That is the point that I want to make to the Council. My Lord, it is often assumed that directly the military authorities have quelled the open disorder and disturbances with which they are called to deal, they must at once abrogate their authority to the civil authorities. I do not know how far that is good constitutional law, but there is good authority for the proposition that the actual presence of violent disorder is not essential to the continuance of martial law, and this has been laid down by no less an authority than Pollock, when he says 'that the absence of visible disorder and the continued sittings of the court even are not conclusive evidence of the state of peace.' There is a another well known case on the point from India in which, although the courts had been open for six months and the Privy Council held that the seizure of property by the military authorities on the plea that martial law was in force, was perfectly justifiable because the war had not at the time ceased. Further, as a matter of common sense, the fact is that once you have established martial law to quell an open insurrection, it would be the height of folly, and, I think, Hon'ble Members of this Council will agree with me, it would really be the height of folly to abrogate it unless you have some reason to believe that the civil authorities could control the situation if martial law was removed. If you thought that the position was such that the military authorities would have immediately to be called in again, it would be idle to stop martial law or make over control to the civil authority. Such conduct would be doubly unwise on an occasion like the present when we were at war with a power on the frontier in close proximity to the Punjab. The date I propose for insertion in the clause, the 26th of August 1919, is actually the date on which the last notification withdrawing martial law was issued by the Government, and that is the reason for fixing that date in the Bill."

(After the Hon'ble Sir William Vincent had finished speaking, the Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya rose.)

The President :—" Order, order. The Hon'ble Member has replied."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"I was going to ask your Lordship whether I was entitled to speak, because the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma . . . . . .

The President :—"You should have taken the opportunity of speaking immediately after the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma.

"If this amendment of Sir William Vincent's is carried, it will involve the rejection of all *amendments down to amendment No. 22."

The motion was put and agreed to.

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, I beg to move— 3-22 P.M.

'That in clause 2 for the words 'provided that such officer or person has acted in good faith and in a reasonable belief that his action was necessary for the said purposes' the following be substituted :—

> 'Provided always, that the indemnity hereby granted is granted upon this supposition and condition, that all such acts, matters and things shall have been done bona fide, necessarily and properly, and without needless severity, in furtherance and extension of the objects for which martial law was proclaimed as aforesaid.'

"My Lord, in speaking to a similar amendment earlier in the debate, I drew attention to the fact that I have taken the language of this amendment from the Act of St. Vincent. My Lord, in this particular amendment I have introduced four words which are not to be found there, namely, 'and without needless severity'. I submit, my Lord, that it is desirable that we should substitute the amendment which I propose, in order that it might be possible for those who have suffered to have redress of their grievances. This is a measure which is being passed without the report of the Committee of Inquiry which has been appointed being laid before this Council. That imposes upon this Council the duty of more closely examining the provisions of the Bill. My Lord, if the Bill is passed as the section stands, I submit it will be very difficult for any person who has been damaged or injured by the operation of martial law to obtain a redress of his grievances, and in support of the view which I have submitted to the Council, I would invite attention to the debate that took

---

The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma :—

18. 'That in clause 2 for the words 'and before the commencement of this Act' the words 'up to the 23rd April 1919' be substituted.'

The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma :—

19. 'If amendment No 18 be rejected. That for the words 'and before the commencement of this Act,' the words 'until the suppression of the disorders' be substituted.'

The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma :—

20. 'If amendment Nos. 18 and 19 be rejected. That in clause 2 for the words 'and before the commencement of this Act' the words 'during the continuance thereof' be substituted '

The Hon'ble Mr. Sinha :—

21. 'That in clause 2 for the words from 'on or after the 30th March' to 'this Act.' the words 'during the period when martial law was in force' be substituted.'

The Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya :—

22. 'That in clause 2 for the words 'on or after the 30th of March, and before the commencement of this Act,' the words 'during the continuance of martial law' be substituted.'

place in the House of Lords in 1818. An Indemnity Bill was to be introduced there, but before it was introduced a Committee of Inquiry had been appointed and had reported. In introducing the Bill the Duke of Montrose claimed that it was a corollary from that which had preceded it, namely, the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and he urged that an Indemnity Bill was a necessary consequence of the suspension of that Act. This is the view which has been urged by the Hon'ble the Home Member and the Hon'ble the Law Member. We have been told repeatedly that an Indemnity Bill was an inevitable consequence to the introduction of martial law. Here, my Lord, what the Premier said on the discussion which was raised by Lord Lansdowne was that—

> 'after such a report as that presented to Their Lordships by the Committee, a Bill of Indemnity seemed to follow as a measure due in justice to those who had been entrusted with the difficult task of carrying the act of suspension into execution.'

And he said:—

> 'The Government were anxious to lay all the information with respect to their conduct before the Committee of the two Houses of Parliament in order that they might know how they exercised the powers entrusted to them generally and particularly, and judge from that how far they were entitled to such protection as they now came forward to apply for. They did not ask for it as a necessary consequence of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, but on the ground of the belief expressed by the Committee that the powers committed by Parliament to their discretion had not been abused. That and that alone was the ground upon which they stood before Parliament and the country. The Bill did not follow as a matter of course. The conduct of Ministers had been referred to a Committee. From the report of the Committee it appeared that all the detentions which took place under the suspension were fully warranted by circumstances and, if Their Lordships had any confidence in that report, they must in justice and in fairness grant the protection the Bill now proposed.'

"Now, my Lord, let us see how these remarks have a bearing upon the proposal before us. Here martial law was proclaimed at a time somewhere between the 13th and 15th of April. This was continued up to the 26th of August. There have been many protests, many representations to Government, that the continuance, at any rate, of martial law was not justified, and it was on that ground that one of your Hon'ble Colleagues laid down the reins of his office. Now, my Lord, the Government have recognised the wisdom, the justice, of appointing a Committee of Inquiry to consider how far these matters, these complaints, were justified or well-founded. That Committee of Inquiry has not yet met. The complaints, the allegations, to which I drew attention are to be laid before that Committee and that Committee has to make its report. Assuming the Committee come to the conclusion that the introduction of martial law was justified, the next question for them to consider and answer would be whether its continuance was justified, and, if so, up to what period of time, because every detention of every single individual—and I understand the number is over 1,000 of those who are at present in jails . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, may I rise to a point of order, to inquire whether this is relevant to the particular amendment before the Council?"

The President (to the Hon'ble Pandit):—"Will you show me how it is relevant?"

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"In this way, my Lord, very easily. It is relevant to show that the language used in this section should be as I suggest, namely, that only acts done bona fide, necessarily and properly, and without needless severity, should be indemnified. The object of my remarks is to show to your Lordship that it is yet a question for the Committee to consider whether the continuance of martial law and the detention of so many prisoners who have been detained in jail was necessary, whether it was proper and whether it was carried out without undue severity during the period up to which this martial law existed . . . . .

(The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent here rose again.)

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" May I finish my remarks ; I am explaining the reasons why my speech is relevant to the amendment . . . . .

The President :—" I hope you will give me some better reasons, because, at present, I am not satisfied."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" I am giving my reasons. It is for you, my Lord, to judge whether they are right or wrong. What I submit is that there are numerous persons who have been detained and who are undergoing imprisonment. In the case of many of these persons they desire to bring suits to test the validity of the detentions. If the indemnity is granted in the general terms in which it is proposed in the Bill before us, it will be a very difficult thing for them to have a chance of proving their case. If the words which I suggest are substituted, namely, that it is only those acts which have been done bona fide, necessarily and without needless severity, that it is only such acts which will be indemnified, then, I submit, they will have a better chance of having redress of their grievances. That is the reason of my amendment . . . . . .

The President :—" If you confine your remarks to the matters and things that have been done bona fide, necessarily and properly, and without needless severity, you will be in order, but you will not be in order if you travel outside the discussion of those words."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" Thank you, my Lord ; I shall so confine myself.

" My Lord, from the statements laid on the table by the Hon'ble the Home Member the other day in answer to some of my questions, the Council will have seen what a large number of persons has been kept in imprisonment, and I submit that for them it will be easier to prove that certain acts were not done bona fide, necessarily and properly and without needless severity than it would be for them to prove that certain acts were done in good faith in a reasonable belief that those acts were necessary. For these reasons, I commend this amendment to the consideration of the Council."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—" My Lord, this amendment has really been discussed over and over again ; and I have explained why we use the words ' acts done in good faith and in a reasonable belief that they were necessary.' It is no good my explaining them any more. If I explained the intention fifty times, the Hon'ble Pandit would not understand. There is no one so deaf as he who will not hear. The Hon'ble Pandit again cited the Act of St. Vincent, which is, I think, going back to an ancient and, if I may say so, an insignificant precedent. If the Hon'ble Pandit prefers the British Statutes, let us by all means go back to the precedent of 1780 under which all acts which were done for the suppression of rebellion were to be validated. That is the formula adopted there. If the Hon'ble Pandit thinks that it has the sanction of time, I am quite willing to follow it. We have tried to put before the Council a more modern formula and a reasonable limitation of both validation and indemnity by the clause proposed in this Bill. If the Council thinks otherwise by all means let us go back to the beginning ; not to the St. Vincent Act, which is hardly a worthy precedent for this Council to copy—let us go back to the British Statutes of the end of the 18th century. I have explained over and over again why I personally prefer the drafting 3-32 P.M.

which has been adopted in this Bill, and, I think, it is clear why the Hon'ble Pandit objects to it. I submit the Council should not do anything of the sort."

The motion was put and negatived.

3-34 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"My Lord, I move that in clause 2 for the concluding words 'it is hereby discharged' the words 'the provisions of this Act shall apply thereto' be substituted.'

It is a formal amendment which I have moved that if there be any proceeding already pending, it should be open to the plaintiff or prosecutor to show that the officer did not act in good faith and in a reasonable belief, and I do not think the Hon'ble Member intends that an action should be dismissed without giving the party an opportunity. 'If any such proceeding has been instituted before the passing of this Act' are, I think, very wide terms; and that is the reason why I have brought forward this amendment. It is a mere formal amendment."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, again, I am afraid, Government are unable to accept this amendment. The plain and simple words are 'it is hereby discharged'; those are the words which have been used in the Acts which we have copied—the South Africa Acts and others. The Council may also be interested to know the wording proposed in the Indemnity Act which is either now before Parliament or will very shortly be. It is a general Indemnity Act practically for the whole Empire in respect of things done during the war. The actual words which we have adopted are to be found in this the most recent piece of drafting available. The words there used are: 'If any such proceeding has been instituted, whether before or after the passing of the Act, it shall be discharged and made void.' We only go as far as 'discharged'; we do not think it necessary to put in the words 'made void.' I am not discussing the merits of the clause, I am only pointing out that we have followed the most modern form available."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"My Lord, if the Hon'ble the Law Member had told me that if there be any proceeding instituted it would be governed by the provisions of this Bill and that the party would be entitled to show that the officer acted in bad faith or without reasonable belief, I would have been content. There is no use telling me that there are other Acts in which similar words were employed and that we are only following the modern drafting. The question is as to what by the use of this very wide language is intended. I do not think that it was the object to have all actions discussed apart from their merits, and therefore I brought in this amendment."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"My Lord, may I give the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma the fullest assurance that that is the intention. It is, I think, clear that that is the meaning of the words and nothing more."

The motion was put and negatived.

The President:—"The next three amendments are identical. The first is to be moved by Mr. Sarma, the second* by Mr. Malaviya and the third* by Mr. Sinha. The fate of the three will be decided upon the first."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"My Lord, I move 'that in clause 3, the words from 'and all action' to the end of the clause be omitted.' I did not intend to move this amendment if my amendment about 'reasonable belief' and about limiting the operation of this Bill to the period covered by the martial law proclamations had been accepted, because I realised that during that period this presumption in respect of acts done by officers ought to be raised, namely, that they had acted in good faith, and it would be for the other party to show that the acts were not done in good faith, and all the precedents are in favour of that proposition. I need not go over the ground again covering the period before the actual proclamations and after the actual necessity, according to some others, had ceased. We cover the incidents in Amritsar and Gujranwala and other places which we feel justified in the extension of this presumption in favour of the officers. Those are the grounds upon which I rely for asking that these words should be deleted from this clause."

* The Hon'ble Mr. Malaviya:—
28. 'That in clause 3 the words from 'and all action' to the end of the clause be omitted.'
The Hon'ble Mr. Sinha:—
27. 'That in clause 3 the words from 'and all action taken' to the end of the clause be omitted.'

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" My Lord, I will add only a few words and two opinions to what has been said by Mr. Sarma in support of this amendment. We urge that the words which we have indicated should be omitted so that the onus of proof will not be thrown upon the plaintiff or complainant, to prove that the person who assailed his honour or his liberty did not act in good faith and reasonable belief. Now, my Lord, this is in conformity with the Statutes of Parliament and the English opinion. I will cite two weighty opinions on this question. 3-40 P.M.

" When the matter was being discussed in the House of Commons Mr. John Stuart Mill said :—

'There may be a public necessity in the case of rebellion, requiring that certain acts not justified by the ordinary law of the country should be done, but these acts should be acts of suppression and not of punishment. Now a point which has not been noticed and to which I attach the highest importance is this—that in a case of public necessity those who act upon it, and do under the supposed necessity that which they would not ordinarily be justified in doing should be amenable to the laws of their country for so doing. As in the case of killing any person in self-defence so in the case of putting any person to death in defence of the country, the person who does it ought to have the onus thrown upon him of satisfying the ordinary tribunals of the country that the necessity existed.

'What therefore we say does not exist, and ought not to exist, and which if it does not exist we should do our utmost to put an end to, is the idea that any proceeding such as a declaration of martial law, can or ought to exempt those who act upon it from amenability to the laws of the country. We contend that the law of necessity, of which nobody denies the existence, would justify the executive in doing these things, if no such thing as martial law had ever been heard of, and that by using the term martial law you ought not to be able to get rid of all responsibility. We demand that the officers of Government of this country should not be able to escape or get out of the region and jurisdiction of the law; but, that whatever they do, if it be against the law, they should be compelled to justify. They must show the necessity which existed, not to the satisfaction of a court-martial merely, but of the regular tribunals of the country.'

" Now, my Lord, I submit that this weighty opinion should have some value with the Government of India. This was the opinion of a philosopher, a statesman and a legislator. Let me quote to Council the opinion of a Judge, Chief Justice Cockburn. In discussing an Indemnity Act he laid down in no equivocal terms that 'it should be confined to acts honestly done in the suppression of existing rebellion and under the pressure of the most urgent necessity. The present indemnity is confined to acts done in order to suppress the insurrection and rebellion and the plea contains consequently the necessary averments that the grievances complained of were committed during the continuance of the rebellion and were used for its suppression and were reasonably and in good faith considered by the defendant to be necessary for the purpose; and it will be incumbent on the defendant to make good these averments in order to support his plea.'

"My Lord, the Bill before us would make it incumbent upon the defendant to support his plea and on the plaintiff the necessity of proving that the defendant had not acted in good faith and in the reasonable belief that his action was necessary for suppressing disorders. I submit that this is without justification and it is a pity to my mind that the Hon'ble the Law Member should have gone to the Legislature of South Africa for the clause which he has inserted in the Bill. I submit that we should adhere to the views expressed by John Stuart Mill and by Chief Justice Cockburn of leaving the onus on the person on whom it naturally and reasonably lies. Who can give evidence? The man who pleads good faith. Who can say he had a reasonable belief in a particular thing? The man who had that belief. Thus you are asking another man whom this person has assaulted or injured to give proof of the non-existence of good faith; of the non-existence of a reasonable belief. You are putting the cart before the horse; you are doing an injustice to those men who are seeking redress. I will quote the words of Lord Holland in a debate in 1818 regarding the suppression of disorder—

'After having mangled the limbs of a man without trial and without proof of guilt it was a horrible crime to deny him redress by passing an Act to protect his prosecutor.'

"The Government, my Lord, are throwing upon the plaintiff the burden of proving what it is not reasonable possibly for him to do."

3-46 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"I should like to add a word in support of this amendment. I think it will be hard on the plaintiff or the prosecutor to have to prove his case, if the clause stands as it is. The Hon'ble the Law Member said the other day that in ordinary criminal cases the burden of proof is cast on the prosecutor. This is certainly true. But he will agree with me when I say that in criminal cases the prosecutor is discharged from responsibility when he has made out a prima facie case. When an accused person is put on his defence then the onus is shifted to him and he must then bring his conduct within the purview of any exception of the law. Similarly, I submit that to hold the plaintiff responsible to prove not only the want of good faith but also of the reasonableness of belief in the mind of the defendant would be certainly to place upon him a burden that he cannot possibly discharge."

3-47 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Shafi :—"My Lord the amendment moved by my Hon'ble friends, everyone of whom belongs to the legal profession, raises a question of law of considerable importance and, with your permission, I propose to deal with it from the strictly legal point of view. At the very outset I wish to emphasize the fact that, in order to arrive at a correct conclusion with reference to this question, it is essential for Hon'ble Members to bear in mind what clause 3 exactly enacts. Now, even a cursory analysis of this clause will make it clear that it can be divided into two parts. The first portion of this clause relates to the evidential character of the Secretary's certificate in connection with the first issue in such cases, i.e., whether the action was performed under the orders of an officer of the Government. With reference to this portion of the clause, no Hon'ble Member has raised any objection whatever, and I take it that this portion of the clause is acceptable to everyone of them. The clause then proceeds :—'and all action taken for the aforesaid purposes shall be deemed to have been taken in good faith and in reasonable belief that it was necessary therefor unless the contrary is proved'. In other words, the onus of proof of absence of good faith and of a reasonable belief will be on the plaintiff or prosecutor, as the case may be. This being so, the question arises whether the position which embodied in this clause is a novel one, incapable of being supported either by general principles or by precedent, or is it a position which is justified by general principles as well as by authority. Now, my Lord, in the very remarkable address delivered by him the other day when the Hon'ble the Law Member made a comprehensive survey of the constitutional aspect of martial law, he cited precedent after precedent from various countries within the British Empire from which it was perfectly clear that whenever and wherever martial law had been introduced, it had invariably been followed by an Indemnity Act. Hon'ble Members will remember that he cited the corresponding clauses in these Indemnity Acts in order to show that in seeking to enact clause 3 we were not making any new departure whatever. In ordinary circumstances a reference to that speech would have been quite sufficient to meet the situation, but on this occasion I propose, with your Excellency's permission, to go a little further in order to establish three propositions. The first of these propositions is that the position which is enacted in the second portion of this clause is one which already finds place in more than one of the Acts which have been passed by the Indian Legislature ; the second is that it is in perfect consonance with the statutory rules of evidence as obtaining in this country, and the third proposition is that it is justified by judicial authority. Now, turning to the first proposition, as far back as the year 1850, an Act was passed by the Indian Legislature in order to protect Judicial officers in respect of acts which may have been done without jurisdiction but in good faith, Act No. XVIII of 1850. To section 1 of that Act I beg your Excellency's permission to refer. This is what is laid down—

> ' No Judge, Magistrate, Justice of the Peace, Collector or other person acting judicially shall be liable to be sued in any Civil Court for any act done or ordered to be done by him in the discharge of his judicial duty whether or not within the limits of his jurisdiction ; provided that he at the time in good faith believed himself to have jurisdiction to do or order the act complained of. '

" Now, my Lord, in a leading case on this section their Lordships of the Privy Council in a judgment reported in 2, Moore's Indian Appeals, at page 293, laid down the following principle. I am afraid I must correct myself. This rule was not based on this particular section, but was based on the corresponding section in 21, Geo. III, cap. 70, sec. 24. Their Lordships held that the section protecting the Provincial Magistrates in India from actions for any wrong or injury done by them in the exercise of their judicial offices does not confer unlimited protection, but places them on the same footing as those in English Courts by a similar jurisdiction and only gives them an exemption from liability when acting boná fide in cases in which they have mistakenly acted without jurisdiction. Trespass will not lie against a judge for acting judicially but without jurisdiction unless he knew or had the means of knowing of the effect of jurisdiction, but now mark what follows 'and it lies upon the plaintiff in every such case to prove that fact. '

" Now, my Lord, the Hon'ble Pandit thought it was very extraordinary that the onus of proving the absence of good faith should be placed upon a plaintiff in a case such as this. Your Lordship will see that this is exactly what their Lordships of the Privy Council laid down in this ruling, i.e., that it will be for the plaintiff to prove that the Magistrate acted otherwise than in good faith in cases of this description.

" Turning now to section 43 of the Police Act, No. V of 1861, it enacts as follows :—

> ' When any action of prosecution shall be brought or any proceedings held against any police officer for any act done by him in such capacity, it shall be lawful for him to plead that such act was done by him under the authority of a warrant issued by a Magistrate. Such plea shall be proved by the production of the warrant directing, and puroporting to be signed by such Magistrate and the defendant shall thereupon be entitled to a decree in his favour.'

" That is to say, under this enactment the mere production of the warrant directing the police officer to do a certain thing will entitle him to a verdict in his favour and a suit against him shall be dismissed.

"Now, your Lordship will see that the provision which I have just read out is analogous to the first part of clause 3, and if we had stopped at the end of the first part, we would have been perfectly justified in doing so, because there is the precedent of the Police Act in its favour; but in the present enactment, we do not stop there; we go on to say that the act must have been done in good faith and so on. Therefore, it is perfectly clear that the present Act is justified by the precedent of the Police Act also.

"Turning, my Lord, to the Statutory Rules of Evidence as obtaining in India, it seems to me that it is unquestionable that the onus of proof as laid down in the clause under discussion is in perfect consonance with the provisions of the Evidence Act. Let me in this connection invite the attention of the Council to two facts. The proceedings instituted by the person against whom action has been taken will either be criminal or civil. Now in criminal cases, it is one of the fundamental principles of criminal administration in all civilised countries, that the accused must be presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established by the prosecutor so that the onus of proof lies in every criminal case on the prosecutor to establish the guilt of the accused. No authority is required for this A. B. C. of Criminal Law, but if the Hon'ble Pandit who, I believe, has given up practice for a large number of years, requires an authority, I will only mention section 101 of the Indian Evidence Act and invite his attention to illustration A below that section :—

> 'A desires a court to give judgment that B shall be punished for a crime which A says B has committed the crime. And the onus of proof lies on the prosecutor.'

"Now, my Lord, turning to cases of civil proceedings, sec. 102 of the Indian Evidence Act enacts as follows :—

> 'The burden of proof in a suit or proceeding lies on that person who would fail if no evidence at all were given on either side.'

That is the general principle laid down in the Indian Evidence Act regarding the question of onus of proof. Now if in a civil suit a plaintiff were to come into court and ask for damages against the defendant officer of Government on the ground of certain action done by that officer, it is obvious that if no evidence were produced on either side, it is the plaintiff who must fail; his suit would naturally be dismissed if no evidence is produced on either side. And may I remind my three learned friends that this question is really concluded by authority. The case which, under these circumstances, will be instituted will be of the class of cases which are characterised as suits for damages for malicious prosecutions. It has been laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council and by all the High Courts that even in cases where an accused person has been discharged or acquitted, whether in the Original Court or on appeal, when that person, in his own turn, comes into a civil court and asks for damages for malicious prosecution as against the prosecutor, he must, in spite of his discharge by the Criminal Court, establish three propositions. Firstly, that he was innocent of the crime with which he was charged, secondly, that the prosecution was malicious, and thirdly, and this is the most important point to which I wish to invite the attention of the Council, it is for the plaintiff to prove absence of reasonable and proper cause on the part of the defendant. That rule is obviously analogous to the rule which is embodied in the proposed clause. I need not cite in support of this position a long string of authorities which can be cited. It is sufficient for me to invite attention to only two leading authorities on this position. The Privy Council judgment in Indian Law Reports 25, Bombay, 322, Judgment by Lord MacNaughton, and the Calcutta High Court Judgment reported in Indian Law Reports, 28, Cal. 591, Judgment of Sir Francis Maclean, Chief Justice.

Therefore, my Lord, I submit that, on the ground of judicial authority, on the ground of precedent, on the ground of statutory rules of evidence, the onus is rightly placed on the plaintiff or the prosecutor in this clause when he comes into court either claiming damages or charging the accused person with an offence under the criminal law of the land, and, I submit, therefore that the principle of onus laid down in this clause is not only not extraordinary, but is the rule which already prevails, and in consequence, we are not enacting anything new."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—" My Lord, this is not an amendment which Government can accept, and I am in some difficulty in dealing with it. My Hon'ble friend Mr. Sarma told the Council that he was willing to accept the position that it should be assumed that acts were done in good faith and were necessary until the contrary is proved in all cases of what I would call statutory law. But my Hon'ble friend would not apply the same rule to cases under non-statutory martial law. I am in a difficulty as to this, as I do not understand his differentiation between the two. Then came the Hon'ble Pandit who would not accept it at all. This is a case in which I am afraid the St. Vincent Act did not help the Hon'ble Pandit, and therefore we did not hear anything about it. The Hon'ble Pandit's argument was based on a passage which, I think, he quoted from a newspaper called the 'Servant of India' referring to an argument by Chief Justice Cockburn, not as a Judge, I understand, but in a discussion on some Indemnity Bill of which the Hon'ble Member did not give us any particulars. As far as I know, an Indemnity Bill on the lines of Lord Cockburn's argument was never passed by Parliament . . . . 4-2 P.M.

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—" It was as a Judge that that remark was made by Lord Cockburn."

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—" I can carry it no further than the narrative in the 'Servant of India' which I have before me. It refers to a remark by Lord Cockburn in discussing an Indemnity Bill. I know no more about it, nor, I think, does the Hon'ble Pandit . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"May I mention that it will be found in 4 Queen's Bench Division, which is where I think that case was reported ?"

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes:—"Again I say that, so far as I know, such an Indemnity Bill was never passed by Parliament. It was apparently a suggestion by an eminent authority as to what should be put into an Indemnity Bill, but the suggestion does not appear to have been carried into effect.

" I think the Council may be interested to hear a relevant clause of the general Indemnity Bill which is, I believe, now before Parliament.

" The clause provides, as our Bill does, for certificates that acts were done under authority and goes on to say that 'any such act, matter or thing done by or under the authority of such person shall be deemed to have been done in good faith unless the contrary is proved.'

" That is one of the terms of the Imperial Bill now before Parliament, and our clause follows it very closely."

The Hon'ble Mr. Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—" My Lord, my Hon'ble friend Mr. Shafi has obliged us by discoursing upon the rules of evidence and upon the previous history of enactments with regard to the onus of proof. I do not think anybody here need be told that the plaintiff or the 4-6 P.M. prosecutor ought ordinarily to prove his case, that the actions of the accused or defendant infringe upon some legal right, some rule of law. That he has to do. But these general dicta are a little beside the point. What we are now concerned with here is that admittedly certain actions are in violation of the ordinary law of the land. Admitting that, the question is whether we are to give protection to officers violating the law on the ground that their acts are to be presumed to have been done in good faith for the purpose of carrying out the objects of martial law. That is the real point. Therefore, in the absence of an Indemnity Bill like this, the onus would really lie upon the person pleading good faith in defence. I will only quote one passage—'A person who under martial law imprisons or kills British subjects in India must, if he is to escape imprisonment, justify his conduct by proving its necessity.'

"Here what we say is, though as a matter of fact the act may not be necessary, we shall presume that the officer believed it to be necessary, and therefore we shall exempt him from punishment. Therefore I do not see how Mr. Shafi's remarks will help us. The question is are we as a Legislature to raise this presumption in favour of all acts, only some or in favour of no acts? I took an intermediate position. It was necessary under the circumstances in which this Bill was brought in for Hon'ble Members to contend really that, in the absence of a clear proof of necessity, the onus should not be on the plaintiff, but even to an intermediate position objection has been taken by the Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes: here we have two classes of cases; one class, in which martial law has been proclaimed and in respect of which there is some doubt. Then we have another to which the ordinary law should be applied and to protect which would be a violation of the constitution. Having regard to the facts which have been so far disclosed it would be a travesty of justice to presume good faith and reasonable belief, in favour of certain officers in respect of some of the incidents which occurred before the 14th and the 16th of April 1919. I suggested that therefore no presumption should be raised in respect of acts done before the proclamation of martial law, and after the necessity therefore had ceased in the eye of the law. Of course here we are not arguing before Judges on the question of presumptions and technicalities, we are arguing whether the course suggested by the Government is expedient; whether it is politically right, whether it would not be a dangerous precedent, when we know as a matter of fact that those presumptions are not justifiable in many cases as far as our present information goes."

The motion was put and negatived.

4-10 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma:—"My Lord, I move that after the words 'and all action taken' in clause 3 the following be inserted:—'after the proclamation of martial law therein and during the continuance thereof.' I have really stated all my reasons with reference to this point in dealing with the previous amendment. I shall therefore not weary the Council by repeating them. I respectfully submit that a distinction must be drawn between acts committed before the proclamation of martial law and after its proclamation, and, I think, there would be grave disaffection felt by the public if Government should try to shield acts which primâ facie must be assumed to be guilty."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I have really nothing to add to what I have already said on this subject. I have explained that martial law was enforced before it was formally proclaimed in certain areas."

The motion was put and negatived.

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya:—"My Lord, I beg to move 'that in clause 3 for the words from 'and all action' to the end of the clause the following be substituted:—

> 'and that every act, matter and thing shall be presumed to have been done, bonâ fide, necessarily and properly, until the contrary shall be made to appear by the party complaining.'"

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—"I think there is nothing more to be said on this point, and I shall not weary the Council by repeating my arguments."

The motion was put and negatived.

4-13 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, a similar amendment has been thrown out by the Council, and there is no use in pressing this,* I beg to withdraw it."

The motion was by leave withdrawn.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—" My Lord, I ask for the omission of clause 4. Clause 4 runs thus :—

> 'Every person confined under and by virtue of any sentence passed by a court or other authority constituted or appointed under martial law and acting in a judicial capacity shall be deemed to have been lawfully confined and shall continue liable to confinement until the expiration of such sentence, or until released by the Governor General in Council or otherwise discharged by lawful authority.'

" Of course this is partly governed by clause 6, which says :—

> " Nothing in this Act shall—
> (a) apply to any sentence passed or punishment inflicted by or under the orders of any Commission appointed under the Martial Law Ordinance, 1919, or
> (b) be deemed to bar a full and unqualified exercise of His Majesty's pleasure in receiving or rejecting appeals to His Majesty in Council or to affect any question or matter to be decided therein.'

" Therefore, one class of cases really goes out, namely, those that are covered by the judgments of the Commissions appointed under the Martial Law Ordinances. I dealt at some length before with my objections to this part of the Bill and I shall not repeat them again. I shall try to summarise the various points on which I based my argument in asking the Council not to accept these convictions and sentences as being right and as deserving of confirmation. The point that was made by the Hon'ble the Home Member for bringing in a clause of this description was that, prima facie, these sentences might, after martial law ceased, be considered to be ultra vires and without jurisdiction. That therefore many persons might have to be released, and, inasmuch as inconvenient results would follow, an enactment of this description is absolutely necessary in the interests of peace and order. Well, the answer to that is two-fold. First of all, you might bring up those offenders who the Government think are really guilty and deserving of further detention before the ordinary courts. The only question would be one of expense. They may be re-arrested, and put in jail pending trial, and the interests of peace and order would not suffer in the slightest degree. The only question would be as to whether public time and public money would not be wasted by pursuing such a course. Put shortly the point is whether, on the balance of convenience, we are to confirm these convictions following precedents, or, having regard to the special methods employed in the Punjab, we should insist upon the Government bringing up the cases again wholly or partially. Hon'ble Members will see that I have got another amendment to the effect, that, at any rate in cases not covered by the Indian Penal Code or any special or local law this clause should not be applied. The objections, my Lord, are these. Assume that there was a necessity for martial law. According to many of us that necessity began, if at all, on the 14th or 16th and ceased about the 23rd. If the above view be correct, it was wrong both on principle and the dictates of sound policy for the Government to have established tribunals or passed any Ordinance on the 21st for the purpose of dealing with the disturbances. The questions as to the interpretation and validity of these Ordinances, Nos. I and IV, how far they are applicable and as to whether they are applicable in cases governed by the Bengal Regulation only, are really before the Privy Council, but I submit on the question before the Legislature we are not hampered by considerations which might restrict the action of the Privy Council or of any duly constituted authority. The question, my Lord, is, was there any reason for the ordinary courts of the land not trying these offenders, and if special tribunals were rightly established, their not trying the offenders with the ordinary procedure observed, at any rate after the 21st.? If Hon'ble Members turn to the statement of trials by summary courts and area officers in the districts of Lahore, Amritsar, Gujranwala, Gujrat and Lyallpur, ~~Hon'ble Members~~ will find that most if not all of these convictions were late in April, and in May, June, July, and on later dates. It may be argued that martial law cannot be said to be in force when the ordinary courts are sitting for administering the law, and all writers have held that that is one of the criteria. The judicial tribunals in the Punjab were administering justice ordinarily without any interference, I take it, after the 21st. If they were administering the law after the 21st or the 23rd, was there any necessity for depriving the citizens of the Punjab of the protection of the procedure which was guaranteed to them by the Legislature deliberately in enacting the Criminal Procedure Code and other laws? My submission therefore is that there was a violation of the fundamental principle of jurisprudence and violation of the protection given by the Legislature, when courts were constituted which could set at naught the ordinary procedure. This is my first and strong objection to our ratifying these convictions. Of course, if there was a state of war, if it was absolutely impossible for any court to sit and try cases, then certainly it would have been foolish on my part to say that the strict procedure of the Criminal Procedure Code should be adhered to. Necessity knows no law, and if the ordinary law courts cannot administer the law, there is no use of complaining that they did not. But here that was not the state of things. The courts were sitting, the courts were administering justice; there was absolutely nothing, therefore, to justify the depriving the citizens of the protection of the ordinary procedure. It is true that courts of three Judges have been appointed, but the ordinary right of appeal has been taken away. That is my second objection.

"There is a third objection, my Lord, and that is this. As things stand, in some cases the evidence was not clearly recorded; in other cases there are no clear judgments, so that it is absolutely impossible in a large number of cases—I will not say in all—for the Legislative Council, the Government or any Judges who may be appointed to consider as to whether these decisions were rightly come to. There can be no scrutiny, and therefore I submit as a matter of principle that there should be no confirmation of these sentences.

"Then, my Lord, there is another ground, and a stronger one. These martial law officers have issued various regulations the enforcement of which might or might not be justifiable during actual rebellion or the suppression thereof. But, I submit, it would not do for the Legislature sitting here deliberately to confirm sentences under martial law orders based on principles opposed to the ordinary notions of civilisation. The number of regulations apart from notices framed by these various officers and prescribing penalties was, I think, 15. Regulation 16 runs thus:—'Any person who contravenes any of the foregoing regulations shall be liable to trial by an officer authorised to dispose of an offence summarily under martial law, and such officer may sentence the offender to imprisonment, rigorous or simple, which may extend to two years or to fine not exceeding one thousand rupees or with both . . and may also inflict whipping in addition to or in lieu of any other punishment which he is empowered to inflict.' I need hardly say that failure to salaam a European, discourtesy to a European officer and such like things had been made offences either by notice or by regulation Therefore the point is that if by clause 3 you confirm the conviction—I know it has been confined only to cases where persons have been confined—if you confirm the conviction you necessarily ratify the legality of a provision of this description which could inflict the punishment of whipping and other punishments upon any person guilty of any infraction of martial law. We are grateful to the Hon'ble the Home Member for confining clause 3 to cases of imprisoned persons, but I would ask him to see whether we are not, as a matter of fact, in confirming the validity of these convictions, really ratifying Regulation 16 covering them all and convictions passed under regulations which cannot, I think, be ratified by any Legislature. It may be that some of the regulations are perfectly unobjectionable ; but here the officers in command went and multiplied martial law offences, created offences which were not known to the law of the land, and under a comprehensive code of punishments a person can be whipped and imprisoned for any offence and in confirming the rule which inflicts the penalty you validate that rule ; that is my real difficulty. When the question of the amendment of the Army Act was under the consideration of this Council, I sought to move an amendment that that punishment of whipping should be abolished. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief was so good as to sympathise with the object of my amendment . . . . .

The Hon'ble Sir George Lowndes :—" I rise to a point of order. I ask whether these remarks have anything to do with the clause of the Bill to which the Hon'ble Member has moved an amendment ? It does not deal with convictions or the nature of the punishment ; it only confirms sentences of confinement and nothing else." 4-26 P.M.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—" That is my real difficulty and I think that is no sufficient answer to my question. I find that in case No. 159 a person was thrashed and he was also remanded. . . .

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" May I explain, my Lord, that this clause has nothing whatever to do with any sentence of whipping at all ? I submit that the Hon'ble Member is out of order in attempting to create prejudice by bringing up this question of whipping."

The President :—" The Hon'ble Member must confine himself to the clause which he asks this Council to delete."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—" No one would be more glad if it were possible . . . . .

The President :—" It is certainly possible."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—" I shall then treat it as possible, because I take it that both the Hon'ble the Law Member and the Home Member do not want to uphold the legality of that rule. It may be legal or it may be illegal, that was just the point I was driving at. My real difficulty was that you would be indirectly ratifying that rule inasmuch as there were cases in which persons were remanded to custody and the punishment of whipping to which I was alluding is provided for in the general penal clause. I know that any observation made by any Hon'ble Member in the course of the discussion would be absolutely irrelevant for the purpose of interpreting the Act when it comes up before the law courts; but I do not think that there is much use carrying the discussion further on this point.

"Then, my Lord, apart from that clause I would ask this Council to bear in mind that various offences had been created, such as selling above controlled rates foodstuffs, milk, etc., and so on, punishable in the same manner, and the preamble (paragraph 3) was not limited in its operation as is clause 4 of the Bill. Of course it may be said that the operative part of an act is the thing that matters, and it is a perfectly sound argument; but I know the preamble is sometimes used in interpreting an Act. The preamble says—

> 'Whereas certain persons have been convicted by courts and other authorities constituted or appointed under martial law, and it is expedient to confirm and provide for the continuance of sentences passed by such courts or authorities.'

"It is very general; and therefore there is danger in wide interpretation of this clause and Regulation 16. I am glad to be told at any rate that no such use would be made of it and that it was not intended to cover that part of the Regulation which provides for the punishment of whipping, etc. I shall proceed, my Lord, on that assumption. Then the question is as to the various offences not known to the law which had been created by these martial law orders, and the various terms of imprisonment ranging up to two years, etc., inflicted under these. My submission is, would it be right for us as a Legislature to confirm these convictions without knowing more, especially when we know as a matter of fact that all the materials are not before anybody on which the rightness and appropriateness of the decisions may be examined. I therefore submit that this clause should be eliminated, and the ordinary procedure should be resorted to."

4-30 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent:—"My Lord, I hope Hon'ble Members will not conclude from what the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma has said that this clause involves the admission of the principles to which he has referred. It does not. He referred, for instance, to the sentences of whipping awarded by the military authorities for certain offences. Whatever may be the merits or demerits of such a form of punishment, every Member who reads the clause which is now under discussion will see that there is no reference in it to whipping at all, and that it does not justify such sentences. I suggest further that the introduction of the racial question and the mention of this form of punishment were made in order to create a prejudice in the minds of the Council. I can conceive of no other reason for the mention of these matters. My Lord, I have already in my opening speech explained to the best of my ability why we cannot accept this amendment. When martial law is introduced in a particular area, it is clearly necessary for the military authorities to have some means of enforcing their orders, of punishing summarily and speedily crimes directly connected with the disturbances and breaches of military regulations. I think that is a proposition that will be evident to everybody, and as a matter of fact, I believe that when martial law is enforced the normal procedure is to constitute some form of summary courts; if indeed such courts were not constituted, there would be no authority whatever which could enforce obedience of martial law regulations. Otherwise if the offender were sent to the Civil Courts they would say 'this is not an offence under the civil law or one of which we can take any cognizance whatever.' Many of the men sentenced by these summary courts were, as I explained to the Council before, convicted of very heinous crimes, such offences as arson, the possession of stolen property, the destruction of railway lines, etc. I am very anxious not to repeat what I have said already. A large number, about 90 per cent I believe,—but I will not guarantee that statement—were tried before 1st class Magistrates whose business it is normally to try similar offences. I have already given an undertaking to this Council, further,—and I have already addressed the Punjab Government on the subject—that we will have the sentences of all these men revised by two High Court Judges. Further, those who have been convicted of offences which are really a violation of military regulations only, will be released by Government, provided that the facts found by the Court are not such as to justify a conviction for an offence punishable under the ordinary law. I do not know if I make myself quite clear. There are a certain number of offenders who have been definitely convicted under various sections of the Indian Penal Code. There is another class of offenders who have been convicted of breaches of military regulations. In some of the latter cases the facts found would justify the conviction of these men under the ordinary criminal law. We have cases, for instance, of extortion; one man was convicted of extorting money from a townsman on threat of giving certain information to the Police. This is a conviction that might well have been had under section 384. There is another case of indecent assault on a woman in which the conviction was recorded as a breach of military regulations; then we have cases of injuries done to railways and telegraphs. In such cases although the convictions have been recorded as breaches of military regulations, these records will only be revised in the ordinary way. Where, however, the offence consists of violation of military regulations and the facts found do not constitute an offence under the ordinary law, it is the intention of the Government—I gave the undertaking before and I give it again—to release the men immediately. I hope that will go some way towards meeting Mr. Sarma. But the amendment he proposes goes a great deal further than this, and would mean that none of these sentences of imprisonment should be validated at all. My Lord, I do not know how the military Commander can do his duty without these sentences. If anybody is whipped a large section of the public at once protests :' what a scandal, what a barbarous thing ?'

"What then is to be done with these offenders if they are not to be imprisoned or whipped ? Fining would not meet the circumstances of many cases. I have explained that Summary Courts were absolutely necessary and that proceedings in the ordinary courts would in cases in which speedy measures were necessary be an impossibility. Wherever martial law has been in force it has been the practice to constitute these courts, and it has been the practice to validate the sentences and the normal procedure to go very much further than the Bill which we have under consideration. Here, for instance, is the South Africa Act of 1915 which has been constantly quoted. It runs :—

> 'The several courts martial and military and special tribunals constituted and convened by or on behalf of the Government or its officers during the period aforesaid for the trial and punishment of persons guilty of treasonable, seditious or rebellious conduct or of persons subject to military law shall be deemed to have been constituted in accordance with law, and the several sentences .... are hereby confirmed.'

And goes on :—

> 'Every person confined in any prison, gaol, lockup, or in any other place whatsoever under and by virtue of any such sentence aforesaid shall continue liable to be confined therein.'

The same provisions will be found in both the older South Africa Acts. In one of them there is a definite reference to offences which really consist of a breach of military regulations, the very class of offences to which the Hon'ble Member made a reference. Similarly, the Imperial Bill, which has now been quoted, says :—

> 'Any sentence passed, judgment given or order made by any military court (other than a court-martial constituted in pursuance of any Statute) in connection with the present war or by any court established for the administration of justice within any territory in the occupation of any of His Majesty's forces during such occupation or after such occupation has determined until the Court has been abolished or superseded by such lawfully constituted authority as may hereafter be established for the administration of such territory shall be deemed to be and always to have been valid.'

In asking the Council to adopt this clause we are not therefore departing from the normal procedure. It was, however, suggested in another part of the argument of the Hon'ble Mr. Sarma, if I understood him aright, the point raised was that the ordinary courts were sitting and it was therefore improper to resort to summary courts— . . . .

4-40 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"You could for the sake of the convenience of the administration multiply the officers, but the procedure would be the ordinary one."

4-41 P.M. The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"That is much the same thing, but in any case wherever military courts of this character have been constituted, it has been the universal practice, I think, to adopt a summary form of procedure. In fact this is obviously necessary if justice is to be administered quickly. In many cases where martial law has been established in the past, we know also that the Civil Courts have sat for the trial of ordinary offences concurrently with Military Courts specially constituted for the trial of offences connected with these disturbances. Finally, before I sit down, I want to point out two results of the adoption of this amendment. One is that Government would have to release a very large number of criminals, dangerous criminals, on to the country. That would be extremely unwise; and the second result would be that Council would deliberately put the Government in this position, that they would be liable to actions for wrongful imprisonment brought by a number of men who have done their best to destroy the safety of the State in a time of grave peril. That, I hope, this Council will not agree to."

4-43 P.M. The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, I am thankful to the Hon'ble the Home Member for his promise to release persons who were merely guilty of infraction of martial law regulations, and whose cases could not have been brought up under the criminal laws of the land. I think the people must be satisfied with that promise. But, my Lord, with regard to the question as to what effect it would have on public peace if a large number of people are released, I have already answered that; they may be brought before the ordinary courts. With regard to the cases of imprisonment, I still submit there is absolutely no information whatsoever as to why the ordinary courts were not allowed to proceed or the ordinary procedure was not followed, beyond the answer that military officers could not have done it. My reply to it, my Lord, is, that the courts specially constituted to try offences only on the ground of necessity might have followed the regular forms and should have followed the form in a time of peace when there was actually no rebellion. In the interests, my Lord, of persons who may have wrongly suffered as well as of the future, I think I must press this amendment."

The motion was put and negatived.

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, having regard to the promise we have received, I shall not press the other two* amendments on the agenda, and I beg leave to withdraw them."

The motions were by leave withdrawn.

4-45 P.M. The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"My Lord, I propose 'that to clause 5 the following be added :—

> 'Such assessment by the said Judicial Officer shall be made pursuant to an inquiry conducted in the manner, so far as possible, laid down for the trial of suits in the Code of Civil Procedure'.

---

* The Hon'ble Mr. Sarma :—

32. 'That if amendment No. 31 be rejected the words 'and shall continue liable to confinement until the expiration of such sentence or until released by the Governor General in Council or otherwise discharged by lawful authority' in class 4 be omitted.'

33. 'That to clause 4 the following be added :—

'Provided that no person shall continue liable to confinement after the date of commencement of this Act unless he shall have been convicted and sentenced for some offence under the Indian Penal Code or some special or local law in force before the establishment of martial law.'

> 'An appeal shall lie to the High Court against such order of assessment in the manner provided for appeals from orders in the Code of Civil Procedure, the order passed by the High Court being final.'

"My Lord, this amendment does not touch at all even the fringe of the substantive provisions of the Bill. It only provides a machinery for the assessment being made, and as there is no provision of that character in this Bill, I think, my Lord, this amendment might be adopted with a view to provide a machinery for the purpose."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, the intention of the clause is to provide a summary remedy for persons who might consider themselves aggrieved owing to their properties having been commandeered by the military authorities. The Bill does not, as I understand, prevent a regular suit from being brought. Our intention is merely to provide a convenient remedy for the assessment of damages, and any one may seek redress in a law court. In those circumstances, if any person wishes to go to a law court and have a full trial, he may do so, but we do not think that it is desirable to prescribe the lengthy procedure of the Civil Court for an officer of the kind proposed. We do not either think it necessary to allow an appeal from proceedings of this character."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"My Lord, with regard to that part of the question which refers to appeals, I am prepared to withdraw it. But I think there should be some procedure laid down, and I have added the words 'so far as possible'. I do not, therefore, insist upon the trial being conducted in strict accordance with the Civil Procedure Code. I am prepared to withdraw the second clause about the appeal, to which the Hon'ble the Home Member objects."

The motion was put and negatived.

The President :—"I should have stated after Mr. Sarma withdrew his amendments just now, that amendment* No. 10 which stood on the agenda until these amendments were disposed of was of course dropped. It is consequential."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"My Lord, may I point out that the same position arises with regard to an amendment of Mr. Sinha also ?"

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, I submit that this should be accepted, because it refers to certain cases only. It refers to certain cases and subject to certain limitations only, and those words I would like to be added to paragraph 3 of the preamble."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"If the Hon'ble Member wishes to move the amendment, I have no objection."

The President :—(To Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma) "You move No. 10."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"I think that will clear the position."

The President :—"Yes, Mr. Sarma is moving his amendment No. 10 which was held up until the other two amendments 32 and 33† were disposed of."

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—"My Lord, the Act deals with only certain cases, and it imposes certain limitations. Clause 4-49 P.M.
4 deals with the cases only of persons who are actually confined in prison, and in order to bring it into conformity with the other provisions, I propose that to paragraph 3 of the preamble the words 'in certain cases and subject to the limitations specified herein below' be added. I therefore hope that this amendment will be accepted."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" My Lord, I may say at once that we have no objection whatever to the introduction of the words suggested by the Hon'ble Member if the insertion will please him, but they really do not make any difference in the effect of the Bill. As it will apparently gratify the Hon'ble Member, I am prepared to accept an amendment, substituting the words ' certain sentences ' for the words ' sentences. "

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadar B. N. Sarma :—" It is not a matter for gratification, my Lord, but it is a question of some importance, and I am glad that the Hon'ble the Home Member has accepted a modified form of my amendment."

The amended motion was put and agreed to.

4-51 P.M. The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" My Lord, I beg to move ' that in clause 6, sub-clause (b) be omitted and the said sub-clause be inserted as a new clause 7, and that to the said new clause 7 the following be added :—

> ' And any order made by His Majesty in Council on any appeal presented by any individual or individuals against any conviction or sentence passed by any tribunal constituted under martial law and acting in a judicial capacity or by Commissioners appointed under the Martial Law Ordinance, 1919, as to the legality, propriety or correctness of any conviction or sentence may be taken advantage of by any other person convicted by the tribunals or Commissioners aforementioned though he may not have appealed against his conviction or sentence to His Majesty in Council; if the grounds upon which any order of His Majesty in Council is based are common to or govern the case of such other persons, and the Governor General in Council shall be bound to act upon the reasons underlying the said order of His Majesty in Council in all cases governed by such order; and the High Court of Judicature established in the Province shall on an application made to that Court for that purpose decide whether any particular case is governed by the rule laid down or reasons underlying any order of His Majesty in Council. '

" My Lord, the object of my amendment should be obvious to everybody who has followed the debates during the last few days over the Punjab affairs. There is a large number of persons who have been arrested, detained, tried, convicted and are undergoing sentences. A few of these have appealed to His Majesty's Privy Council. An appeal to His Majesty in Privy Council is not an easy affair; it involves much expenditure, much local help, and everybody is not in a position to do so. Even if the public do extend their help to some persons, as I am thankful to say help has been extended to a number of persons to have their cases brought before His Majesty in Privy Council, but the number of such cases will, I fear, be small. There will still be a large number of persons who will not be able to approach the Privy Council. The cases that have been tried, many of them might probably rest upon some common ground. At any rate it is expected that the decision of His Majesty in Council about certain points will govern a number of cases, and the object of my amendment is that, where His Majesty in Council has considered the case and has expressed an opinion upon the matters involved in it, the benefit of that decision should be secured to such other persons who may have been tried by these martial law commissioners or summary courts and who may not have taken their case to the Privy Council. My Lord, I hope that this will commend itself to the Government because it would be anomalous and deplorable that when His Majesty in Council has expressed an opinion upon points which affect the cases of other persons, they should not have the benefit of that decision. I do not think the Government would wish to contemplate that situation. I venture to think that in this matter, at any rate, the Government will be in sympathy with my amendment. The second clause which I have added, clause 7, lays down, in order to make assurance doubly sure, that the Governor General in Council should be bound by the decision of their Lordships in the Privy Council in such cases and that they should be bound, on receipt of the orders of His Majesty in Council in any particular case to take action on all such cases as may be affected by it. But, my Lord, we are all human and there is no knowing whether a decision of the Government of India will satisfy the persons whose right or interests may be involved, and for that reason, as an assurance that everybody will have a chance of having the matter properly considered and decided, I have suggested that the High Court of Judicature established in the province should, on application made to that Court for that purpose, decide whether a particular case is governed by the rules laid down or the orders of His Majesty in Council. I hope the proposal will commend itself to Government."

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—" I should like to say one word, my Lord, in support of this proposal, which seems to me a very reasonable one. Otherwise, there will be great hardship entailed on a large number of people who cannot appeal to His Majesty in Council. Therefore, people here should be given the benefit of a Privy Council Judgment, if they move the High Court on the ground that the facts and circumstances in their cases are similar to those of the cases before the Privy Council, and obtain a favourable order therefrom." 4-55 P.M

The Hon'ble Rao Bahadur B. N. Sarma :—" My Lord, I have a similar amendment against my name. It is obviously just that if the grounds of decision upon which the Privy Council set aside a conviction are common, it should apply to similar cases, and the Government or the High Court should set aside those convictions and sentences also. Of course if the grounds on which the Privy Council set aside these convictions are of a technical character, and not based upon the merits, there is nothing to prevent the Government from bringing up the offenders before the regular courts for trial. Therefore the ground of convenience should not be for keeping those men in confinement, even though their cases may be really governed by the decision of the Privy Council."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—" My Lord, if Hon'ble Members will again read clause 6 of the Bill they will see that nothing in the Bill can affect trials by commissions. Sub-clause (a) of this clause runs as follows : 'Nothing in this Act shall apply to any sentence passed or punishment inflicted by or under the orders of any Commission appointed under the Martial Law Ordinance, 1919.' 4-59 P.M.

" If Hon'ble Members will now turn to the amendment which is proposed in clause 6 by Mr. Malaviya, they will see that an important part of his amendment is entirely inconsistent with the sub-clause which I have just read. You cannot in one sub-clause of a Bill say that nothing in this Act shall affect trials before the Commissions, and in the next sub-clause go on to provide for such convictions and sentences. I do not know if I have made myself clear, but it seems to me that, as a matter of drafting and of principle, this is impossible. We are particularly anxious, and have been most careful throughout this Bill, to avoid any reference to these Commissions appointed under the Martial Law Ordinance, because we know that certain sentences from them are before the Privy Council on appeal, and that it would be manifestly improper . . . . .

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—" My Lord, I do not want to stick to the actual wording of the amendment. If the Hon'ble Member will put it in a different form which will be acceptable, I shall be quite agreeable."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"I am aware of the habit of the Hon'ble Member of putting a motion in an impossible form and then asking me at the last moment to put it into proper form. Well, I cannot do it at this juncture; he should have thought of this before. But I shall be able, I hope, to some extent at any rate, to meet the object which he has in view. I was for the moment trying to point out to the Council that it would be entirely inconsistent with the rest of the Bill if this amendment, as it is worded, was passed by the Council, and I cannot possibly undertake at a moment's notice to alter the amendment into a form in which it could be accepted. I have already accepted one amendment from Mr. Sinha to-day, and I am not at all sure that I was wise in doing so . . . . . .

The Hon'ble Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha :—"I can assure the Hon'ble Member he was."

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"It may however meet the Hon'ble Member and others here if I explain that if there is a decision by the Privy Council in any appeal before them and any appellant is acquitted on grounds which affect the conviction of other persons who have not appealed, we shall certainly examine the cases, and if we are satisfied that the reasons set out in the Privy Council's judgment apply to any cases of the persons under confinement here, we shall give effect to the principles enunciated by the Privy Council. It follows necessarily, that if the men who have appealed to the Privy Council are acquitted on grounds which would apply to other cases, those who have not appealed will receive the benefit of the decision. But I want the Council to remember that the position of the persons to whom this Bill applies is entirely different from the position of persons tried by the Commissions. These men were tried by summary courts appointed by the military authorities. The proclamation of martial law is a statutory authority vested in the Governor General in Council, I believe, and it seems to me that the validity of the sentences of summary courts depends upon entirely different grounds from those which form the basis of the decisions of the Commissions. It is however quite possible that I may be wrong in this matter and, should the judgments of the Privy Council be decided on grounds which would indicate that the trial of these persons by summary courts was not justified, then certainly we shall have to take action to meet the decision of the Privy Council. I hope that this undertaking will meet, to some extent the wishes of the Hon'ble Member."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"Will the Government accept the last provision that 'the High Court of Judicature established in the province shall on an application made to that Court for that purpose decide whether any particular case is governed by the rule laid down or reasons underlying any order of His Majesty in Council?' "

The Hon'ble Sir William Vincent :—"I did not deal with that point by error, I ought to have done so. I am afraid the Government cannot accept this proposal. They do not intend to allow any appeal to the High Court from summary convictions by a military court. That is an entire negation of the principles on which martial law is administered. But I have given an undertaking as to the intentions of Government in this matter, and if we do not carry it out, there are many opportunities by which Hon'ble Members of this Council or any one else can make it incumbent on us to fulfil our undertaking."

The Hon'ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya :—"My Lord, my amendment does not suggest that the High Court should hear appeals from the decisions of summary courts. All that I ask is that 'the High Court of Judicature established in the province shall on an application made to that Court for that purpose decide whether any particular case is governed by the rule laid down or reasons underlying any order of His Majesty in Council'. I wish the High Court to be empowered to deal with this on an application made to them, and I think that Government might see their way to accept this much.
